THE LATE JULES LÉGER

TRIBUTES TO FORMER GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a great many moving tributes have been paid to the late and distinguished former Governor General, the Right Honourable Jules Léger, who passed away last Saturday.

Jules Léger was truly a great Canadian with a record of outstanding service to this nation. Tonight, I know I reflect the sentiments of all honourable senators as I rise, with a great deal of sadness, to note some of the reasons why we grieve his passing.

[Translation]

He started his career as a newspaper man for the daily Le Droit in 1938 and then was a professor at Ottawa University until 1942.

In 1942, he was appointed secretary to the Canadian embassy in Chile. From 1943 to 1949, he performed the same duties in London. In 1951, he became Assistant Under Secretary of State for External Affairs. Later on, he was appointed Canadian Ambassador to Mexico, Ambassador to the Council of the North Atlantic Treaty (NORAD) and Ambassador to Italy.

[English]

Jules Léger became Canadian Ambassador to France in 1964 and held that post at a time when relations between our two countries became particularly strained as a result of General de Gaulle's visit to Canada in 1967. Canada was fortunate to be able to count on someone of Jules Léger's experience and character at such a time.

[Translation]

In 1968, Jules Léger was appointed Under Secretary of State responsible for arts, culture, bilingualism, education and citizenship.

● (2205)

[English]

Before being named Governor General, Mr. Léger was named to his last diplomatic post as Ambassador to Belgium and Luxembourg.

In 1974, Jules Léger became Canada's twenty-first Governor General, the fourth Canadian and only the second French Canadian to be so honoured. Only six months after assuming his functions, Mr. Léger suffered a severe stroke, leaving him partially paralyzed. Yet he refused to resign and his will to recover became a symbol of courage to all Canadians. Within two years, Mr. Léger had recovered enough to work full days and he managed to visit every Canadian province as well as the two territories.

However, Mr. Léger's most important accomplishment may have been the Canadianization of the office of Governor General. He excelled in this task, contributing to Canadian unity and lending a sharper perspective to the concept of Canadian identity. His perseverance and his courage in this regard will serve as an example to all Canadians.

[Translation]

We offer our most sincere condolences to Madam Léger and her daughter Hélène.

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I feel very humble tonight because of the fact that I have to replace my leader and pay tribute to the late Jules Léger, former Governor General and a great and distinguished Canadian, but I feel it an honour and a privilege to act in this capacity.

● (2010)

Unfortunately, because I am a relatively new member of the Senate, I did not enjoy the privilege and honour of knowing the former Governor General, but I followed his career and was astounded by the humanitarian aspect of it, and the manner in which he brought the high office of Governor General to the people of Canada.

As a veteran, I was struck by the fact that, despite suffering a stroke, he insisted on continuing his duties. In doing so, he had the comfort and assistance of his wife, Gaby Léger. She helped him carry out those duties—duties which meant so much to Canada.

I join the Prime Minister and many distinguished Canadians more worthy than I, in paying tribute to a great Canadian. We, in this party, and all Canadians, in line with the words of the Leader of the Government, feel that we have lost a part of Canada and a most distinguished Canadian.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I had the good fortune of being a personal acquaintance of His Excellency Jules Léger. His good humor, lack of pretence, his sense of duty and devotion to the service of his country will reserve him a special place in our memories as a man who was always equal to the tasks inherent in the important posts he held. With the courageous assistance of his magnificent wife, he worked and reworked, like some master ploughman, the terrain given into his charge. Much was shown by this great man, and the harvest will continue for a long time to come.

Happy are those who, like Jules Léger, leave to their brothers such a rich heritage. We are proud of what he did and prouder still of what he was.

Truly, he was a man deserving of our fondest memories and undying gratitude.

To his family, and particularly Madame Léger, we extend our deepest sympathies.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION—REMARKS BY SENATE JOINT CHAIRMAN—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of privilege to demand, on behalf of Canadian women, an apology from the Senate Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. Senator Hays, referring as he did in committee last week, to Canadian women as the "girls," and suggesting that our place is in the home looking after children, demonstrated that he is completely insensitive to the aspirations of contemporary Canadian women.

We realize full well that we have been biologically favoured by nature to bring children into the world. We are also aware of the fact that we have traditionally been expected to play a major role in their upbringing. We have no intention of attempting to rewrite the laws of nature, nor do we for a moment intend to lessen our dedication to properly care for our children. But we do not intend to sit back and allow anyone to dictate to us how our everyday lives should be organized, what our priorities should be, and in what fields of endeavour our talents would be welcomed.

We consider ourselves Canadian citizens, enjoying all of the rights that that privilege carries, and one of those rights is certainly that of not being treated like children.

Senator Hays' behaviour was totally reprehensible. It showed a singular lack of respect and revealed that he is totally out of touch with developments in contemporary society. I think his behaviour cast serious doubts on his fitness to occupy the position of Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. I would therefore invite him to consider seriously whether he should not step down and allow someone with a greater awareness of social evolution to take his place.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Hays is well able to speak for himself; but, as honourable senators will have observed, he is not in the chamber at this time. The usual parliamentary practice, if remarks of a personally critical nature are directed at another member of this place, is to ensure, first of all, that the senator is either in his place so that he is in a position to respond immediately or, alternatively, to at least provide him with an advance copy of personally critical remarks and prior notification that these remarks are to be voiced in the Senate.

I presume that the Honourable Senator Bielish has provided the Honourable Senator Hays with an advance copy of her statement so that he will be in a position to reply if he so desires.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, if I understood Senator Perrault correctly, he referred to Senator Bielish's remarks as being of a personal nature. I listened carefully to those remarks, and while they were critical of Senator Hays' action, they were not personal. The leader is entirely wrong in his interpretation of Senator Bielish's remarks. It is quite proper for her to criticize Senator Hays' action, and she in no way criticized the person of Senator Hays.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, I do not wish to engage in a prolonged debate with Senator Phillips, who is surely entitled to his views, but when a senator in this place, regardless of party, is referred to as "totally unfit" to undertake certain important responsibilities which have been given to him, I feel that this harsh description constitutes a very personal remark.

May I suggest that Senator Bielish, in all fairness, should provide Senator Hays with a copy of her statement and notify him that this statement was made here this evening. Senator Hays, of course, is very busy with his responsibilities with the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Senator Bielish: Could I have your last statement again, please?

Senator Perrault: I said that I felt it would be fair to another honourable colleague to notify him of the statement that was made in the chamber this evening. Furthermore, may I suggest that he be provided with a copy of the statement. May I suggest that in all fairness to Senator Hays, he should have been provided with a copy of the statement before it was made in this chamber this evening.

Senator Bielish: Honourable senators, I shall make certain that he receives a copy this evening. I had not provided him with a copy prior to this evening, but I shall send a copy of this statement to him in the committee as soon as possible.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Epp, Keeper, Miss Jewett, Messrs. Robinson (Burnaby), Tobin, Miss Jewett, Miss MacDonald, Messrs. Lapierre, Epp, Tobin, Robinson (Burnaby), Lapierre, Hawkes, Irwin, Miss Jewett and Mr. Gimaïel had been substituted for those of Messrs. La Salle, de Jong, Keeper, Miss Jewett, Messrs. Lapierre, Robinson (Burnaby), Epp, Tobin, Fraser, Lapierre, Miss Jewett, Messrs. Irwin, Beatty, Tobin, Robinson (Burnaby) and Irwin; and that the names of Messrs. Young, Dinsdale and Irwin had been substituted for those of Miss Jewett, Miss MacDonald and

Mr. Gimaïel on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

CANADA POST CORPORATION BILL

SUBJECT MATTER OF CLAUSES 2, 3 AND 17 REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received a message from the House of Commons in the following words:

Thursday, November 20, 1980

Ordered,—That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that the subject matter of Clauses 2, 3 and 17 of Bill C-42, An Act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related Acts and to make related amendments to other Acts, has been referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Attest

C. B. Koester
The Clerk of the House of Commons

Ordered that the message do lie on the Table.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Copies of document entitled "A Review of the Taxation of Capital Gains in Canada: An examination of the Canadian experience and of issues involved in proposals for change", dated November 1980, issued by the Department of Finance.

Copies of Order in Council P. C. 1980-3142, dated November 21, 1980, directing Petro Canada to negotiate with Esso Resources Canada Limited with a view to advancing to that company up to forty million dollars ($40,000,000) for the period to June 1, 1981, on such terms and conditions as may be determined by Petro Canada, in order to maintain the Cold Lake Project in existence.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION BILL, 1980—REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I desire to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date and form part of the permanent records of this house.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 1289.)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Tuesday, November 25, 1980, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, could the deputy leader explain why the committee is seeking this privilege, and perhaps he could tell us if the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will be meeting tomorrow afternoon, because the thought occurs to me that if both committees meet tomorrow afternoon and there are still transportation problems, it will be difficult to have a quorum in three places at the same time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Phillips's question is apropos. I wish I could give a definite answer, but I can only give an indefinite one. As honourable senators will remember, the objective was to deal with the second reading stage of the Bank Act this evening, and have it referred to committee tomorrow morning in the hope that we might get it back in the house tomorrow afternoon.

After making our plans a problem arose in connection with the attendance of an important witness, and it looked as if we were unlikely to have the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee sit until tomorrow afternoon. However, I was informed about 30 seconds ago that it looks as though the witness will be able to attend in the morning, and therefore we will be able to proceed with our arrangement to have the house sit tomorrow afternoon.

That brings me to my reason for asking permission for the Foreign Affairs Committee to sit tomorrow afternoon. It is because that committee had planned a long time ago to have some witnesses from Toronto and the United States appear before it tomorrow afternoon, assuming that the Senate would be sitting Tuesday evening. The caveat raised by Senator Phillips is one that we should keep in mind with reference to a quorum, if several committees are authorized to sit tomorrow afternoon. I thank the honourable senator for bringing that to my attention.

Senator Phillips: We will give leave, honourable senators, on condition that the Deputy Leader of the Government will be responsible for maintaining the three quorums.

Senator Frith: That is difficult but it is fair.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

STATUS OF WOMEN

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION—REMARKS BY SENATE JOINT CHAIRMAN

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Having regard for the importance of the question of privilege raised by my colleague, Senator Bielish, could the Leader of the Government undertake to make every effort to have Senator Hays present in the chamber tomorrow to deal with that question?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the ordinary course, Senator Hays would be present tomorrow afternoon. I understand that the special joint committee will be sitting at approximately 3.30 p.m. tomorrow. I must say, however, that I have not read the entire transcript of the remarks which have been attributed to the honourable senator, and I do not think that any honourable senator would wish to pass judgment until we had the record before us. I do not intend to engage in any personal criticism or make any comment until I make sure that the facts are as outlined.

YUKON TERRITORY

THE CONSTITUTION—ENTRENCHMENT OF CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I have a further question for the Leader of the Government. In an interview last Friday the Honourable John Munro acknowledged as valid the concerns of the Government of the Yukon Territory regarding its ability to control the economy of the Yukon should the new Charter of Rights become entrenched in the Constitution. It relates to the question that has been raised in the Northern Pipeline Committee and which I have raised with the Minister responsible for Economic Development.

The Government of the Yukon is joined by the Human Rights Commissioner, the Commissioner of Official Languages, the National Indian Brotherhood, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Canadian Jewish Congress, and almost every other group to appear before the joint committee, in labelling the proposed charter as seriously flawed. Some have even had the audacity to refer to it as dangerous.

With that in mind—and I am referring not just to those reflections of the various interest groups, but also to the minister's comment—is the Government of Canada at least giving consideration to a total rewrite of the charter, given that it appears that mere amendments would be unlikely to rectify some of its substantial flaws?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, some time ago it was stated by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, and other government spokesmen, including spokesmen in this chamber, that one of the values of forming a joint committee made up of able parliamentarians was to enable various interest groups and governments, associations and organizations to appear and make known their views. That process is now under way, and it is a valuable one. I am certain that the fair-minded people who make up that joint committee will listen attentively to the representations made to them by the representatives of the Yukon, and the weight that they wish to accord to those views will be reflected subsequently in a committee report to Parliament, which will then, of course, be debated in both chambers.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, the question, really, that I directed to the Leader of the Government was as to whether, in the light of such substantial criticism from so many quarters, any consideration has been given not just to making amendments, as the honourable leader suggests, but to a rewrite of the constitutional proposals. That, really, is the question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in my view it would be most unparliamentary for the government to announce that it is going to alter substantially its constitutional proposals before the committee of qualified parliamentarians studying those proposals has had a chance to report back with its recommendations. It would certainly be out of character for a government that believes in the democratic process for that government to initiate unilateral action to change its constitutional proposals before the joint committee has presented its report. However, the Prime Minister has stated many times that he is prepared to consider changes in the constitutional proposals if the weight of the evidence appears to warrant changes.

Senator Nurgitz: I thank the Honourable Leader of the Government, and I appreciate his remarks. I, too, am against unilateral action. It is interesting that he chose that word.

TRANSPORT

URBAN TRANSPORT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST ONTARIO

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question arising from an article appearing in today's Toronto Globe and Mail, dealing with a report that the Ontario Transport Minister, the Honourable James Snow, has accused the federal government of discriminating against Ontario in its policies with regard to aid to urban transit.

When asked in the Commons today about the $290 million commitment that was made to urban transit by the party of the government—I believe in the 1974 election campaign—almost none of which has been delivered, the Minister of Transport said that the government may have been overly enthusiastic in making commitments of that sort, without giving any answer to the question.

While we are unaccustomed to this sort of frankness from Liberal ministers, can the Leader of the Government provide us now with details as to when these specific commitments will be honoured, or if there have been other commitments made during periods of high enthusiasm which we can expect will not be fulfilled as well.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to defer to our distinguished colleague, Senator Olson, who has some information on that point.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am informed, of course, that there were some questions raised in the other house earlier today, but I understand that under the arrangements of the Urban Transport Assistance Program, although the federal government allocates funds, it is the responsibility of the provincial governments to determine which programs or projects will benefit from these moneys.

In the case of Ontario, apparently most of their funds went towards grade separations. As I understand it the actual allocation of funds is based on a formula of $10 per capita. This allocation formula was agreed to on consultation with the provinces, which felt that a per capita basis was the only feasible way of assigning the money. It is obvious that this agreement takes into account the greater needs of more populous areas for funds, for both urban transportation and grade separations.

Senator Perrault: Call Mr. Davis on that.

ITALY

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—GOVERNMENT AID

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure that honourable senators have heard about the devastating earthquake in southern Italy yesterday, an earthquake that claimed thousands of victims. A fund-raising committee has been established in Toronto under the auspices of the National Congress of Italian Canadians, and committees will be established in other parts of Canada.

Has the government leader any indication to give us of whether any Canadian aid will be despatched to the earthquake area similar to the aid that was despatched to the Friuli region in 1976, when a similar earthquake took place there?

• (2035)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the reports from Italy are most tragic. The formal information I received this morning from the Office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is that Italy has not yet appealed for international support. However, should an international appeal be launched, without question Canada would consider a response to the appeal. Canadian generosity and compassion in the aftermath of human tragedy has been demonstrated many times, including the occasion of the Friuli disaster.

In the present tragic circumstances, the government encourages concerned Canadians to contact the Canadian Red Cross Society, which has been asked to co-ordinate contributions to the stricken area. Donations in cash are encouraged, as they allow local relief workers to respond quickly with supplies which meet local needs more adequately and effectively than gifts in kind.

I understand that this afternoon a further personal statement was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan. Hopefully, a copy of that statement can be obtained at some point this evening, or in time for tomorrow's Question Period. At that time I hope to provide further information regarding Canadian aid to alleviate that terrible and devastating disaster.

Senator Bosa: Will the government leader undertake to make representations to the government that if any relief in the way of cash is going to be made to the earthquake victims, it be made through the National Congress of Italian Canadians, who did such an outstanding job after the Friuli earthquake in building shelters for the earthquake victims, rather than just providing temporary relief, which is provided quite capably by the Italian government?

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Senator Bosa has a long history of expertise and concern in this area. He has been most helpful in the past in advancing contructive proposals affecting refugee relief in various part of the world, not the least of which have been the human problems arising from the unfortunate earthquake in Italy.

The suggestion he has made this evening will certainly be communicated to the government. May I invite Senator Bosa to share with the government other ideas that he might have on this important subject?

PACIFIC RIM TRADE CONFERENCE

REPORT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, last week we missed the cheerful replies of the Honourable Leader of the Government, who was absent at a conference in British Columbia, a conference which I believe is commonly termed the Pacific Rim Conference. It was a rather unusual conference, in that it was held behind locked doors. I want to assure the Leader of the Government that we on this side do not believe the rumour that the Prime Minister ordered the doors locked when he heard the Leader of the Government in the Senate was attending. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could provide this chamber with a report on the conference.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator has asked his question with his usual spirit of personal generosity, and I listened intently to what he had to say.

The conference held on the west coast last week, the Pacific Rim Trade Conference, featured participation by many provincial governments of various political persuasions, a cross-section of business people concerned with export trade, representatives from labour, participants from the federal government and many others. The meeting was designed to determine the ways in which we might increase Canadian trade with the rapidly expanding Pacific Rim trading area. Ambassadors of many Pacific Rim nations were present in Vancouver during the conference, although they were not direct participants in the conference sessions.

Important matters were discussed relating to Canada's trade potential with these Pacific nations whose increase in gross national product this year will be something in the order of eight per cent. There is truly remarkable growth taking place, and those who attended the conference are convinced that more goods and services from the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, the western provinces and northern Canada can find large and profitable trading opportunities in the important Pacific region.

The conference was not, in any real sense, a closed conference. A number of sessions were held to discuss ways in which Canadian products and services can be sold and merchandised more effectively in many of the Pacific nations. There were discussions about ways in which exports can be financed and markets extended and expanded. All of the luncheon and dinner sessions, and the plenary session, were open and the press were invited to attend.

One of the distinguished and able speakers at the conference was Senator Olson. I believe all honourable senators would have been proud of the contribution he made to the conference. Other participants included the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Secretary of State for External Affairs opened the conference sessions.

Erroneous reports have been circulated that the sessions were kept absolutely closed and the media excluded completely. The fact is that the basic terms of reference were very similar to those contemplated by the Conservative government when it underlook the initial organization of this conference. There are memoranda to that effect in existence. There have been some references in the media to those memoranda. Both the previous and the present governments, I think with good reason, felt that certain sessions of this important workshop on how to develop better trade in the Pacific region should be kept within the Canadian family. For that reason certain sessions and certain sectors of the conference were not open to general media coverage.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, before asking a supplementary question, I would point out to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the previous government had also planned to have certain sessions televised.

The meeting dealt with a potential market of $8 billion to $10 billion in export trade. Would the Leader of the Government tell us who represented the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce at that meeting?

Senator Perrault: The conference organizer and national host, the Honourable Ed Lumley, the Minister of State for Trade, made a major and effective contribution to the success of the meeting.

Honourable senators, I think it would be to the advantage of all of Canada to become more competitive in the contest for export markets. For example, surely it would be a very useful initiative to have an Atlantic Canada International Trade Fair one year and a Pacific International Trade Fair the following year, and perhaps alternate in this way.

It is my personal view that we should be far more aggressive than we have been. Canadians attend trade fairs in other nations of the world. Why do we not have a major world-scale trade fair annually on one coast or the other? I believe many Canadians would support that idea. With our potential, our skill, our industry and our workmen, we should not be "backward in coming forward" as far as trade is concerned.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am very pleased to hear the Leader of the Government adopting Conservative policy. I should like to see him adopt more of that. I particularly support his concept of an Atlantic trade conference for the Atlantic provinces. I will go further than that, and offer to help him organize it.

Senator Perrault: I will help too, honourable senators.

NEWFOUNDLAND

PROVINCIAL ECONOMY—CONTROL OVER NATURAL RESOURCES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and has to do with a study of Newfoundland conducted by the Economic Council of Canada.

It is obvious from the statistics given by the Economic Council that there is a wide welfare gap, despite the appreciated equalization payments by the federal government to Newfoundland over the past number of years since Confederation. It is alarming to note that the handouts from Ottawa raised the provincial average to 228 per cent of the national per capita unemployment insurance benefit.

In view of the fact that the national average earned income is $6,928 whereas the average earned income for Newfoundlanders is $3,710, or 53 per cent of the national average, is the Minister of State for Economic Development willing to admit that Premier Peckford is correct in insisting that Newfoundland should have control over its natural resources in order to lift itself out of this existing welfare gap? If Newfoundland has control of its resources, it can attempt to provide benefits to Newfoundlanders and become a "have" province, which it has not been since 1949.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not believe there is any question but that Newfoundland has control over its natural resources. The only question is: How far out to sea does that control extend? The federal government has offered Newfoundland 100 per cent of the revenue from the development of those natural resources. The course my honourable friend is suggesting is not new since we have been on that course for some time.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, as I was cleaning out my office today, I discovered files on Newfoundland that cover the past 12 years and which lead me to the conclusion that there have been countless studies done of the problems in Newfoundland. The only thing I can say is that these studies must be of great assistance to the pulp and paper industry.

As a supplementary, would the minister, in his overall supervision of the economic development of Canada—and I compliment him on his appointment to his important portfolio—agree that Newfoundland is correct, and support Newfoundland's position to review the Upper Churchill agreement with Quebec? Would he also support Newfoundland's stand that it should be able to transmit hydro-electric power across Quebec to new customers in the United States?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend knows that the federal government has made a number of positive assertions with respect to that matter. The Prime Minister has indicated that the federal government is prepared to take some action. I am sure that my honourable friend will agree with me that a negotiated settlement of that is still the most desirable course in the long run.

INCOME TAX

UNINCORPORATED BUSINESSES—DEDUCTION OF SALARIES PAID TO SPOUSES

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In his mini budget of April 21 last, the Minister of Finance promised he would introduce the measure first brought in by Mr. Crosbie last December that would provide for the deduction of salaries paid to spouses by persons carrying on an unincorporated business.

In checking with the Department of Finance I am told that the measure is operative, and anyone who asked should be told to count on that spousal deduction. When I checked with Revenue Canada, however, they stated that the deduction would not be permitted unless the legislation was passed.

[Senator Marshall.]

Would the government leader tell us when he anticipates this legislation will reach us, and also what might happen if the legislation is not passed before the income tax forms for 1980 are printed, or before April, 1981, when taxes are due for payment?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. However, opposition members of Parliament might be helpful in this regard by expediting the passage of some of these measures. The information will be brought to the chamber as soon as possible.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—EFFECT ON OIL AND NATURAL GAS EXPLORATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on November 6 concerning the Petroleum Monitoring Agency.

Under the existing legislation, namely, the Petroleum Administration Act, the Petroleum Monitoring Agency will examine inter alia all investment patterns. Accordingly, the agency would monitor shifts in expenditures by industry, and this would include capital investments and profits.

Honourable senators would want to know that Mr. Renouf, Chairman of the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, is expected to issue a discussion paper on the proposed functions and operations of the agency as a prelude to drafting the new regulations.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before my honourable friend goes to the next answer, could I ask him to clarify the one he just gave. Does the Petroleum Monitoring Agency just take into account the investment patterns within Canada, or does it also take into account the movement of capital out of Canada in that industry? That is the point I originally made.

Senator Olson: I understand that, and I expect that they are going to be giving us as much information as they can on intentions even in advance of the movement having been made, if there is any movement.

THE BUDGET—PROVISIONS RESPECTING OIL AND NATURAL GAS—EFFECT ON OFFSHORE DEVELOPMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Doody on October 31 concerning the impact of the Canada Oil and Gas Act respecting Petro-Canada and Hibernia. It is a rather long and detailed answer and perhaps, since Senator Doody is not here, honourable senators could take it as read.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes.

Presently, Petro-Canada has a 25 per cent interest in Hibernia. With the 25 per cent carried interest announced in the National Energy Program, the federal government would have a 25 per cent interest in the balance, which would be, in real terms, an additional 18¾ per cent. This, plus the 25 per cent, could amount to a 44 per cent interest in the project.

The federal government's position has been that no compensation is required. With the incentive offered by the federal government to encourage exploration and development on Canada Lands, exploration costs in many cases have been supported up to 93 per cent by Canadian taxpayers. In addition, the government has taken the position that the 25 per cent grant for exploration and development on Canada Lands for all companies, including those with less than 50 per cent Canadian ownership, is sufficient to offset the 25 per cent carried interest by the federal government.

With reference to the honourable senator's specific concern for the Hibernia project, one of the reasons for Petro-Canada's involvement is to ensure that the project will go ahead. While the federal government has not had detailed discussions with Newfoundland, I am sure that the province is as anxious as the federal government to support and encourage any incentives which will promote the development of Hibernia.

THE BUDGET—POLICY RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Doody on November 6 which concerns Petro-Canada's financing. It is not a long answer, but perhaps it could go in the same category and be taken as read.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators will know that Petro-Canada is a schedule D crown corporation. There are provisions in the Petro-Canada legislation whereby the government may agree to purchase shares and thereby provide equity to the corporation. Petro-Canada annually submits a capital budget, which sets out its budgetary requirements and its plans for investment in future years.

THE BUDGET—EFFECT ON ENERGY INDUSTRY IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question asked on October 29 by Senator Balfour which concerned the effect of the budget on the energy industry. Part of this answer deals with what Senator Roblin asked about the Petroleum Monitoring Agency monitoring the shifts in expenditures by industry.

I suggest that this answer be taken as read. It will appear in today's Hansard.

(The answer follows:)

As honourable senators can appreciate, at the present time it is difficult to determine how many, if indeed any, companies will be leaving Canada to go to the U.S. or other countries. The federal government in its National Energy Program provided a wide range of incentives to encourage exploration and development of Canada's energy resources to investors interested in the energy industry.

I might add, for the honourable senator's information, that the Petroleum Monitoring Agency will be monitoring shifts in expenditures by industry so that if there is any movement these figures will be available to us.

PROPOSED TAX ON NATURAL GAS—FEDERAL REVENUE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question asked on October 31 by Senator Roblin concerning natural gas revenues.

Honourable senators may know that licensed gas exports for 1980 are 1.35 trillion cubic feet. Presently the domestic demand stands at about 1.65 trillion cubic feet per year; therefore, exports represent approximately 45 per cent of the total demand.

Based on licensed levels the ratio between domestic and export sales is 55-45. However, exports this year have been below the licensed levels. If this situation continues the export versus domestic tax revenue in 1981-82, would also be somewhat less than the present 45 per cent rate. I would caution honourable senators, however, that we do not know for sure what these levels will be, particularly when that gas market strengthens, which is fully expected.

POST OFFICE

THE BUDGET—REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Doody on October 29 concerning possible postage rate increases, and I am pleased to confirm what I stated in the Senate on that day. There will be no postage rate increase over the Christmas season.

The Postmaster General told the Commons Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates that there will be a letter rate increase in 1981. This should come as no surprise as the former Postmaster General indicated, while in office, that an increase was warranted. There has not been an increase since 1979, and the general practice has been to adjust rates approximately every two years.

The rate increase will be reasonable and will be in line with those in other comparable industrial nations.

On the general question of balancing Post Office books, I would like to point out that the deficit has been consistently reduced each year for the past three years. Many factors are involved. Rates are one factor. The completion of the modernization plan with the opening of new plants in Halifax and

Montreal in 1979, and the introduction of new services, such as the rapidly expanding Intelpost system, are others that are expected to continue generating both efficiencies and revenues.

THE CONSTITUTION

RENEWABLE RESOURCES—INDIRECT TAXATION BY PROVINCES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by the distinguished Acting Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, Senator Marshall, concerning clarification of the government's position respecting indirect taxation on renewable resources by the provinces and, particularly, the position with regard to hydro-electric power.

The government is prepared to include in the proposed resolution on the Constitution a provision which would allow provincial governments to apply indirect taxes to their non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources, and to sites and facilities for the generation of electrical energy and the primary production therefrom. This taxation could apply whether or not the resources were exported from the province, provided that the tax did not discriminate between those resources used in the province and those exported.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I rise on a point of order after the kind words of the Deputy Leader of the Government. With the entry of my deputy leader, who is much more capable, I am now going to return to my seat in the second row.

AGRICULTURE

STORAGE CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 27 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

Has the Province of Newfoundland applied for assistance under the Storage Construction Assistance Program, and, if so, how many applications were received and how many were approved?

Reply by the Minister of Agriculture:

Yes: —Two

—None

(See answer to similar question, page 608 of the Debates of the Senate, July 10, 1980)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to give a supplementary answer to what was not necessarily a supplementary question asked by Senator Phillips in his role as Acting Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. His question concerned the motion that the Standing Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs have the right to sit tomorrow while the Senate is sitting.

• (2100)

In common with many other senators, I arrived late at the airport because of the weather problems we are experiencing. I came directly here and consequently I did not know, as I now do, that that committee meeting had been cancelled, no doubt partly for reasons mentioned by Senator Phillips.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION BILL, 1980

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, the first comment I must make is that the wisdom of the Senate in establishing the practice of pre-study of important bills introduced in the House of Commons, and commencing such pre-study as early as possible, has been justified again, if it needed any further justification.

Historically, it would be interesting to note just what the Senate committee, at the direction of the Senate, has done over the period that the banking legislation has been before Parliament. I should point out, first of all, that the 1967 Bank Act provided for the decennial review of the banking legislation in 1977. In 1976, the government of the day issued a white paper on banking legislation. That was during the summer recess, and when Parliament resumed in the fall, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was directed to consider, study and report on the subject matter of the white paper.

That study was proceeded with over a considerable period of time, and the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the white paper on Canadian banking legislation was tabled in the Senate on June 8, 1977. The committee concluded its report with 37 recommendations or groups of recommendations. Bill C-15, a bill which followed shortly thereafter, included 24 of those proposed recommendations by way of amendment of the terms of the white paper.

Then the subject matter of Bill C-15 was studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This included, as well, Bill C-57, which had a very short life. It was introduced in the House of Commons in one session, and almost immediately we entered into another session which necessitated the reprinting and reintroduction of the bill. This time it became known as Bill C-15.

Bill C-15 was studied by the committee, which tabled its report on March 7, 1979. This contained 51 recommendations. Bill C-14, which succeeded Bill C-15, reflected approximately 35 of the recommendations made in respect of Bill C-15. Some of those recommendations and the amendments which proceeded from them had very important effects on the provisions that were originally outlined in the white paper.

The next report of the committee on the subject matter of Bill C-14 was tabled on December 5, 1979. This contained 13 recommendations. The last report was an interim report of the Senate committee, tabled on July 16, 1980, and that contained five principal recommendations.

You can see that throughout the course of its study the committee has been gradually reducing the necessity of dealing with items which it felt should not be in this type of legislation, and the bill has been conforming more and more to the approaches, views and considerations of the members of the committee.

A great advantage was that generally the membership of the committee during that time remained constant. We had some very welcome additions, including the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, whose comments were always worthwhile.

Having indicated the historical aspect, I think I should point out what are the main changes proposed in Bill C-6. Of course, I would regard the main change, if I had to select one, as the entry, control and conditions for the operation in Canada of foreign banks. The other items I would list as follows: The method of incorporation of new banks into the banking system in Canada, either by special act of Parliament or letters patent. Heretofore and under the present law, such incorporation could only take place by a special act of Parliament. Then I would list changes to the primary reserves required to be provided by Canadian chartered banks.

On that point, I should indicate that one of our original criticisms in relation to the white paper, and again in relation to Bill C-57 and Bill C-15, was that the rates for cash reserves were too high. Those cash reserves provided by the chartered banks are intended as a safeguard for purposes of liquidity, for purposes of monetary control, and they continued in the 1976 white paper, and in Bill C-15, with the original rates, which were 12 per cent on demand deposits and 4 per cent on notice deposits. Those cash reserves were non-interest bearing, yet we discovered in our examination of the Governor of the Bank of Canada that these cash reserves were used by the Bank of Canada to provide a market for government bonds. When we pressed as to the need for the cash reserves in Bill C-15, we were told by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and by the Inspector General of Banks, that the government's market needs were such that they required these funds in order to be able to assist in the market needs for government bonds.

In studying the statements of the Bank of Canada, we found that the net income from the holding of government bonds, plus other income which the Bank of Canada earned, was paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada in each year. While it was never carried into effect in any subsequent bill, we suggested that there should be interest paid on these cash reserves. But, of course, the answer to that was that the money was required for market purposes, for fiscal purposes and, therefore, we must get it at no cost.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General of Banks both said at that time, in their evidence before us on Bill C-15, that liquidity did not require reserves of 12 per cent and 4 per cent—that monetary control did not require that amount, but the market needs require a substantial amount. Therefore, in the subsequent bills which were introduced, the 12 per cent, as we had recommended in our original report on the white paper, was reduced to 10 per cent, and the 4 per cent to 3 per cent. But provision was made for the phasing-in of these lower rates over a period of four and one-half years. We complained about that being an extraordinary period of time, and the explanation was that the market needs of the government over the period of the next three or four years were such that they had to ease the reduction in the amount coming to the Bank of Canada by way of cash reserves very slowly.

Subsequently, I should tell you, that period of four and one-half years was reduced to three and one-half years. Once the bill has become law and has been in operation for a month, the demand deposit rate of 12 per cent, under that three and one-half year period, will be reduced by one-quarter of one per cent every six months, and the notice deposit rate will be reduced by one-eighth of one per cent every six months. So, the net result is that our objections and our recommendations were heeded to that extent.

Perhaps I might indicate, without developing them, some of the other changes which might be regarded as important but which, I am sure by this time, are well known to members of the Senate. For instance, there are the provisions permitting banks to conduct certain types of undertakings, such as financial leasing, factoring, and mortgage lending through subsidiaries; and the provision concerning ownership of bank shares by provincial governments, which has carried from the white paper through each of the succeeding bills. In respect of that provision, notwithstanding the objections that we have made and the recommendations that we have made, there has been no statement as to why this provision should be put in this form, because this marked the beginning of the introduction of such a provision in any Bank Act.

Next, there is the establishment by act of Parliament of the Canadian Payments Association, which would include banks and near-banks in an evolving national electronic payments system for clearing and settlement purposes. This Canadian Payments Association is to replace the existing clearing house which, from the early years of this century, the Canadian Bankers Association has carried on.

Then the other provision which I would regard as important relates to the amendments proposed to the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, and other related legislation. The amendments to the Bank of Canada Act are technical and procedural. One comes instantly to mind, and that is that the Bank of Canada, in appointing auditors, should appoint firms as opposed to individuals, the reason being that it makes for greater flexibility. You are then not frozen to the attention of two individual chartered accountants.

Having indicated that, and having indicated the method of incorporation of banks under Bill C-6, I should call your attention to the reason for the emphasis which was put upon the entry of foreign banks into Canada.

From the early 1960s, foreign banks from the United States, Europe, the United Kingdom and Japan came into Canada in connection with the development in the leasing of equipment, something which became quite an important factor in business. It started out with such large items as airplanes and railway cars, and things of that nature, and finally moved into the area of automobiles. These foreign banks incorporated financial corporations in Canada, and these financial corporations, or most of them, were incorporated provincially. Some were incorporated federally. The net result was that the Canadian banks were in competition with the foreign banks through these financial corporations, with the Canadian chartered banks being required to make their contributions to the cash reserves and to the secondary reserves.

I have not yet mentioned the matter of secondary reserves. The secondary reserves, which are provided for under the Bank Act, are interest-bearing reserves. In relation to the secondary reserves, the banks have the option of either contributing cash or interest-bearing securities, as specified in the Bank Act itself.

If you are looking for this information, you will find it in section 72 of the existing Bank Act and in clause 208(7) of Bill C-6.

This secondary reserve, for some years, has been 5 per cent, and it can be satisfied by the contribution of Treasury bills or day loans to investment houses. The interest rates, of course, are not as high as might otherwise be earned. But this is the burden which the Canadian banks had to carry while in competition with the foreign banks that were carrying on their business through financial corporations. So, it isn't any wonder that the white paper stated that this was a very substantial advance and of great benefit to Canada. What the white paper said was that it would provide for more equitable and effective competition between Canadian and foreign-owned institutions; provide opportunities for Canadian affiliates of foreign banks to operate under Canadian legislation; and provide economic and financial surveillance by Canadian authorities.

Those were two very important factors. In other words, the foreign banks were to be given the right to come into Canada on terms and conditions, but they would be subject to all of the provisions of the Bank Act, which means they would have to provide the same kinds and the same amounts of reserves that the chartered banks were obligated to provide.

The net result of that was that the conditions established for foreign banks to operate in Canada were that they would have to operate through foreign bank subsidiaries in Canada, and the foreign bank itself would not be able to carry on business in Canada. Of course, there were considerations involved as to how you deal with the financial corporations that the foreign banks had in existence for quite a number of years, and there were certain grandfathering provisions put in the various bills—and they are in Bill C-6—under which the shares of the financial corporation might be transferred to the foreign bank subsidiary, or under which the financial corporation might be converted or amalgamated into the foreign bank subsidiary in Canada. The result of that was a grandfathering of the requirement since, under the Bank Bill, these shares would be ineligible assets. But an exemption, with the leave of the Governor in Council, was provided for two years. Subsequently, it was further provided that, from time to time as the situation developed, extensions might be obtained, in the discretion of the minister and the Governor in Council, of up to ten years.

Of course, that takes you to the next decennial revision in 1991. I am afraid that the end of the road with respect to my interest in the next revision will come before that date.

Senator Marshall: Oh, no, you will be here.

Senator Hayden: I should point out that the foreign bank is not completely ignored, in the sense that it may, under the bill, have a representative office in Canada. It may directly engage employees, but in the representative office it can only deal with operations outside of Canada. It cannot have any dealings in Canada.

One other point I should indicate to you is that a foreign bank may establish through the foreign bank subsidiary only one branch in Canada. It may make application thereafter to the Inspector General of Banks, and then to the Governor in Council as the last authority, to extend the number of branches which it may maintain in Canada. But there, too, there is a grandfathering provision that, to the extent that the foreign banks through their financial corporations had branches of their operations in Canada at the time the application for a charter or letters patent was made, they could validate additional branches on application to the Governor in Council. If they had not validated all the branches at once, they could come back from time to time, but in the discretion of the minister and the Governor in Council they could validate more of those branches. Therefore, when the foreign bank subsidiary is incorporated, the authority to maintain one branch is such an authority that, if they meet the requirements, there is available the opportunity to establish more branches.

I should tell you, too, that the conditions that are imposed are the following: A foreign bank subsidiary requires a licence to commence operations, and that is in the discretion of the minister; but at that time the foreign bank also has to procure a licence, and the requirement of the procuring of the licence will enable the minister and the Governor in Council to decide whether the foreign bank subsidiary has been conforming to the time factors and the growth factors and all of the other conditions of their operation. If it is decided that it has not been, then its licence will be cancelled and it will have to stop operating. But the bill—even Bill C-6, the one I am discussing—provided that the licence should be a three-year licence. That was a recommendation of the Senate committee, but the Commons committee, which was studying Bill C-6 this year, decided that there should be some change, and the government accepted that committee's recommendation that the licence be for one year for each year of the first five years, and that thereafter it could be obtained at three-year intervals. That amendment was made in June, I think, of this year by the Commons committee.

There is a provision, too, that a foreign bank may not guarantee the paper of an affiliate in Canada, other than a non-bank affiliate or a foreign bank subsidiary. The purpose, I would conclude, is to keep them out of being in the stream of business directly in Canada. We had many questions as to why the foreign bank should not be able to use its guarantee system in Canada. It would bolster up some of the security operations to have such guarantees, but no change has been made in that.

The only other point concerned the time and growth limitations. It is provided that the Canadian assets of a foreign bank subsidiary may not exceed 20 times its authorized capital. It is also provided that the aggregate domestic assets of all foreign bank subsidiaries may not exceed 8 per cent of the total assets of all Canadian banks, including in such latter total the domestic assets of the foreign bank subsidiaries.

The idea there, of what I call the size and growth factor and the market share, is that those conditions which are attached to the operations of a foreign bank subsidiary in Canada are designed to control the extent of the growth of those foreign banks through their foreign bank subsidiaries in Canada. Overall, the 8 per cent of domestic assets is a limit to which the foreign banks which appeared before us did not raise any particular objection, and they came before us from the United Kingdom, West Germany, France, the United States and Japan.

We went into those conditions, the size, growth and other factors. Some suggestions were made and accepted, but in the main the banks that were represented appeared to be satisfied with the conditions.

Having dealt with those phases, I wish now to bring the house up to date. There were a number of amendments proposed by the government at a very late date. On approximately June 20 quite a number were proposed and were delivered to the Commons committee, but not delivered to us. However, in many aspects Ottawa is a place where, if one wanted to gather information, it is possible to do so, and we were able to procure copies of those and subsequent amendments. When I complained to the minister that, after all, we had some rights in the matter, we started getting copies of subsequent amendments.

The Commons report was tabled on October 6. Earlier in the week an amendment was introduced dealing with what is called the prepayment of individual loans and there was a prohibition put in the bill. It was a government proposed amendment which the Commons committee approved. The prohibition provided that the prepayment of an individual loan could not be prohibited by the requirement of payment of a charge or penalty; that if there were a charge or penalty, there were regulations prescribing what it would be.

I believe that in some quarters it has been indicated that the rate or charge may be that no rate or charge will be permitted to be made. The difficulty about that, and the objection which your committee had to it, was that all individual loans are not consumer loans. In the language that was used in the Commons committee, and at times by the minister, they were designated as consumer loans, and we said that because they are individual loans it does not necessarily mean they are consumer loans and therefore there should be an exemption—that the prohibition applied only to consumer loans or that business loans were excluded.

Our first reaction in committee was to say that there would have to be some change and amendment to this action. We discovered, however, that there is a cost where an individual loan is prepaid, because the cost of negotiating a loan and all the other factors are spread over the life of the loan, and, of course, if there is a prepayment, the full cost is not realized. That means one of two things: either the individual rate on such a loan will be increased to take care of that, or the cost will be included in the general cost of all the loan business; but one way or the other it will be taken care of, because if you do not take care of your costs, then it is certain that you will develop difficulties at some time in the future.

However, the question that the committee had to decide was whether it would recommend that the provision be amended. Incidentally, we also discovered that the government itself is not practising what it is preaching in relation to those charges or penalties, because in connection with the latest issue of Canada Savings Bonds there are penalty provisions. For instance, if one cashes in a bond during the month, one does not receive any interest for that month. We mentioned that to the minister and to Mr. Kennett when they were before us, and they looked a little surprised but there was no answer given. It is a good precedent to follow, and that is what we told the minister.

However, our recommendation will be that time is an important factor in meeting the deadline for this bill and there is a way—although perhaps not a fair and equitable way—of passing on the cost of the prepayment. It is true that the people who did not cause the prepayment are those who will suffer by whatever is the amount of the cost that is saddled on them. It does not seem fair. However, it may well be that we should ask the minister to review this matter rather than present the spectacle of an amended bill.

We had then to give consideration to the ownerhsip of bank shares. We have had no explanation as to why there is this request, and we feel at this time that possibly our purpose would be served if the minister would undertake to review the matter within, say, the next session of Parliament.

It may take me a few minutes to tell you the full story on the question of financial leasing. Some of the members of the committee who are here, of course, are fully aware of it. Under this heading we are dealing with the business and powers of a bank. The white paper, and the several bills that followed it, provided, first of all, that the banks might engage in financial leasing, including the leasing of automobiles and trucks. That continued, but certain changes were made to meet objections, though they were not substantial changes. Then, in June of this year, there was a really substantial change proposed. That change was to the effect that no bank might enter into a leasing agreement if the gross weight of the vehicle was less than 46,000 pounds or 21 metric tons. Some of the language here is significant, and it is exactly the language that was submitted to the Commons committee and to our committee by the Federation of Automotive Dealers and the Automotive Leasing Association.

When we started to analyze the change, however, we found many difficulties in it. For instance, there was the expression "capable of being licensed for use on a highway." A farm tractor is capable of being so used, and as a matter of fact we were told that in the province of Quebec and possibly elsewhere it is required to be licensed. Therefore, even though the farm tractor may be a special purpose piece of equipment, it was covered, and if it weighed less than 46,000 pounds the banks could not enter into any licensing deal.

Then evidence was produced to show that 95 per cent of new truck registrations for 1979 were of vehicles of 16,000 pounds gross vehicle weight or less. However, it was an effort. Really, as a witness from one of the leasing companies said to us, "The banks are difficult to control. Therefore you either give them what they want, or you give them nothing." This was a case of giving them nothing.

We did have sessions with the minister, however, and we pointed out, first of all, that the phrase "capable of being licensed for use on a highway" presented certain problems.

The other matter concerned, for instance, special purpose equipment. You have specialty manufacturers in Canada who manufacture the tops of fire engines, cement mixers, ambulances, and all that sort of thing. The only thing that a dealer enters into in relation to that is the chassis. The chassis has to be a custom-made job because of the special weights involved, and so on. You have Hydro, for example, with what are really workshops in the top part of its trucks, and Bell Telephone with its workshops in the top part of the trucks, and the municipalities with special equipment for some of their services. They were all caught up in this situation, where the approach to financing is one of regulating and controlling your cash flow. Leasing is part of that control, because it does not call for the laying-out of as much money all at once. Even Hydro, we were told, operates in that fashion.

To make a long story short, the minister, of his own accord, drafted an amendment which is now incorporated in the bill before us. It was tabled in the House of Commons on the consideration of the report of the Commons committee. It provides a special definition for motor vehicles which was not included in the motor vehicle description that originally formed part of the act. That provision originally put into the bill by the Commons committee at the request of the government remains in the bill, except that the words "capable of being licensed for use on the highway" have been removed and it now just says "in respect of," rather than "capable of". That problem, therefore, has now been dealt with.

The phrase "special purpose" has been defined, and motor vehicles which meet that definition are excluded from the terms of the prohibition.

It is also provided that where the manufacturer of the body of the vehicle, or the special purpose equipment, is a different manufacturer from that of the chassis, that does not bring the dealers back into the application of the prohibition. That sort of transaction is excluded from the general provision in the bill.

Your committee had a chance to look at that, and felt that it went so far towards meeting the objections and keeping the legislation, particularly, from prohibiting something for the dealers and the leasing firms other than banks who do not deal in that sort of equipment, that it struck us as being a rather ridiculous situation that you should cover something for the purpose of assuring the competitive situation of dealers, and prohibit the banks from dealing with it where the dealers do not operate in that area. We indicated that we are satisfied with that but we had an amendment that we could have proposed.

There is one further consideration left, and this is the foreign currency cash reserves of 3 per cent that are required on such deposits if they are owned by a resident of Canada, and are deposited in a Canadian bank. Originally, in the white paper, and in Bills C-57, C-15 and C-14, this particular clause referred to a 3 per cent cash reserve in foreign currency deposits used mostly in Canada. That meant the matter of residence was not a factor—it was just any person from anywhere in the world who might have these foreign currency deposits in Canada—and the bank would have to pay a 3 per cent non-interest cash reserve to the Bank of Canada in respect of those deposits.

When we had Mr. Bouey, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and Mr. Kennett, the Inspector General of Banks, before us, they both agreed. As a matter of fact, Mr. Kennett said very openly that he was not fully informed as to the competitive disadvantage that was created by the provision of this reserve, because you have the near banks, like trust companies and the financial corporations of foreign banks, able to compete in that field of foreign currency deposits, and they could afford to pay more in the way of interest on those deposits than the Canadian banks could pay, and therefore they acknowledged there was a competitive disadvantage.

What they did was drop the words "used domestically," and they dropped the identification of the deposits with any person outside of Canada, and they simply referred to a 3 per cent cash reserve on foreign currency deposits owned by residents of Canada and in a bank in Canada. We tried to point out that there was the same competitive disadvantage, because the trust companies are engaging in that field of operation, and they do not have to provide the 3 per cent cash reserve. Remember, that cash reserve is non-interest bearing, and therefore the rate that the banks could pay on such deposits would be less than if you did not have that 3 per cent requirement.

There was another factor. We had evidence adduced before us which showed that, for instance, at the present time the foreign currency deposits in Canada owned by residents of Canada in banks in Canada amount to about $10.9 billion, and $8.5 billion of those deposits are held in accounts where the individual account is of the order of $100,000 or, in more cases, of the order of $1 million or more, and that the owner of those accounts are money investors and speculators, and that the moment the rate which that deposit would produce to them from a Canadian bank went below what they could get in the United Kingdom, or anywhere in Europe and we were told they have facilities for the quick shifting of money from one country to the other they would move the money out. We thought that the effect of this levy of the 3 per cent cash reserve of foreign currency was simply to have the depositors and owners of that money move it out of the country.

The only suggestion that was made to us, when the minister was before us, was, "Well, they cannot go to the United States, because they have just brought in a law there where the levy goes up to 8 per cent." The answer is that there are a lot of other places in the world where there are money markets. Secondly, the trust companies and foreign banks are operating in that field.

Then it was suggested, "We require the banks to pay a cash reserve on Canadian currency deposits. Therefore we should also require them to pay a cash reserve on foreign currency deposits in Canada owned by Canadians." I would say that in the committee it appeared obvious that there is no parallel in that situation. You have the Canadian currency deposits, and cash reserves must be provided in relation to them, but if you levy the cash reserves on foreign exchange deposits you won't have the deposits.

The evidence we had before us made it quite clear that with respect to the bulk of that those who are in the money market field would be in a position to move in and out with their money and put it where it can work and produce the greatest yield. The ones who might be affected by it would be the smaller depositors.

It is significant to note that 15.7 per cent of the aggregate value of these deposits is tied up in 191,296 separate small accounts, representing 97.3 per cent of the number of accounts, whereas the $8.58 billion, or 84.3 per cent of the dollar total, held in accounts of over $100,000, most of which are $1 million or more, is held by such a small number of people who are the sophisticated ones.

I know I am taking longer than I should, but I should like to show you the growth of deposits in reserves. For instance, with respect to foreign currency, the reservable deposits at December 31, 1977, were $85 billion. The reservable deposits at October 31, 1980, were $127 billion. The statutory primary non-interest bearing reserves at December 31, 1977, were $4.8 million—that is, the statutory reserves that the banks pay. The 3 per cent reserve on foreign currency deposits, that extra on $10.9 billion, would be roughly $3 billion, and the $3 billion would become reservable and non-interest bearing, and that would amount to $90 million.

Therefore, it is difficult to accept that sophisticated money market people will maintain their foreign currency deposits in Canada, in view of the difference between what they can earn in Canada by the application of this 3 per cent cash reserve as against what they can earn in, for instance, the U.K. or some other countries. You have to look at the situation as being not Canadian currency versus some foreign currency deposits.

Canadian currency deposits are defined on a different basis. You cannot make a comparison because the foreign currency deposits in that large amount are just not going to be there. This is one of the problems we will have to wrestle with, and that is why I am going to propose, when I finish, that this bill go to committee and, since we have a deadline this week, that that committee meet sometime tomorrow with the minister to iron out this problem.

As you know, we have a procedure in the Senate for dealing with situations of this kind. As a matter of fact, in December 1979, in connection with the Income Tax Act, when the problem of taking an amended bill back to the House of Commons arose—that presented too many difficulties and interfered with too many procedures—we accepted an undertaking of the minister that at the next session of Parliament he would implement the objection which we took and change the provision in the law.

When Mr. Macdonald was the Minister of Finance, we had that situation; when Mr. Chrétien was the minister, we had that situation; when Mr. Turner was the minister, we had that situation; and when Mr. Benson was the Minister of Finance, we had that situation on many occasions. Even with the new tax legislation we had the situation where we just ran out of time. The ministers agreed with the principle of what should be done, but ran out of time in which to do it. Therefore, the committee decided it would accept an undertaking, and it reported the bills without amendment. Bill C-6 may require that procedure again. Whether that procedure is available, I do not know yet, but we will know sometime tomorrow. The Senate will have to determine its course of action depending on how the committee reports the bill.

Honourable senators, I have taken a little longer than I thought I should, but this about brings you up to date on the provisions of Bill C-6. I do not pretend that I have dealt with all the salient points. I have not developed the Canadian Payments Association which is replacing the clearing house and there are, contained in the bill, procedures which seem normal for an operation of that kind. There is a provision for a board of directors representing banks with the chairman being the member from the Bank of Canada and with the near-banks represented. There are also provisions as to how the near-banks operate on the clearing. Those procedures are just normal, expected procedures which appear regular and fair in their application, and if they are not, one has to rely to some extent on the competence of the representative of the Bank of Canada who will be the chairman of the board.

Honourable senators, thank you for bearing with me for quite a long time. That concludes what I have to say tonight in respect of this bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, to me it is a delight at all times, even at 10 o'clock at night, to listen to my distinguished friend, Senator Hayden. He is always good; I have never heard him when he was not. Of course, he has an advantage over everyone here. He has a photographic memory, and he can see all the points, one, two, three. If he wants to switch to another part of his memory, he can see all the figures; they are all set out. For him it is a cinch; it is no problem at all. You will notice that he gets up and speaks almost without notes. I know he has many notes because of his preparation, but he does not appear to need them. It was a very remarkable, interesting exhibition that he put on tonight, and he did it so modestly.

I want you to realize, honourable senators, if you do not already, that in February of 1981, Senator Hayden will have been in the Senate for 41 years. Of that time he has spent 29 years as the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. He had been chairman of that committee for 12 years when I came here 17 years ago from the Commons.

There is no question about it: We are all one on this. I cannot remember when I sit on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce whether I am a Conservative or a Liberal, although only for the time being. Our interests seem to be the same, particularly when we are dealing with a bill such as Bill C-6, which is so complicated and difficult and which takes months and months of work. It is not that we have more brains than members of the House of Commons—

An Hon. Senator: We do.

Senator Walker: I did not say that. We have pre-studies of complex bills such as C-6 as soon as they have received first reading in the House of Commons. The result is that most of the amendments that my friend spoke of so well tonight originated in the Senate. This is the way with the difficult bills that come to us. The Bank Act is a most complex piece of legislation and so is the Bankruptcy Act. What would Parliament do without the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce? The Criminal Code always comes to us, and we are the ones who make the amendments and do the work. The same comment applies to the Canada Business Corporations Act. Those are four very complex acts. We get along beautifully with the House of Commons because they are pleased to let us do the work, and they join with us in taking all the credit which they feel, of course, they deserve. They are nice people over there. Most of us, at one time or another, were members there. There is no point in our blowing our own horns because we do not have to be elected, but I often wonder if the public realizes that, for instance, in this house there are five provincial premiers of yesteryear.

We have, of course, my old friend in the corner from New Brunswick, Senator Robichaud; Senator Smith, a former Premier of Nova Scotia; Senator Manning, a former Premier of Alberta; Senator Hicks, a former Premier of Nova Scotia, and of course the great and mighty former Premier Roblin of Manitoba, who is making such a great contribution to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Does the public realize, when they see the good work that the Senate does—and this is an exhibition tonight of the fruits of that work—that over 20 of us are Her Majesty's Privy Councillors? To be that, you either have to have been a member of the cabinet—and most of us who are Privy Councillors were members of the dominion cabinet—or you have to be lucky enough to have been a Provincial Premier at the time of Canada's Centenary, in which event it was just thrown in.

Bill C-6 is a very complicated bill. Senator Hayden's explanation was so complete, he has saved me an enormous amount of work. I was all ready to go. I was ordered by my friend, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, to get ready, and I did get ready. I never talk back to him. But as things turn out, my friend Senator Hayden has made my task considerably less difficult.

We meet this evening under very unusual circumstances. Our banking committee commenced consideration of the amending of the Bank Act in anticipation of the fact that it had to be renewed in 1977. If I am not mistaken, we started consideration back in 1975—

Senator Hayden: The fall of 1976. The white paper came out in August of 1976.

Senator Walker: Yes. So we have been working on amending the Bank Act for four years. And, of course, as honourable senators know, we have had four different versions of the bill. Each time it has been honed and improved upon, and finally tonight we have what could almost be called perfection—so much so that all members of the committee are agreed on nearly all its terms. Most of the amendments, of course, have come not from the House of Commons but from the Senate. In saying that, I am not in any way depreciating the members of the House of Commons. They have to spend a lot of their time with their constituents, and while they are with their constituents we are here working—and we enjoy it. It is just a pity that the public does not understand the whole story, as anyone who works in Parliament, whether in the House of Commons or the Senate, understands it.

I was going to talk about a great many details tonight, but that is now no longer necessary. I do want to talk for just a moment about the personnel of the committee. We had on the committee a former Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Connolly—a tremendous man, a man of great ability; Senator Barrow, who would make a good head of the committee some day; my old friend Senator McIlraith, with whom I went to school over 50 years ago—or is it 60 years ago—

Senator Smith: A long time ago, anyway.

Senator Walker: He is a great friend, and someone who knows politics inside and out. For many years he was a member of the dominion cabinet—as far back as Mackenzie King, if I am not mistaken.

Senator McIlraith: No, I was not in cabinet then.

Senator Roblin: You should have been.

Senator Walker: We had Senator Dan Lang, and we had Senator Cook, one of the most honest men produced in the Province of Newfoundland, and a very distinguished man, whose father before him was one of Her Majesty's Privy Councillors and also a Knight of the Realm. We had Senator Buckwold of Saskatchewan and Senator Lafond, and many, many others. Then there was Senator Molson, probably one of Canada's greatest businessmen, and the leader of the great independent party in the Senate, made up of himself, himself and himself. But what a power he is, wherever he is, and how he participates with Liberals and Conservatives—and he doesn't seem to make very much distinction as to who is who.

The Bank Act is subject to a sunset clause. That seemed an odd term to me. I tried to figure out why they call it that. I do not know where it originated, unless it assumes that the sun sets and it is always going to rise again. In any event, it has not become a parliamentary phrase.

So this Bank Act will have the sun set on it every 10 years, and then it is going to rise again. It takes an awful long time on occasion. The sun was supposed to rise on the present one back in 1977, and here we are in 1980 and we are only now getting ready for it.

We have the excuse, of course, that elections have intervened; but it would be a tragedy if there were a further delay beyond November 30 next.

I am not going to go into the bill in depth, but I would like to refer briefly to the incorporation of new banks. This is very, very important.

I regarded with suspicion the whole proposition of allowing foreign banks into Canada. The Americans are, of course, so able in whatever they do, I wondered what they might do in the banking field in Canada. The creation of the new banks seems to be working out nicely. There is set down a very strict procedure which they must go through. Under the new amendment worked out by the Senate, the regular procedure is provided whereby letters patent can be applied for, to enable the applicant to use the designation "bank," after which it is then subject to the Canadian banking legislation in the same way as a Canadian bank.

The Senate is responsible for much of what is contained in this legislation. Under Bill C-6, public hearings must be held by the financial institution applying to become a bank. It is important that that should be so, and it is important that any such institution should have to apply for letters patent. It is also important, I suggest, that such institutions do not get a licence for a period of more than one year and that they have to go back each year for the renewal of that licence. So if there is any jiggery-pokery going on, or anything too slick or wrong, or anything in contravention of the act or in contravention of good business practices, the particular bank can be cut out. After five years of renewing their licences annually, the licence term is then extended to three years.

So I do not think we need to worry about foreign banks operating in Canada. They are going to be well supervised, and I am sure most of them mean well.

If I appear to pause here, it is only so that I can pass over those matters that have been dealt with so brilliantly by Senator Hayden.

Another amendment which has been thoroughly thrashed out in our committee and to which I would like to refer for a moment can be found in clause 178(6) at page 190 of Bill C-6. This makes provision for claims by agricultural producer groups, such as the Canadian Agricultural Federation and the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, to have priority to the rights of the banks in respect of all agricultural products. This is important and is something we should have done for the farmers long ago.

There is a further amendment to which I would have liked to refer relating to financial leasings for household effects, but it was dealt with by my friend.

A further amendment pertains to the financial leasing of automobiles. That, too, was dealt with by my friend. Clause 193 of the bill prevents banks from engaging directly in financial leasing of motor vehicles holding a permit to be used on public highways with a gross weight of less than 46,000 pounds. On the face of it, I wonder whether that is being fair to the banks, but I am not going to make any further comment on it at this time. In any event, nobody can say that it is not fair to those who are in the habit of financing the leasing of motor vehicles.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I should like to say that this bill has been tidied up enormously, and many parts of it would not be recognized in the original bill, Bill C-57, which was introduced in 1976.

We also must agree that the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which is a counterpart of our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, is open to sincere congratulations for the contributions which it has made. It is nice to be associated with the members of that committee so that they can realize, as they so often must do, what an able body the Senate of Canada is.

I agree with my learned friend, Senator Hayden, that the time of this house would be saved by sending this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce tomorrow, where honourable senators can ask any questions they might have. I agree with Senator Frith, who is turning out to be a good Deputy Leader of the Government, that we should co-operate in getting this bill through committee tomorrow so that it can be reported back to the house for final approval and thus avoid any slip at this particular time.

Honourable senators, that is my small, humble and modest contribution to this debate, but may I take this opportunity to say this: Never underestimate the contribution that each of you is making to the Government of Canada by your enthusiastic participation in the work of the Senate. You are doing a wonderful job. All one has to do is read Senate Hansard and the proceedings of our committees to understand the fantastic amount of good, detailed and hard work carried out by the eight important Senate committees. It is a magnificent contribution to Canada. While wrestling with the present constitutional problem, never hesitate to show your pride in being senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-6, intituled: "An Act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof", cited as the "Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, (1980)" has, in obedience to the order of reference of April 29, 1980, examined the subject-matter of the said Bill, and for the reasons hereinafter mentioned, now reports as follows:

1. GENERAL INTRODUCTION

On July 17, 1980 your Committee presented its Interim Report on Bill C-6 "Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1980". The report was based on an extensive study of the subject-matter of the Bill which lasted 2½ months. As pointed out at page 15:8 of the Interim Report, during the course of your Committee's study of Bill C-6, specifically on the 20th of June 1980, the Minister provided the Chairman of the Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with the text of ten proposed amendments to the Bill. Further, in the ensuing months the Government developed additional amendments. Your Committee was not provided with this material, either before or after its study of Bill C-6. It is apparent from an examination of the Bill as reprinted and published on October 6th, 1980, that a number of these amendments have found their way into the proposed legislation.

The exposure which this Committee has had to the banking legislation in this decennial review has been extremely thorough. One would have thought that the Government would have welcomed the opportunity to assess the views of a Committee, which, over a period of four years, has been called upon to entertain and consider the competing attitudes and opinion of a broad segment of society interested in the banking legislation. A word by way of details as to the activities of your Committee is warranted.

In the first place, in response to the White Paper and successive Bills, your Committee has prepared and delivered four reports as follows:

(a) On June 28, 1977, in response to the White Paper on Canadian Banking Legislation, your Committee tabled its report which includes 37 recommendations or groups of recommendations:

(b) On March 7th, 1979, in response to Bill C-15 (Bill C-57 of the previous Session), your Committee tabled its report which included 51 recommendations;

(c) On December 5th, 1979, in response to Bill C-14, your Committee tabled its report which included 13 recommendations, and

(d) On July 16th, 1980, in response to Bill C-6, your Committee tabled its report which included 5 principal recommendations.

During the evidentiary phases leading up to the preparation and publication of these reports, the membership of your Committee remained essentially unchanged and thus provided a continuity of study of the details of the legislation.

In connection with your Committee's examination and consideration of the subject-matter of Bill C-6 your Committee had the benefit of the services of Mr. John F. Lewis, C.A. Financial Consultant, retired partner of Thorne, Riddell, Chartered Accountants, as adviser to the Committee and David W. Scott, Q.C., of the firm of Scott & Aylen, as its Counsel. The same advisers assisted your Committee in connection with the study and reporting on the White Paper, Bill C-57, Bill C-15, Bill C-14 and Bill C-6.

While a numerical analysis of recommendations reviewed by the Government and accepted or rejected may have a limited purpose, it does serve to illustrate the depth of understanding which your Committee has had the privilege of developing in respect of the banking legislation as a result of the number of helpful witnesses who appeared before it. Following upon your Committee's study and report on the subject-matter of the White Paper, Bill C-15 reflected 24 amendments proposed by our Committee. In Bill C-14, approximately 35 of your Committees recommendations were accepted. This contribution to the substantive character of the banking legislation, as it has developed through successive Bills, is a direct outgrowth of the quality of the evidence which your Committee has heard in the four years which it has devoted to its study of the subject. The recommendations referred to in this paragraph are apart altogether from the Committees study, and that of its advisors, of numerous technical amendments and the draft regulations published from time to time. In this period of time your Committee has heard extensive and detailed evidence, over 78 separate hearing days, from in excess of 50 individuals and groups as follows:

Federation of Automobile Dealer Associations of Canada
Association of Canadian Financial Corporations
Canadian Cattlemen's Association
Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada
Canadian Council of Churches
Canadian Automotive Leasing Association
Trust Companies Association of Canada
Canadian Bankers' Association
Montreal City and District Savings Bank
Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants
Office of the Inspector General of Banks
Canadian Federation of Agriculture
Citicorp Canada Limited
Montreal Trust Company
Royal Trust Company of Canada
Victoria and Grey Trust
Northland Bank
BankAmerica Corporation
Barclays Corporation
Barclays Canada Limited
The Banking Federation of the European Economic Community
Hong Kong Bank Group
Royal Bank of Canada
J.P. Morgan of Canada Limited
The Canadian Cooperative Credit Society Limited
Fédération du Québec des Caisses Populaires Desjardins
Canadian Association of Data Processing Service Organizations Investment Dealers Association
Stock Exchanges of Montreal, Toronto, Alberta and Vancouver
Governor of the Bank of Canada
Canadian General Electric Company Limited
The Hamilton Group Limited
Consumers Association of Canada
National Association of Canadian Credit Unions
Toronto-Dominion Bank
Midland Financial Services Limited
British Bankers' Association
Grindlays Bank Limited
The Continental Bank Limited
The Bank of Nova Scotia

This list covers some of the organizations represented by witnesses who appeared and gave evidence before your Committee. It does not include those numerous organizations which submitted briefs, but did not personally appear. The assessment of this body of evidence by your Committee has given its membership a unique opportunity to evaluate the competing interests as work in the administration of the banking system, and by such evaluation to make recommendations which, based on past experience, it would appear the Government has recognized as being in the public interest. In the light of this background it is to say the least unexpected that the Government would choose to introduce substantive amendments, the significant ones of which are at odds with the philosophy underlying the White Paper, and treat them as being etched in stone before they have been exposed to the scrutiny of your Committee. In spite of the limitations which the Government's approach places upon your Committee, it nonetheless intends to deal with some of the most recent amendments in the following pages.

2. SUMMARY OF LEGISLATION

Because the process of this decennial revision of the Bank Act has been spread over a period of approximately four years including the publication of a White Paper and separate bills to four sessions of Parliament, it might be of some assistance to summarize again for the reader the content of the legislation culminating in Bill C-6.

Bill C-6 contains not only an amended Bank Act and the new Canadian Payments Association Act, but also important amendments to other related Acts, as follows:

PART I /The Bank Act (pages 1 to 348 of Bill C-6)

PART II Amendments to the Quebec Savings Banks Act (pages 349 to 419 of Bill C-6).

PART III Amendments to the Bank of Canada Act (pages 420 to 426 of Bill C-6).

PART IV An Act to establish the Canadian Payments Association (pages 427 to 444 of Bill C-6).

PART V Related and Consequential Amendments to other legislation (pages 445 to 463 of Bill C-6).

It also should be noted that Part I of Bill C-6, being the new Bank Act contains approximately four hundred provisions which are based on equivalent provisions of the Canadian Business Corporations Act.

The main changes contemplated in this decennial review of the banking system might be summarized as follows:

1. Changes and reduction in primary cash reserves required to be provided by Canadian banks;

2. Entry of new banks into the banking system in Canada either by Special Act of Parliament or by Letters Patent;

3. Entry and control of and conditions for the operation in Canada of foreign bank subsidiaries incorporated under the new Bank Act;

4. Further delineation of specific business power of banks;

5. Changes in the corporate structure of banks;

6. Provisions requiring or permitting banks to conduct certain types of undertakings, i.e. leasing, factoring, mortgage lending, venture capital investing — through subsidiaries;

7. Establishment by a Special Act of Parliament of the Canadian Payments Association which would include banks and near-banks in the evolving national electronic payments system for clearing and settlement purposes;

8. Amendments to the Quebec Savings Banks Act, the Bank of Canada Act and other related legislation.

Since the issuance of the White Paper in 1976, your Committee has made many recommendations for improvements in the proposed legislation, and many of these recommendations have been accepted by the Government as evidenced in the Amendments made in the successive Bills C-15, C-14, C-6 and C-6 as amended, respectively.

Some of the more important amendments to the Bank Act which fall into this category include the following:

The Bank Act

1. Reduction of the primary reserves from 15% to 10% on demand deposits and from 4% to 3% on notice deposits.

2. Shortening of the phasing-in period for the reduction in reserves.

3. Establishment of a form of public review for the incorporation of new banks.

4. Exemption of cattle from "Section 88" security and establishing a reasonable indexing of the amount of claims of a grower or producer of products of agriculture which have priority under Section 88 (new Section 176).

5. Conducting of factoring and leasing activities by banks through subsidiaries.

6. Licensing of foreign bank subsidiaries and the grandfathering of certain assets owned by a foreign bank subsidiary at the time of incorporation as a bank.

7. Improvement in the proposed restrictions concerning the eligibility of officers of a bank to become directors of the bank or of other corporations.

8. Modification of the restrictions on data processing and storage of information outside of Canada.

9. Incorporation in the Bank Act of provisions governing the cost borrowing.

Canadian Payments Association Act

Your Committee made many recommendations concerning the proposals in the White Paper for the Canadian Payments Association. The White Paper had proposed that near-banks, trust companies and credit unions who become clearing members of the Association should maintain interest-free cash reserves at the Bank of Canada in the same manner as chartered banks. Your Committee recommended against the establishment of such reserves other than the amount necessary for clearing purposes. The proposed legislation in Bills C-15, C-14 and C-6 does not require near-bank clearing members to put up such interest-free reserves.

Several other recommendations by your Committee have been incorporated in the proposed legislation.

Quebec Savings Banks Act

The White Paper had proposed that all clearing members of the Canadian Payments Association would be required to maintain interest-free reserves at the Bank of Canada. This would have meant a change in the nature of the reserves presently required of the Montreal City & District Savings Bank, with a resultant material loss of revenue to it. Your Committee recommended against any increase in the nature or rate of reserves for this bank which presently are 5% of deposits in cash reserves and 15% in secondary reserves. This principle has been carried through in the legislation with no change in reserve requirements. Generally, in accordance with your Committee's recommendations, the lending powers and some other powers of the bank have been broadened, the provisions of the Act have been brought in line with those of the Canada Business Corporations Act, and the bank may open branches anywhere in Canada instead of being restricted to the Province of Quebec.

Canada Business Corporations Act

Your Committee studied the many proposed amendments to the Bank Act which tend to bring the Bank Act in line with the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act. Your Committee made a number of recommendations for improvements in these amendments, several of which have been implemented in the proposed legislation.

Included in these amendments are improvements in financial disclosures to shareholders and to the public, provision for consolidated financial statements, and more detailed provisions concerning the appointment and responsibilities of auditors.

Regulations

In conjunction with the issuance of Bill C-15, the Minister tabled a number of draft proposed regulations. Your Committee studied these draft regulations and made several recommendations for amendments thereto. Redrafts of these regulations have not been issued. Further, a first draft of a number of required regulations have not been issued as yet.

Your Committee trusts that the regulations in their final form will be submitted to your Committee by the Minister before publication in the Canada Gazette. Section 315 of the proposed Bank Act contemplates the making of regulations by the Governor in Council and by the Minister and the publication thereof in the Canada Gazette at least 60 days before their effective date. The section further provides for a reasonable opportunity for interested persons to make representations with respect thereto.

Your Committee believes that many matters of a substantive nature are being dealt with by regulations. Thus it should be given the opportunity to assess and report upon them before they are finalized and published.

3. CONTENTS OF THE REPORT

As indicated in the preceeding section your Committee in its earlier reports has dealt with a vast number of provisions of the Bill, many of which have been amended upon consideration of the evidence heard by your Committee. Others have not resulted in amendments, nor has there been any rationale for resisting amendment where amendment is clearly indicated. Two situations bear repeating as illustrations of unexplained lack of reaction to a situation which clearly calls for change.

(a) Ownership of Banks' shares by Provincial Governments.

(b) Extension of exemption from "Section 88" Security to Agricultural Products.

This report reviews your Committee's previous recommendations in the above matters, but in the interests of expediting the passage of the new Bank Act, no recommendations are made in connection with them at this time.

This report also summarizes your Committee's opinion concerning the two following amendments to the legislation proposed by the Minister. However, also in view of time constraints arising from the desire and willingness of your Committee to avoid any delay in the passage of this banking legislation, your Committee does not make specific recommendations for further amendments concerning the following two matters:

(c) Elimination of a charge or penalty for prepayment of individual loans.

While not making a specific recommendation for amendment at this particular time concerning the provisions in Bill C-6 for the limitation or elimination of a penalty charge for prepayment of individual loans, this report does contain your Committee's comments on this aspect of the proposed legislation.

(d) Financial Leasing of Motor Vehicles

Because your Committee approves of the amendments moved in the House of Commons by the Minister of State (Finance), the Honourable Pierre Bussières, on November 7, 1980, which was based on your Committee's assessment of the problems involved by the previous amendment included in Bill C-6 as amended and reported on October 6, 1980, by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, your Committee has no further recommendation to make in this matter at this time.

(e) Reserves on Foreign Currency Deposits

The only recommendation which your Committee makes in this report is that the proposal that banks be required to maintain reserves on foreign currency deposits of Canadian residents with branches of a bank in Canada or with offices in Canada of subsidiaries of a bank (Subclauses 208(1)(g) and 208(7) of Bill C-6) be eliminated.

Your Committee's views, as outlined in this report, are that these proposed reserves are not in the interests of the Canadian public.

Your Committee's recommendation in this connection is as follows:

RECOMMENDATION:

YOUR COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS THAT A BANK NOT BE REQUIRED TO MAINTAIN EITHER A PRIMARY OR SECONDARY RESERVE ON SUCH OF ITS DEPOSIT LIABILITIES AS ARE FOREIGN CURRENCY DEPOSITS OF RESIDENTS OF CANADA WITH BRANCHES OF THE BANK IN CANADA OR WITH OFFICES IN CANADA OF SUBSIDIARIES OF THE BANK, AS PROPOSED BY BILL C-6 IN SUB-SECTION 208 (1)(g) OF THE PROPOSED NEW BANK ACT, THAT BILL C-6 BE AMENDED AS FOLLOWS:

CLAUSE 2:

STRIKE OUT LINES 35 TO 40 INCLUSIVE, ON PAGE 228, AND SUBSTITUTE THE FOLLOWING THEREFOR:

"DOLLARS".

STRIKE OUT LINES 33 TO 38 INCLUSIVE, ON PAGE 230, AND SUBSTITUTE THE FOLLOWING THEREFOR:

"ITS DEPOSIT LIABILITIES AS ARE CANADIAN CURRENCY DEPOSIT LIABILITIES."

The reasons for the above recommendation by your committee are presented later in this report.

4. OWNERSHIP OF BANKS' SHARES BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

The present Bill and its predecessor Bills proposed that the prohibition under the existing legislation with respect to the ownership of the capital stock in chartered banks by Governments be removed and that Provincial Governments be allowed to hold and vote capital stock of Chartered Banks up to 25% of the shares of a new Bank with such shareholdings being reduced to 10% within ten years. Your Committee has rejected this proposed amendment from the stage of the White Paper, and specifically in its report on Bill C-15, tabled on the 7th of March 1979, it observed as follows at page 30:37:

"In its report on the White Paper your Committee expressed its opposition to this proposal. Based on representations made to it at the time of its review of the White Paper it concluded that it is neither necessary nor advisable specifically for Provincial Governments to acquire voting stock in return for financial assistance, and further that the credit policy of the bank might be influenced or weakened by the presence of Government."

The case of the undesirability of equity participation by Provincial Governments in chartered banks is strong. No explanation has been given in support of this change and therefore your Committee has no cause to alter its views expressed consistently throughout its various reports on this proposal.

5. EXTENSION OF EXEMPTION FROM "SECTION 88" SECURITY TO AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

In its report on Bill C-6 dated July 16, 1980, in dealing with the exemption of cattle from "Section 88" security, your Committee observed the following at page 15:17:

"Suggestions for change proposed by the Cattlemens' Association contemplate expanding the definition of priority items under Clause 178 to include all products of agriculture. This would have the effect of including livestock. To protect the cattlemen it is not necessary that such a broad coverage be given for other than the cattlemen. Your Committee has received no evidence for the need for protection of such breadth and extending the protection to all products of agriculture is thus unreasonable and unnecessary."

Notwithstanding this recommendation, no change has been made in the proposed legislation. What is required is that the word "cattle" be substituted for the words "products of agriculture". This has not been done, nor has there been any explanation as to why it has not been done.

However, your Committee does not wish to make any further recommendation in this matter due to a desire to avoid further delay in the passage of the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1980.

6. PREPAYMENT OF LOANS

Bill C-6 contains, for the first time, a restriction on the right of the Banks to recover their costs on prepaid personal loans under $50,000. This provision flows from an amendment to subclause 174 of the Bill as follows:

(5) "No bank shall in Canada make a loan to an individual the terms of which prohibit prepayment of the loan or any installment thereon before its due date but this sub-section does not apply to a loan

(a) that is secured by a mortgage on real property; or

(b) the principal amount of which is in excess of $50,000 or such greater amount as is prescribed by the regulations."

The related prohibition with respect to the recovery of costs is contained in subclause 202(8)(f) of the Bill. This provision contemplates that the Minister may make regulations:

"prohibiting the imposition of any charge or penalty referred to in this Section or providing that such charge or penalty, if imposed, shall not exceed a prescribed amount."

Witnesses appearing before your Committee have been pointedly critical of these provisions. There can be no complaint, and none is made, with respect to the prohibition against covenants which would enjoin prepayment of personal loans. It is with respect to the related provision in subclause 202, which effectively leaves it to the Minister to decide whether or not the lenders costs in prepayment situations can be recovered, which is complained of. There are two criticisms of this provision. In the first place this represents another example of the undesirable recent development by which the Government relegates to the regulatory process substantive provisions which ought to be included in the Statute proper. Here the Minister may make regulations either prohibiting entirely the collection of administrative costs in a prepayment situation, or alternatively prescribing the amount which may be charged. Your Committee has been advised that the Minister in fact intends to promulgate regulations which would prohibit entirely the imposition of any charge in personal loan prepayment situations. The complete prohibition of charges of any kind in respect of prepayment of personal loans is a substantive matter which, if it is regarded as desirable, ought to be included in the Statute itself. The rationale for making this a matter for regulation would appear to be to enable the Minister to effect substantive change in the absence of Parliamentary scrutiny.

The second criticism is that there is absolutely no rational foundation for prohibiting a lending institution from levying charges, consisting of its reasonable costs, in prepayment situation. The amount of, or formula for calculating the charge may be one thing, the right to assess charges amounting to the cost associated with writing a prepayable loan surely is beyond question. No effort is made on the part of the Government to justify this provision notwithstanding that it negatives a conventional and legitimate method of doing business. It is not without interest to note that the Government of Canada itself imposes a charge or penalty in respect of the encashing of Canada Savings Bonds before maturity. In an appearance before your Committee Mr. Gordon Bell, the President and Chief Executive Officer of the Bank of Nova Scotia, observed as follows:

"We should also point out that the Government of Canada recognizes the existence of front end and administrative costs in designing their Canada Savings Bond program. In the most recent Canada Savings Bond campaign, no interest will be paid on funds redeemed before December 31, 1980, in effect, a penalty . . . and in addition . . . interest will be paid only for every full month a bond is held by a customer. We feel that these are reasonable rules and that the Government of Canada is perfectly correct that it intends to recover its costs before a bond holder cashes in his investment. But we see no reason why similar principles should not also cover the banks' consumer lending activities."

What is the rationale for prohibiting such a conventional method of doing business on the part of the banks when the Government itself adopts similar methods?

There can be no doubt the charges associated with prepayment of loans and representing the cost of booking the loan will in fact be collected by the banks. In the face of a prohibition such as that contained in sub-Clause 202(8)(f), the banks will have no alternative but to effect collection of such costs from its general body of customers in some other form. In the course of describing a variety of effects that this prohibition will have on the operations of the banks Mr. Bell in his evidence observed:

"The second solution would be to increase the consumer lending rate structure. I think we would all agree that that is negative. Apart from the front end cost we described earlier, the elimination of the penalty charges would, in a volatile interest rate environment, result in increased funding cost that would not occur to the same extent if penalty charges could be applied to prepaid contracts. Both kinds of cost would be reflected in higher rates across the board. These rates would apply to all consumers, even those who do not exercise their option to prepay or, to put it in other words, those who do not break their contracts."

Since the costs are attributable to a desire on the part of a single customer to prepay a loan, it would appear unreasonable to reallocate the charges onto other customers who ought not to be affected by prepayment by another customer.

Your Committee does not make specific recommendations for amendments to those subclauses in the Bill at this time due to a desire not to delay the passage of this banking legislation. Your Committee trusts that its comments will be taken into account when the regulations are drafted.

7. FINANCIAL LEASING OF MOTOR VEHICLES

In its Interim Report on the subject-matter of Bill C-6 dated July 17, 1980, your Committee included an exhaustive analysis of the financial leasing provisions of the Bill including the history of the development of the proposed statutory language, and also including an analysis of the respective positions of the banking community and the community of automobile dealers in the controversial area of motor vehicle leasing.

The scheme as it appeared in Bill C-6 originally, (in keeping with the philosophy carried through successive Bills from the White Paper), was incorporated in Clauses 173(1)(j) and 193(1). Clause 173(1)(j) provided that the financial leasing activities of a Bank must be conducted through a subsidiary and Clause 193(1) provided, inter alia, that a Bank leasing corporation would be limited in its activities by reason of a prohibition preventing it from directing its customers, or potential customers, to particular dealers in the leased property.

As pointed out in your Committee's Interim Report, Bill C-6 was met by a vigorous lobby on the part of the Federation of Automobile Dealers Association (FADA), and the Canadian Automotive Leasing Association (CALA). The initial position of these organizations was that the banking community should be kept out of motor vehicle leasing entirely. By motor vehicle leasing these groups meant leasing of automobiles and trucks which would ordinarily be sold through conventional automobile dealers. In response the banks conceded, with certain reservations, that they need not engage in financial leasing on a one to one basis, but that they should be permitted to become involved in fleet leasing of passenger cars and unrestrained leasing of motor vehicles other than passenger cars, i.e. trucks, etc.

In evidence before your Committee at the time that Bill C-6 was originally tabled, and in negotiations which took place privately between the banking community and the automobile dealership community, efforts were made to draw a line for appropriate or inappropriate leasing activities of banks in terms of the so-called gross vehicle weight (GVW) of the vehicle involved. The dealers took the position that the banks should not be involved in any leasing of vehicles which weighed less than 46,000 pounds GVW. Apart altogether from the issue of fleet leasing and the financing of the leasing activities of small dealers in respect of individual passenger cars, the banks adopted the position that the appropriate demarcation line for vehicle weight was 16,000 pounds GVW. Your Committee in its Interim Report on Bill C-6 recommended as follows:

"... that the proposed language of sub-clause 1 of Clause 193 be rejected in favour of an amendment to prohibit a bank from having a leasing subsidiary that leases motor vehicles having a gross vehicle weight, or, in the case of tractor trailer combinations, a gross combination weight, of at least 16,000 pounds GVW; and further prohibits such leasing subsidiary from fleet leasing of vehicles except where the value of the motor vehicle lease is $250,000 or more in a single transaction, or the quantity of vehicles leased is at least 25 in number."

In an amendment to Bill C-6 which was tabled at or about the time of your Committee's Interim Report, the Government altered the language of subclause 193(1) to prohibit a bank from entering into a lease agreement in respect of motor vehicles where the motor vehicles are "capable of being licensed for operation on a public highway and have a gross vehicle weight of less than 21 metric tonnes" (i.e. 46,000 pounds GVW). As appears from statistics which were made available to your Committee it is clear that more than 95% of all of the leasing of trucks done by both the members of FADA and of CALA falls in the area of the weight range of less than 16,000 pounds GVW. It is obvious from the evidence of the dealer witnesses that the real object of the pressure which they brought to bear on the Government was to keep the banks out of motor vehicle leasing entirely, whether or not there is a significant potential for conflict or competition with or from the banks in the weight ranges that are being spoken of. The contradiction lies in the argument advanced by the dealers that, while they are only seeking to protect that aspect of the business which would ordinarily be carried on by a dealer, the only method of effecting such protection is to establish a weight limitation of 46,000 pounds GVW.

The evidence which your Committee has received makes it clear that in the vehicle weight, lying below 46,000 pounds GVW, there are a vast number of vehicles, and potential commercial transactions, which would not be available from or offered by dealers. Thus, there is a need to engage in the financial leasing of a variety of commercial buses, ambulances, firefighting equipment, and other such specialty vehicles which are not sold through conventional automobile dealerships and which at the same time lie below 46,000 pounds GVW. It was clear therefore that by adopting the 46,000 pounds GVW weight limitation for the entry of banks into financial leasing, the Government would have effectively prohibited banks from engaging in the financial leasing of a wide variety of vehicles which are capable of being licensed for operation on a public highway, and yet in the leasing business of which the automobile dealers do not normally engage. It is submitted that this situation is unacceptable. The purpose of this legislation is to serve the public, not to frustrate it.

How can this anomaly be corrected? During the course of its recent study of the Bill, your Committee reviewed in detail its deficiencies with the Minister. The problem of specialty vehicles was discussed at length. In the result, on Friday, the 5th of November, 1980, the Minister tabled certain amendments to the Leasing clauses of the Bill. The amendments read as follows:

"That Bill C-6 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 46 to 48 at page 209 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"motor vehicle having a gross vehicle"; and

(b) by striking out line 2 at page 211 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"are situated;

"motor vehicle" means a motorized vehicle designed to be used primarily on a public highway for the transportation of persons or things but does not include

(a) any fire engine, bus, ambulance or utility truck; or

(b) any other special purpose motorized vehicle that contains special features that make it suitable for a specific purpose and that is manufactured by a person other than the vehicle manufacturer who manufactured the basic chassis."

The above amendments were agreed to by the House of Commons and are now included in the amended Bill.

The concept underlying these amendments is to provide a definition of "motor vehicle" which would exclude those classes of motor vehicle which represent a class of business not normally dealt in by automobile dealers. Your Committee approves of the concept. In addition your Committee has reviewed the regulations which are referred to in subclause 193(1), and more specifically the regulations relating to the gross vehicle weight of tractor trailers and finds these regulations to be acceptable.

In the interest therefore of protecting the legitimate concerns of FADA and CALA, while at the same time ensuring that the public need for financial leasing services for specialized vehicles is not frustrated, your Committee is in favour of supporting the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Minister under date of November 5, 1980, as herein referred to.

8. RESERVES ON FOREIGN CURRENCY DEPOSITS

As a result of the 1976 White Paper on banking, Bill C-15, which was introduced in November 1978, proposed that banks be required to maintain primary and secondary reserves of three percent of their foreign currency deposits used domestically. As a result of its study and hearings on this Bill C-15, your Committee concluded that the imposition of this 3% reserve would place Canadian banks at a competitive disadvantage when competing with foreign banks for foreign currency loans to borrowers in Canada. In its report on Bill C-15, your Committee recommended that Bill C-15 be amended in such a manner as to remove this disadvantage.

When the amended Bill C-14 was introduced in October 1979, the reserve section had been amended so as to have the 3% reserve apply not only to "foreign currency deposits used domestically" but to "foreign currency deposit liabilities of residents in Canada with branches of the bank in Canada or with offices in Canada of subsidiaries of the bank". This amendment, which also has been carried forward in Bill C-6, was intended to remove the competitive disadvantage of Canadian banks vis-à-vis the foreign bank competition for foreign currency loans to Canadian borrowers. There are however, some perceived difficulties even in the new amendment.

The rationale behind the imposition of reserves on foreign currency deposits by Canadian residents is indicated from the following testimony of Mr. W. A. Kennet, Inspector General of Banks when he appeared before your Committee on November 20, 1979 (Committee proceedings Issue No. 7, November 20, 1979, pages 7:38 and 7:39).

"We started from a principle, and it has given us no end of trouble but we are clinging tenaciously to the principle. The principle is that our reserve system should not work so as to encourage Canadians to hold their savings in a foreign currency.

"The fact is that under the existing reserve system, if everything else is equal, the Canadian resident putting his savings in a chartered bank in a notice or a term deposit has those savings in Canadian dollars subject to a reserve of 4%. If he puts those same dollars into a Canadian bank in a foreign currency, they are subject to no reserve whatsoever. The implication is that banks can pay a better interest on foreign currency deposits than they can on Canadian dollar deposits. That seemed to us to be an unfortunate situation.

"We have seen in some degree, the effect of this over the last few years, where in an environment where the Canadian dollar has been under pressure Canadians have begun to hold, in the form of deposits with Canadian banks, foreign currencies to the extent now of something approaching $12 billion. A few years ago it was more like $5 billion or $6 billion. So there has been a move into this kind of instrument as a form of holding savings.

"Having said that, we took a crack at it in the previous legislation, and, as a result of failure to fully understand all of the effects that were in play, we put our banks in a position which, the Senate recognized, would be an uncompetitive position in making foreign currency loans to Canadian businesses that needed them for various legitimate purposes.

"We sought another position that would preserve the competitiveness of Canadian banks, while still trying to meet this essential principle. This was another proposal to try to do that . . . ."

"With this new reserve, the large professional money manager, if, he did not like the rate he could get in Canada, he could move his deposits around anyway and put them with any bank abroad. If you regard that as a loophole, had we closed that loophole, that is what would have happened: The Canadian banks would have lost the deposit entirely. So it did not seem sensible to go that route.

The places to which they could move deposits are limited. If they move those deposits to the United States, there is now an 8% reserve on them instead of a 4% reserve. There is no incentive to move the deposits there. The deposits could, however, be moved to other countries, where they would be reserve free. That means that your funds are under a different jurisdiction. Certain Canadians might not feel good about that. The professional money manager, so long as he knows where the funds are, and knows that the situation is reasonably stable where the funds have been moved—perhaps to London—might not worry about that at all, I suppose; but certain Canadians may begin to think twice about having those deposits shifted offshore to other jurisdictions.

There may also be withholding tax implications in foreign jurisdictions that would affect the return. So there may be breaks as regards the situation. But potentially there is an avoidance route, yes. That was recognized when we made the suggestion."

The reason for proposing a 3% reserve on foreign currency deposits was also explained by Gerald K. Bouey, Governor of the Bank of Canada when he appeared before your Committee on January 24, 1979 (Committee Proceedings January 24, 1979 18:21).

"My interest in the matter really relates to the deposits booked in Canada. If you have a situation, as we have now, where there is a cash reserve requirement against Canadian dollar deposits, that will obviously cost the banks something and it does affect the rates they can pay on those deposits. When you have no non-interest-bearing cash requirements against foreign currency deposits, then the banks are able to offer a higher rate than they otherwise would have done.

"It seems very strange to me that we would put Canadian dollar deposits at a disadvantage in this country as against foreign currency deposits. In fact, other things being equal, Canadians would be able to earn more money on their foreign currency. Particularly at a time when I was worried about the Canadian dollar, that seemed to be somewhat strange. So I have been interested in equalizing that situation, putting them on the same basis. The 3% against foreign currency deposits would then be the same as 3% against Canadian dollar time deposits.

"I think the problem may have arisen in the way that it was phrased, namely "deposits for use in Canada", which then of course might include deposits booked outside the country where the banks are in competition with foreign banks. I would not want to see that happen and that is where I would agree it needs to be looked at. But I think there must be a way of equalizing the situation within Canada for deposits booked in one currency or the other."

". . . If you go down to your bank in Ottawa and ask them to open a U.S. dollar account for you, they will do that. They will not have to keep non-interest bearing cash reserves against your Canadian dollar deposit account. It is that inequality that I am anxious to see eliminated. I think that can be done.

"I believe that the provisions as presently worded are based on the concept of funds for use in Canada. Some of the funds for use in Canada may come from depositors outside Canada and in that situation we do not want to put our banks at a disadvantage against foreign banks."

Your Committee notes that one aspect of the new reserve formula which has not been given more, if any, emphasis is that the substitution of the new foreign currency reserve formula appears to result in a considerable increase in the amount of the statutory reserve requirement. Under Bill C-15, based on deposits at December 31, 1977, it was calculated that the amount of "foreign currency deposits used domestically" amounted to approximately $4.4 billion (Committee report on Bill C-15, proceedings March 7, 1979, Issue No. 30). Under Bill C-6, based on deposits at April 30, 1980, the reservable foreign currency deposits in Canadian banks of residents amounted to approximately $10.5 billion. At the 3% rate, the aggregate reserve requirement for all banks would thus be increased by more than $183 million under the new formula. Part of this increase, of course, is caused by the growth in foreign currency deposits held by Canadian residents.

Your Committee has received and studied evidence and opinions which indicated that the proposed 3% reserve against foreign currency deposits of Canadian residents booked in Canada could have consequences which would be against the interests of Canadian resident businesses and individuals, would increase the difficulties of the Bank of Canada in maintaining the relative strength of the Canadian dollar, and indeed might result in a loss of income tax revenue to Canada.

It is your Committee's opinion that the imposition of this 3% reserve could result in a large proportion of the dollar amount of Canadian resident foreign currency deposits being moved out of Canada in order to obtain better interest rates elsewhere. This out-flow of funds would include the larger deposits which are held by the more sophisticated depositors and which represent more than 85% of these deposits.

The following summary, based on the information provided by the Canadian Bankers' Association when it appeared before your Committee on October 16, 1978, shows the breakdown of these deposits, converted into Canadian funds. (Appendix A)

(As at April 30, 1980)	Number of Accounts	%	Value (Can $ Millions)	%
Personal savings and current accounts	155,800	81.4	$ 883	8.4
Personal and non-personal certificates of deposit less than $100,000 each	30,345	15.9	783	7.3
	186,145	97.3	1,666	15.7
Over $100,000 each	5,151	2.7	8,583	84.3
	191,296	100.0%	10,490	100.0%

From the above, it can be seen that only 15.7% of the aggregate value is tied up in 191,296 separate smaller accounts which represent 97.3% of the number of accounts, whereas $8.58 billion or 84.3% of the dollar total is held in the larger over $100,000 accounts, most of which are accounts of $1 million and over.

This latter group are the more knowledgeable and sophisticated depositors such as the money managers of near-banks and large business corporations who have the facilities to move their deposits easily whenever higher rates are more attractive outside of Canada based on comparable degrees of security. It has been estimated by the Ad Hoc Committee on Foreign Currency Reserves of the Canadian Bankers' Association that, based on deposits at September 30, 1979, as much as $8 billion of the foreign currency deposits of Canadian residents could flow out of Canada if more sophisticated depositors are inclined to avoid the lower rates of interest which they would receive due to the effect of this reserve as proposed in Bill C-6; the Canadian Bankers' Association also estimates that as much as one-half, or $4 billion of these deposits could be lost to foreign banks.

This, in summary, means that the effects of this reserve would be felt mostly by those who might not have either the inclination or the facilities to avoid its effect by moving their deposits "off-shore".

Your Committee as a result of its studies, has the following observations to make concerning the adverse effects of the imposition of this reserve:

EFFECT ON BALANCE OF PAYMENTS

There would be a tendency of larger and more sophisticated Canadian resident depositors towards moving their foreign currency deposits to foreign banks and branches, resulting in a possible substantial increase in Canada's external debt. This would have a diametrically opposite effect to the intentions of the Canadian government to improve or maintain the level of Canada's deficit in its international balance of payments.

LOSS OF BUSINESS TO FOREIGN BANKS

Based on reasonable estimates, it appears to your Committee that as much as 50% of these exported funds could end up being deposited with foreign banks, resulting in a reduction of Canadian banks' share of the resident foreign currency deposit market. This would have the dual effect of weakening, to some extent, the Canadian economy, and of reducing of the income tax payments by banks to the Canadian and Provincial Governments.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST PARTICULAR GROUPS

The imposition of the 3% reserve on foreign currency deposits by Canadian residents could tend to discriminate in two ways against certain groups of Canadians, first against Canadian resident depositors of foreign currency in that foreign currency deposits by non-residents (not subject to reserves) would be offered higher rates than those offered to Canadian resident depositors of foreign currency; second, against the large majority of 190,000 smaller depositors who have deposits and c/d's of less than $100,000 each (an average of $9,000 each) who represent 97.3% of the number of Canadian resident owners of foreign currency deposits in banks in Canada.

COMPETITIVE DISADVANTAGE

The imposition of the reserve would again place the chartered banks at a further disadvantage with the trust companies who would not be subject to a reserve on their foreign currency deposits and could therefore offer better interest rates on their foreign currency business with Canadian resident depositors. This is in addition to the competitive disadvantage placed on banks by the removal in Bill C-6 (amended) of the exemption for currency in Canadian term deposits.

GROWTH OF DEPOSITS AND RESERVES

A comparison of reservable deposits and the calculated primary reserves under the present Bank Act with the reserves proposed by Bill C-15 and C-6 (as amended) is shown in Appendix B.

The estimated reservable deposits and primary reserve requirements might be summarized as follows:

	Dec. 31 1977	Oct. 29 1980
	(Millions)
Reservable Deposits
I Under present Bank Act	$85,000	$127,100
II Under Bill C-15	87,000	131,000
III Under Bill C-6 (amended)	91,000	135,000
Minimum Primary Reserve Requirement
I Under present Bank Act	$ 4,809	$ 6,614
II Under Bill C-15 ,	3,783	5,200
III Under Bill C-6 (amended)	3,883	5,320

Under the present Bank Act, due to the growth of the economy and the amount of deposits in the Canadian banking system, the reservable deposits have grown from $85 billion at December 31, 1977 to $127 billion at October 31, 1980. Similarly, the statutory primary reserves have grown from $4.8 billion to $6.6 billion.

Under Bill C-15 the minimum primary reserve at October 29, 1980 would be $5.3 billion after giving full effect to the phasing in of the reduction in reserve rates.

However, due to the change in the reserve on foreign currency deposits, an extra $3 billion of deposits become reservable. At the 3% rate this results in an increase of $90 million in required reserves.

Also the elimination of the exemption for 1 year and over term deposits by the amendment to Bill C-6 results in a further increase in the minimum reserve requirement.

From this it can be seen that the effects of the amendments to the proposed legislation have resulted in increasing the reserves required of banks by approximately $120 million, based on the amount of deposits at October 29, 1980.

Therefore, it might be considered that there has been an unintended increase in the amount of reserves above the level which was intended in the original reduction in the reserve rates from 12% to 10% of demand deposits and from 4% to 3% of notice deposits.

Due to the annual growth of the money supply and the amount of deposits in the Canadian banking system, it will be seen from the calculations below that the amount of reserves required, quite apart from any reserve on foreign currency deposits, will be considerably greater at the end of the 3½ year phase-in period than the present reserve required under the present Bank Act.

ADDITION OF RESERVES BY NEW BANKS

Also, there will be the addition to the reserves by the new foreign bank subsidiaries which will be incorporated under the new Bank Act. The notes payable outstanding of all Canadian financial institutions affiliated with foreign banks amounted to $573 billion at March 31, 1980 (Source: Bank of Canada Review, Statistical Table 47). Based on the required ratio of 5.31 for November 1980, these new banks would provide approximately $300 million in new cash reserves at the Bank of Canada, if all of these affiliates of foreign banks become incorporated as foreign bank subsidiaries under the new Bank Act. Using a very conservative estimate based on only one-half of these foreign affiliates becoming chartered banks, the additional cash reserves provided by them would amount to approximately $150 million.

The following projection indicates how the primary reserves would grow in line with the growth of deposits in the Canadian banking system, in spite of a reduction in the reserve ratios and even excluding any reserve on foreign currency deposits. These estimates are based on the following assumptions:

1. An estimated increase of 9% per annum on demand deposits and 14.5% per annum in notice deposits, compounded annually. The rate of 9% increase in demand deposits is based on the upper limit of the Bank of Canada's target range for M1 growth (currency and demand deposits). This rate is extremely conservative when compared with the growth in demand deposits of 12.8% in the year ended October 29, 1980. The rate of growth of notice deposits is based on the growth in notice deposits of 14.6% for the year ended October 29, 1980; the rate of growth in notice deposits was even higher in 1976, 1977 and 1978.

2. Neither foreign currency deposits nor reserves thereon are included.

3. Additional reserves contributed in the first six months by new banks based on one-half of the notes payable of Canadian financial institutions affiliated with foreign banks have been estimated.

4. Phasing-in of the reduction of reserve ratios commencing with January 1, 1981

	Deposits	Reserve Rate		Estimated Primary Reserves
		Demand	Notice
	(Billions)
October 29/80	$129	12%	4%	$6.6
December 31/80	130	12	4	6.7
June 30/81	138	11¾	3⅞	6.9
December 31/81	147	11½	3¾	7.1
June 30/82	157	11½	3⅝	7.3
December 31/82	167	11	3¼	7.5
June 30/83	178	10¾	3⅜	7.7
December 31/83	190	10½	3¼	7.9
June 30/84	203	10¼	3⅛	8.1
December 31/84	216	10	3	8.3

The above schedule indicates that even with an extremely conservative estimate in the growth of deposits, the primary reserves at the Bank of Canada would always increase even in spite of the gradual decrease in the statutory reserve ratios and without including reserves on foreign currency deposits. If foreign currency deposits were included in the above schedule, the reserves would be increased by an additional $90 million based on October 31, 1980 statistics. After December 31, 1984 the reserve ratios would remain constant and based on a rate of growth proportionate to the growth of deposits in the banking system, the reserves would continue to grow at a faster rate than shown in the schedule.

The above projections indicate for example that, after the first full year of the phasing-in of the reduction in reserve ratios, it is estimated that the primary reserves will have grown from $6.6 billion at October 29, 1980 to $7.1 billion at December 31, 1981, without including any reserves on foreign currency deposits. That is to say, the effect of the phased-in reduction of the reserve ratios is more than offset by the effect of the projected growth in the deposit base.

Therefore your Committee estimates that there should be no net loss of reserves nor decrease in revenue to the Bank of Canada if foreign currency deposits were exempted from the primary reserve requirement. Indeed, as indicated, on a conservative basis it is estimated that there would be a steady growth in the reserves and in the revenue earned by the Bank of Canada from the investment of these cash reserves.

It appears, therefore, to your Committee that the proposed reserves are in excess of requirements and that the elimination of the proposed 3% reserve on foreign currency deposits of Canadian residents would not result in a net decrease in revenue to the Bank of Canada and the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The proposed reserve introduces inefficiencies in the Canadian foreign currency market which eventually results in higher rates on foreign currency loans to Canadian residents booked in Canada.

Your Committee notes that the demand for foreign currency funding by Canadian residents is related largely to specific, legitimate financing needs. Export of large transactions in lumber, pulp and paper, wheat or fish are often denominated in foreign currency, and most exporters try to hedge their foreign currency position in the currency in which the payment is to be made. Your Committee believes that the reserve on foreign currency deposits by Canadians will thus increase the cost to Canadian exporters and that this is not in the public interest.

SUMMARY

1. The proposed reserve will probably increase the cost of foreign loans to Canadian exporters who hedge their foreign currency position, to the Canadian and Provincial Governments and other Canadian foreign currency borrowers as well as increase the costs of importers who maintain foreign currency deposits. This is not in the public interest.

2. It would discriminate against the smaller depositors who do not have the facilities to move their deposits offshore like other larger depositors.

3. It would discriminate against Canadian resident depositors of foreign currency in favour of non-resident depositors.

4. It would discriminate against Canadian banks in competition with trust companies and other near-banks.

5. The annual growth of deposits and the addition of reserves from new banks would result in an increase in the aggregate reserves even if the proposed reserve on foreign currency deposits was eliminated, with no decrease in revenue to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Your Committee is of the opinion that the Government has greatly underestimated the amount of foreign currency deposits which will flow out of Canada.

As noted earlier in this report, representatives of the Canadian Bankers' Association in their testimony before your Committee have indicated considerable concern about the potential loss to the Canadian banks in Canada and to the general Canadian economy at large if most of these foreign currency deposits are booked off-shore.

Your Committee has received evidence that the 12% and 4% reserves were in excess of requirements of the Bank of Canada for monetary control and for purposes of liquidity. The reserve on foreign currency deposits of Canadian residents as proposed in the Bill are not required for monetary control or liquidity purposes either.

Because it is your Committees opinion that the proposed reserves on foreign currency deposits of Canadian residents are not in the public interest for the reasons indicated above, your Committee is opposed to this provision in Bill C-6.

9. RECOMMENDATION:

YOUR COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS THAT A BANK NOT BE REQUIRED TO MAINTAIN EITHER A PRIMARY OR SECONDARY RESERVE ON SUCH OF ITS DEPOSIT LIABILITIES AS ARE FOREIGN CURRENCY DEPOSITS OF RESIDENTS OF CANADA WITH BRANCHES OF THE BANK OF CANADA OR WITH OFFICES IN CANADA OF SUBSIDIARIES OF THE BANK, AS PROPOSED BY BILL C-6 IN SUBSECTION 208(1)(g) OF THE PROPOSED NEW BANK ACT; YOUR COMMITTEE THEREFOR RECOMMENDS THAT BILL C-6 BE AMENDED AS FOLLOWS:

CLAUSE 2

STRIKE OUT LINES 35 TO 40, ON PAGE 228, AND SUBSTITUTE THE FOLLOWING THEREFOR:

"DOLLARS".

STRIKE OUT LINES 33 TO 38, ON PAGE 230, AND SUBSTITUTE THE FOLLOWING THEREFOR:

"ITS DEPOSIT LIABILITIES AS ARE CANADIAN CURRENCY DEPOSIT LIABILITIES."

10. CONCLUSION

As noted earlier in this report your Committee has not gone so far as to recommend amendments on the following matters:

(a) Ownership of banks' shares by Provincial Governments,

(b) Prohibition of a penalty or charge for prepayment of loans to individuals,

(c) Exemption of products of agriculture from Section 88 Security if purchase price unpaid at time of bankruptcy of a packer.

Your Committee feels strongly that these sections in Bill C-6 require to be reviewed, but having regard to the time factor and the length of time it has taken so far to bring the legislation to its present stage, your Committee is prepared not to press further at this time in connection with the above matters.

However, your Committee is agreed that it cannot do other than record its recommendation for the elimination of the proposed reserves on foreign currency deposits of Canadian residents in Canadian banks, because your Committee believes it is in the public interest to do so.

Your Committee wishes to express its appreciation for the services rendered in the review of the Bill by Messrs. John F. Lewis, C.A., and David W. Scott, Q.C.

Your Committee has examined and considered the subject-matter of Bill C-6 in accordance with its terms of reference, and, except as noted above, has no comment to make on the Bill.

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN,
Chairman.

Notes to Appendix "A"

1. Based on returns from the nine largest chartered banks.

2. As at April 30, 1980, Table 6 of the Bank of Canada showed the total foreign currency deposits of residents booked in Canada as Can. $11,762 Million. This has been converted into U.S. dollars at the close spot rate for that date to yield a figure of U.S. $9,892.

3. Excludes non-personal savings accounts and call accounts.

4. Figures in this table are estimated based on the returns of two banks which together represent 51% of the reported foreign currency accounts and 39% of reported foreign currency deposit liabilities.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Speyer, Beatty, Fraser, McCain, Thacker, Robinson (Burnaby) and Harquail had been substituted for those of Messrs. Epp, Dinsdale, Hawkes, Crombie, McGrath, Young and Henderson on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

> Copies of a letter from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Premier of Newfoundland, dated October 20, 1980, respecting the transmission of Newfoundland electrical energy through Quebec. (English text).

He said: This letter may be of special interest to Senator Marshall and other honourable senators who have asked questions about this matter. It is related to a response given here yesterday by the deputy leader.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask my honourable friend if that letter can be read or is it going to be attached to the proceedings?

Senator Perrault: The text could certainly be incorporated into today's proceedings if that is satisfactory. I would be pleased to accept that suggestion.

Senator Marshall: May we get copies of it now?

Senator Perrault: Copies will be at the Table and we can certainly—

Senator Roblin: I offer the observation that it is the practice in some cases to provide a copy to the opposition at once so that there will be an opportunity to discuss any matters that may arise from it. I would ask my honourable friend if he would consider doing that.

Senator Asselin: I have asked the same question many times.

Senator Perrault: Under the circumstances, with leave, may I read this letter to the chamber?

Senator Asselin: In the future, send a copy in advance to the opposition.

Senator Perrault: I would be glad to, but—

Senator Asselin: Do it in the future.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this letter is dated October 20. It is, then, not a letter issued yesterday; in fact, this communication has been in the possession of the Honourable Brian Peckford, the Premier of Newfoundland, since that date. It says:

> My dear Premier:
> This is in response to your letter of September 24, 1980, in which you reiterated your concerns about the federal government's willingness to use its constitutional authority to ensure the passage of Newfoundland electrical energy through Quebec.
> In my letter of July 29, 1980, to you I indicated that the federal government stood ready to act if it could be clearly demonstrated that the exportation of electricity from Newfoundland was, in fact, being prevented by Quebec. This, as you will recall, was also the essence of my comments to you when we discussed the matter at the recent Conference of First Ministers on the Constitution.
> I was very interested to learn that the Power Authority of the State of New York has indicated its willingness to purchase surplus power from your province if price and certain other requirements can be met. Although there are, I understand, many factors over and above the question of transmission through Quebec to resolve before formal contracts can be signed, this is an encouraging development.
> As I am sure you appreciate, your request for federal government action to ensure transmission through Quebec raises many complex issues. Federal officials are giving priority to examining these issues and it is clear that to expedite this work, discussion between our officials will be required at an early date. To this end, officials of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office will be getting in touch soon with their Newfoundland counterparts to discuss arrangements for such a meeting.

Yours sincerely,
Pierre Elliott Trudeau,
Prime Minister of Canada.

• (1405)

Senator Doody: What is the date of the letter?

Senator Perrault: It is dated October 20. It was tabled in the other place by Mr. Lalonde yesterday, November 24.

Senator Marshall: The Leader of the Government mentioned that officials from the federal government will be meeting with whom?

Senator Perrault: They will be in contact with their Newfoundland counterparts to discuss possible arrangements for a meeting.

Senator Marshall: Is there any indication that the Quebec government would be involved in those discussions?

Senator Perrault: I would be pleased to seek further information on that point. The letter is all I have in my possession at the present time.

Senator Doody: Is the letter dated October or November?

Senator Perrault: The letter is dated October 20 of this year, and it was tabled in the other place yesterday afternoon.

Senator Doody: Does the government leader know if any steps have been taken to get these meetings moving?

Senator Perrault: I will seek further information. As I stated to Senator Marshall, the letter is all I have in my possession at the present time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this tabling should be seen in the context of the delayed answer I gave Senator Marshall yesterday to a question he had asked. While the answer I gave did not specifically refer to the letter, it did refer to the contents of the letter and the offer that was being made.

I know that Senator Marshall realizes, and perhaps Senator Doody does also, as well as many other senators, that the situation is complicated by the agreement, a private agreement. So while the right that is being given and being discussed is one that can be exercised in that frame, it cannot be exercised without being somewhat complicated by the terms of that agreement and that is a matter between the Province of Quebec and the Province of Newfoundland, separately.

At the risk of just speculating, I am sure that that, in turn, has something to do with the initiatives taken by Premier Peckford with reference to legislation he recently introduced in the Legislature of Newfoundland.

Senator Roblin: May I ask a supplementary question? In the letter as read, if I remember well, the Prime Minister stated that the federal government could not act in the normal course without reasonable proof, or words to that effect, that the exportation of electricity from Newfoundland was being presented by Quebec. My question is: In view of this request for proof, is it going to be the policy of the federal government to await the disposition of the long delayed law suit that is now in the court with respect to Newfoundland's claims, as well as the matter now placed before the courts with respect to recent legislation? Is it the policy of the government to wait until those court actions have been cleared up before it can accept the proof that it requires?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I should explain that the purpose of this motion is to enable the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to proceed at once to consider Bill C-6, the Bank Act, which was referred to it last night.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—WITNESSES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had intended to ask questions of Senator Hays, the Senate Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. As Senator Hays is not here, I will address my questions to the Leader of the Senate and ask him to get the information for me.

I should like to ask some questions about the activities of the committee. I trust I am within the rules in the way I frame them. First of all, I should like to know how many applications to be heard have been filed with the committee, and how many of these applicants have been selected to be heard. Secondly, I should like to know how many briefs have been filed with the committee.

Up to now we have heard only from associations, some of which are special interest groups. I am particularly interested in knowing whether the committee plans to schedule the hearing of experts in the wider constitutional field?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I do not have that information at my desk, but I shall endeavour to obtain it just as soon as possible. I note, however, that there are some members of the committee present today who represent an information resource.

● (1410)

Senator Guay: Members of the committee could probably tell us.

Senator Asselin: Senator Austin could no doubt tell us.

Senator Roblin: It would be of interest to the Senate to have a list of those who have been in communication with the committee, together with an indication as to whether they wish to submit a brief and appear as witnesses before the committee or merely submit written opinion to the committee. Perhaps that list could also indicate those who will be heard and when it is expected that they will be heard. I would ask my honourable friend to obtain that information for us.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, an endeavour will be made to determine the number of requests received for appearances before the committee. However, the Honourable Senator Roblin, who is a member of the committee, may well feel that there would be value in his asking that question of the joint chairmen of the committee when the committee next meets. We should both engage in the pursuit of the desired information.

Senator Roblin: I think that is a reasonable suggestion, and I daresay that the committee will be asked to discuss this matter. It seems to me, however, to be a matter of much wider interest than that. The depth of the subject will be apparent once we determine what the answers to the questions are. I am sure it will be discussed in the committee, but it seems to me that the Senate will have a real interest in this as well.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, many of us get the impression that this Special Joint Committee on the Constitution is very similar to the Tower of Babel. We are all considerably worried about the reputation that is going across the country as a result of the fact that everyone seems so far apart on this patriation question.

Is there any chance of settling with Britain the question of the patriation of the Constitution with an amending formula? And then we can, on our own, go on from there. Anyone other than Prime Minister Trudeau would have agreed to that by now.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated yesterday, the government is awaiting, with keen anticipation, the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, along with its recommendations, which may well be attached to that report.

[Translation]

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—PROPOSED EXTENSION OF DEADLINE—CONSULTATION BETWEEN HOUSE LEADERS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. As Senator Roblin said a while ago, a great number of people want to appear before the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution.

It is obvious that, because of the enormous task that will have to be done in such a short time, it will be humanly and physically impossible for us to complete our work by December 9.

Moreover, some kind of an understanding seems to be developing among the leaders of the various political parties in the other place, and they would appear to be on the point of agreeing that the committee hearings should be extended for a few weeks so that all those who want to appear can do so and the members of the committee can have the chance to work intelligently.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us what have been the results of the various consultations among the party leaders in the other place in this regard?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that a number of constructive meetings and conversations have been held involving the leadership of the parties in the other place. However, I am not aware of any final decisions to extend the length of the committee's hearings or to extend the number of days in which submissions may be brought before the committee. It is certainly possible, according to the advice I have received, that the committee may wish to bring in an interim report recommending the extension of the sitting time.

Senator Asselin, as a member of the committee, may be in a position to advise the house whether or not some formal proposal will be brought forward again in the joint committee by his party. Certainly a number have spoken in support of extended hearings.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I could advise the Leader of the Government in that regard, and of course I do not blame him for not following the proceedings of our joint committee. As early as last week, members of the official opposition, supported by members of the NDP, put to the committee a formal motion asking for permission to present a report to the Senate and the House of Commons recommending that the sitting hours of the committee be extended to February 10, in order, I repeat, to allow the committee members to perform their work like intelligent people.

In addition, for the information of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I can tell him that members of his political formation, who are in the majority, voted against the motion. Of course, the report could not then be presented to the Senate or the House of Commons.

While I have the floor on this matter, perhaps I could, for once, ask the Leader of the Government why the government is so set on that magic date of December 9. Why not the 20 or the 21? Or later, for that matter? Can he tell us whether or not there is a fundamental reason for the government's insisting that the committee complete its work by December 9? To date, none of the interventions in committee, in this house or in the other place, justify in any way an arbitrary date such as December 9. So, can he tell the Senate what the government had in mind when it set a date like December 9, a date it will not change?

● (1415)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, it is not my intention to reopen a debate which was held in the Senate. It would, indeed, be contrary to our rules to reopen a debate on a motion which has already been decided by the Senate. But I know the honourable senator is earnestly seeking information and enlightenment, and all of us appreciate his lively concern in this matter. May I suggest that the power of his eloquence may well persuade members of the joint committee to accede ultimately to his request. The Prime Minister has stated a number of times that if evidence can be presented and justification is provided for an extension of the committee hearing dates, then certainly supporters of the government on the committee would consider such an extension. So I think it can be said, honourable senators, that the matter may not have been finally disposed of.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could I ask a supplementary question on the same point? I recall well that when we were concerned about the question of time limits in this house we received the most fulsome assurances from the Leader of the Government that the committee would be able to make its own recommendations in the matter. Indeed, as my honourable friend has said, it has made its recommendation, which is negative.

But we were reassured again in the committee that we need not lose heart because the question would be referred to the leaders outside the committee for some adjudication. Now my question for the leader is: Has he, as a representative of the Senate, been asked to take part in those consultations?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated in reply to Senator Asselin, it is conceivable that the final disposition of this question has not been made. Let me assure honourable senators on that point. We have not completed the hearing process in the joint committee; there are many more witnesses to be heard, and it is entirely possible for the committee to report back on December 5, or before that date, certainly by December 9, conveying its recommendation that in the light of additional briefs and additional requests received from certain associations, organizations or individuals, that the committee recommends to the Senate and to the other place that a time extension, for example, be made.

Perhaps it is too early to make a final decision with respect to this proposal for extended hearings. With respect to Senate participation in the process of that final determination, there will be substantial Senate involvement.

Senator Roblin: I am delighted to hear that, because there has been no evidence of it so far. The evidence so far is that the consultations have been limited to members of the House of Commons. This is a joint committee, and when I heard members of the Constitution Committee saying that "house leaders would be consulted," I must say that in my naiveté I thought that might possibly include leaders in the Senate; but, if that is not to be, then we should be told about it; if it is to be, then why have we not been brought in on the ground floor?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Senate has certainly not been excluded from this process of constitutional review in any sense. There are ten members of the Senate participating on a most active and useful basis in that committee's deliberations. In the second place, as Leader of the Government in the Senate, I participate in many of the discussions relating to that committee's activity and the position of the government with respect to that committee. Moreover, anyone who assumes that the Joint Chairman from the Senate, Senator Hays, is operating merely as a cypher who has no participation in the decision-making process is entirely incorrect in his assumptions.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is avoiding the question. I know perfectly well, and he knows perfectly well, that insofar as the members of that committee are concerned the whole subject has been removed from their domain and jurisdiction and has been handed over to the leaders of the house. But who are those leaders? Do they include members of the Senate? That is my point.

My honourable friend has told me quite frankly, and I commend him for his frankness, that he has not been consulted by the leaders in the other place with respect to the changing of the reporting time of this body. I would suggest that "leaders of the house" should include, with all modesty, if not myself, certainly my colleague, the Leader of the Opposition here, and his deputy when he is not here. But I can speak for myself and say that I have heard nothing of it.

I do not know why the Senate is excluded from this process in which the decisions are being made. They are not being made in the committee. The committee told us that. They are being made outside by our masters.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must say that I am surprised that the Honourable Senator Roblin seems to have developed a rejection complex merely because he has not been invited to a "confab" of political leaders in the other place. However, now that he has suggested that he thinks there is merit in house leaders discussing this matter, and has said so publicly and in his usual eloquent way, with the support of the Honourable Senator Asselin who spoke on it today, I will be more than delighted to meet with the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate to discuss this matter.

In this regard I do not think members in the other place will feel especially rejected if they are not invited to participate in the deliberations of house leaders. I am sure the distinguished Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate would be pleased to be part of that meeting, as I am sure would be the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Marshall: The distinguished Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Perrault: I do not feel that every time house leaders in the other place have a meeting, the Senate should be a party to it.

Senator Asselin: On this question, yes.

Senator Perrault: And I am sure they do not feel they should be party to everything we discuss in our meetings here. May I propose, therefore, that we have a meeting between the time we rise today and when we meet tomorrow to discuss the matter of the Constitution Committee and its reporting date.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend, in his usual elegant style, has dragged the red herring across the trail. He knows perfectly well that we are talking about a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, and that no one on this side is expecting to have any input or anything to do with ordinary matters in the other house. It is a joint committee, and he knows perfectly well that I am not recommending this course because I like it. I am yielding to force majeure. We have been told in the committee that we will not have the power to decide, that it will be decided outside our ranks. That is the reason why I take such an interest in the matter.

Senator Perrault: As usual, the honourable senator's remarks will be given careful consideration. But there has been no directive issued that the committee shall not be permitted to decide whether or not it wishes to report that an extension of the sitting time is warranted. I know of no such directive and I do not believe that any such directive has been issued anywhere.

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend know that the committee has voted against extending the time? I hope he knows that much.

Senator Perrault: Because a majority of the committee voted against a certain proposal does not necessarily mean to say that a decision was taken in some other place and that some kind of order was issued to those members that were required to vote in a certain fashion. Indeed, may I offer the personal speculation that the honourable senator may be pleasantly surprised in due time when he has the full facts concerning the possibility of extending the committee times.

Senator Asselin: If you know something, say so.

Senator Roblin: I will be glad to wait. If it is worth waiting for; I shall congratulate my honourable friend upon it. But I never said that someone had instructed the committee how to vote. That is not what I said, and my honourable friend knows it is not what I said. I said that we were told in the committee that the decision would be made by the house leaders, not by the members of the committee themselves. When the protest was made, the soothing answer that was given was "Never mind, we are going to refer it to the leaders of the house and they will decide whether or not there will be any extension of time." That is the fact. I regret to report it, but it is so.

[Senator Marshall.]

ITALY

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—SAFETY OF CANADIANS IN AREA

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have two questions for the Leader of the Government. First, is he in a position to tell us whether there were any Canadians present in the earthquake area of southern Italy; and, secondly, does he have any additional information that he would like to share with the Senate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some further information with respect to the terrible disaster in Italy. So far as Canadians are concerned, our embassy in Rome, in its latest report—a copy of which I shall read in a moment—mentioned that the local authorities with whom they are in touch are at this stage concentrating on the rescue of victims rather than in establishing their identity. As a consequence of this, and of disrupted communications, our embassy has not yet been able to establish the safety and well-being of the relatively few Canadians believed to be in the severely damaged area. We do not have the names of those "relatively few Canadians," but those names will be provided to honourable senators as quickly as possible.

We have received a telex communication from Rome, a copy of which is before me. It is not a long telex, and perhaps it should be put on the record. It reads:

> Severe earthquake measuring 6.5 on Richter scale struck Italian Province of Campania, in area south and east of Naples last night at about 1930 hours. Epicentre is Town of Eboli with extensive damage around City of Avellino. Early indications are of major disaster, placing dead in hundreds and injured in thousands. Some estimates place dead in thousands.
> It is very difficult at this stage to give estimate or reports on safety of Canadians. Local authorities with whom we have been in touch are concentrating entirely on rescue of victims and not their identity.
> Notices have been issued to avoid travel to Naples and beyond because of clogged facilities, damaged roads and interrupted communications.
> Our preliminary contacts with MFA indicate they have set up co-ordinating group but for now are awaiting further information before making requests for assistance from either governments or private agencies.
> Authorities are in any case fairly confident of disposing of sufficient emergency supplies for early stages, except perhaps for plasma and blood which are being requested through media.

• (1430)

There is, then, a course of action recommended to the government with respect to the conveying of messages of sympathy to the Italian government, and so on. The telex continues:

> We are awaiting confirmation of the full extent of the tragedy, which will be known in greater detail over the next 24 hours.

There is a further note to the effect that since yesterday, the League of Red Cross Societies has launched an international appeal for emergency assistance in the stricken areas. It will be recalled that the Minister of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, announced yesterday that $100,000 had been set aside as an initial Canadian contribution. Today, he is announcing that the $100,000 contribution will be released immediately to the League of Red Cross Societies for emergency relief efforts in the devastated areas. In a statement, which I understand he is making this afternoon in the other place, he will say:

> I wish to assure the House that we are in close communication with the Italian government and the Red Cross to determine the nature of any further emergency assistance required.

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, before Senator Bosa left I wanted to draw the attention of the minister to a motion that was passed unanimously in the other place yesterday on this subject, on the initiative of Mr. McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown), urging the Secretary of State for External Affairs to consult urgently with the Italian government as to the special and immediate needs of the victims of the earthquake of the Naples-Salerno area of southern Italy, and that the minister report to the house at the earliest opportunity and advise the house on the ways in which the Canadian government is able and willing to render assistance; further, that the government consult with the many Canadians who wish personally to assist the victims of this earthquake and provide special programs which will allow the people of Canada with special ties to Italy to respond in an urgent and generous manner through airlifts, emergency relief and reconstruction. As honourable senators will be aware, efforts in these directions are being made by private groups throughout the country now.

Perhaps the minister will, first of all, want to associate himself and all of us in this chamber with both the spirit and the substance of that motion, and, secondly, to undertake to keep the Senate informed, as the Minister of External Affairs is required to keep the House of Commons informed, as to the efforts being made.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my office is in continuing contact with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his departmental officials, and we have requested that information, as it becomes available, be made available immediately to honourable senators. That will be done, and has been done.

Canada, with a long record of humanitarian activity in efforts to help alleviate tragedies of this kind, is in contact with Italian authorities, and Canadian help will be extended to assist those who have survived this immense human disaster, one which appears to be well beyond the dimensions at first anticipated.

THE ECONOMY

EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

I understand that the Canadian dollar yesterday fell below 84 cents U.S., while the bank rate, the prime rate, is still climbing. I remember a year or so ago the minister's loudly denouncing what appeared, as one listened to him, to be a continual increase in interest rates. I wonder whether, now that the situation has changed, if it is the policy of the present administration to continue with these interest rate increases, and is it the policy of the government to continue these injections of funds with the object of supporting the Canadian dollar, or is there a ceiling or level at which the government feels that it has to stop?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my friend knows very well that what he is asking is partly within the responsibility of the Minister of Finance, but mostly within the direct responsibility of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I am sure he also understands that announcements in advance as to what actions will be taken to allow the market to float, and therefore directly affect the dollar or, indeed, any influence they may have on it with buying and selling in the market, is something that they do not announce in advance.

Senator Doody: As a supplementary to that question and perhaps for clarification, may I ask if the governor of the central bank reports to the Minister of Finance on these matters? Is not the Minister of Finance the final arbiter of interest rates, or has that situation changed?

Senator Olson: No, the situation has not changed.

Senator Doody: As a further supplementary: Last week the Minister of Finance—and I assume that this is a policy decision that is made by the Economic Development Committee of which my friend is the chairman—announced that Canadians should expect a decline in real income during 1981.

The dollar has fallen below 84 cents U.S.; interest rates are climbing; unemployment is up; and inflation is still on the rise. My understanding is that the response to all these indicators is that we have to wait for an upturn in the United States economy.

Does the minister know of any particular Canadian policies that may be put into effect to try to counter these rather frightening trends?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Canadian government, at least since March 3, 1980, does indeed have some policies that will be helpful to the Canadian population in these areas. I think it has been demonstrated over and over again that, while we cannot isolate ourselves from our trading partners, we have done better than most in all of the areas my honourable friend mentioned. I think we can take some satisfaction, as Canadians, that Canada is doing better than most other countries considering these economic factors.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED—COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—CANCELLATION OF HEAVY OIL PROJECT

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. When Mr. Jack Armstrong, Chairman of the Board of Imperial Oil, announced the cancellation of the Cold Lake project, he gave two reasons. One reason was the lack of an agreement with the Province of Alberta, and the second reason was the provisions in the budget. My question is: What provisions in the budget was he specifically referring to?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, perhaps I should get a copy of what he said and bring it to this house. I expect, in general terms, he was referring to those changes in the tax base respecting certain aspects of energy revenue.

Senator Godfrey: Is the government going to proceed with the loan of $40 million without some assurance from Mr. Armstrong that he is waiving those objections, or is the government proposing that the bugetary provisions will be changed in some way to suit Imperial Oil?

Senator Olson: I do not believe that the offer to make a loan for the purpose of keeping the project viable was conditional on any changes being made in the budgetary provisions.

Senator Roblin: They don't even have to pay it back. It is not a loan; it is a gift.

NEWFOUNDLAND

REVITALIZATION OF RAILWAY SYSTEM

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I am sure he will have to take it as notice. It has to do with Newfoundland's policy on the revitalization of the railway system which is so important to Newfoundland, and which was obliterated by peculiar actions and downgrading in 1969.

The commitment of the Premier of Newfoundland is strengthened by a study completed by two prominent consultant groups and a committee of officials. In his statement the Premier indicates the responsibility of the federal government in helping to revitalize the railway and its responsibilities under the Terms of Union. Could the Leader of the Government extract from the Minister of Transport what his reaction is to the provincial government's stand? Will consultations be held, and, if so, how soon? Could he give us an answer at an early date?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

[Senator Olson.]

ENERGY

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—FEDERAL LOAN TO IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development following the question asked by the Honourable Senator Godfrey. Last week the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced that the federal government would loan Imperial Oil $40 million to ensure the continuation of the Cold Lake project. The news reports over the weekend quoted Mr. Lalonde as stating PetroCan would loan the $40 million. Would the minister advise the Senate if the loan to Imperial Oil will be made directly from the federal treasury, or will it be made by PetroCan. Can he also indicate to us the terms of the loan, including the rate of interest to be charged.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Government of Canada will take the responsibility for the loan. I think the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has indicated that he would ask officials of PetroCan to negotiate the terms and conditions so that a massive project at Cold Lake, where there is an enormous known deposit of oil, can be brought to the position of pumping that oil into the consumers' stream without interruption. That is the basic premise on it. It seems to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the most competent people to do that would be the crown corporation, PetroCan, and they have been asked to work out the details.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT—PROPOSED CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a further question to the Minister of State for Economic Development on a different subject. It was reported last week that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Honourable Herbert Gray, favours the creation of a company similar to PetroCan in the resource sector to carry out the government's policy in the manufacturing sector. A study of this question is allegedly under way now. According to Mr. Gray, it will shortly go to the cabinet for further consideration. Is the Minister of State for Economic Development in favour of a new vehicle being established along these lines to implement the government's industrial development objectives?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, quite obviously when the government has made a decision based on the recommendations coming from any minister, then an announcement is made and ministers do not individually indicate their preferences, for obvious reasons, while that discussion is under way. Perhaps the honourable senator would like to re-examine his question. He is talking about a crown corporation with respect to the manufacturing industry, and I wonder if he really is not referring to a trading company.

Senator Phillips: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggested an alternative to a new crown corporation when he said:

We are looking at a range of options which could include some changes in the operation of the Canadian Development Corporation.

I think that answers the suggestion of Senator Olson that a trading company was intended. Would he indicate if possible changes to the Canadian Development Corporation are motivated by that company's refusal to participate in the Massey-Ferguson refinancing operation. Further, would he indicate precisely what alternatives are being considered insofar as the Canadian Development Corporation is concerned.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, attribution of motivation is not, in my view, a particularly useful exercise. I can assure my honourable friend, however, that when the government has reached its decision and is ready to make an announcement, I will advise him as soon as possible.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INDEPENDENT AUDITS OF INDIAN BAND TRUST FUNDS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate arising out of hearings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in July, just before the beginning of the summer recess, concerning trust funds held by the federal government for various Indian groups. I notice that several previous Ministers of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have fully endorsed the principle of Indian bands being able to request and obtain audits of the trust funds being held for them by the federal government, audits to be conducted by the Auditor General. Is it the policy of this government to support this principle?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question. I point out to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that in the other place on November 15, 1979, a motion under Standing Order 43 was adopted, mandating the Auditor General to conduct audits of trust funds held by the Government of Canada for Indian bands. I would like to know how many of the audits have, in fact, been requested; how many have been completed; and how many are under way I trust he will take this question as notice.

Supplementary to that, I would like to know if the Auditor General has been directed to give any priority to requests for such audits, whether additional staff has been obtained for him—I understand that was a concern to him—and whether there is, indeed, a movement in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to co-operate in retrieving the kind of information that the Auditor General would require. I trust the government leader will take that question as notice as well.

Finally, has the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development sought the co-operation of the various provincial governments involved, for example, in the particular fund that came under question in July and which concerned the Nelson River Indian band in British Columbia? Have those various provincial governments been requested to provide information and co-operation?

Senator Perrault: The information will be sought and given to the honourable senator as quickly as possible.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I want to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development. I regret very much not being present last week when the minister testified before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, but I have obtained a copy of the unedited transcript of his testimony. I note that there was one matter that did not come up, and it is in relation to the earlier testimony given by the minister's colleague, Mr. De Bané, before the same committee.

Mr. De Bané had told the committee it was his desire—in fact, his intention—to have the federal government end the sectoral subagreements with the provincial governments in the various economic sectors; and, secondly, it was his desire and intention to have the federal government, through DREE, involved at the community level in community planning in a way in which I felt, and a number of people felt, would create constitutional difficulties with the provinces.

With respect to the first matter, would the Minister of State for Economic Development enlighten us as to whether the federal government officially has a position which would lead the government out of the sectoral subagreements with the provinces?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question and refer it to my colleague, the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion. I think I ought to do that, because what we are dealing with here are perhaps some concepts, and perhaps expressions of opinion, rather than matters of fact. However, if indeed he has moved to the point where he is preparing a paper or, indeed, a submission to government, and he is ready to make, or has already made, that information public, that he is taking such an action, I will obtain some further detail respecting it.

Senator Murray: Perhaps I should say by way of clarification that what Mr. De Bané was suggesting was a system whereby DREE, instead of cost-sharing with the provinces, would cost-share with other federal departments, and would not, as DREE, be involved in subagreements with provincial government. I would appreciate it if the Minister of State for Economic Development would look into the matter and give us a fuller report, because such an intention on the part of the government would create very serious concerns on the part of the provinces affected, which are largely very supportive of the general development agreement and the sectoral subagreements.

Senator Olson: I am sure that there is some validity in that assertion. However, it may be useful, in view of the honourable senator's interest in pursuing this matter further, to ask the chairman of the committee to recall Mr. De Bané so that there can be a full and complete discussion with him in the committee on that subject.

Senator Murray: That was the sense of the committee in any case. The committee wishes to have Mr. De Bané back to testify again.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN FARES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Marshall, on October 31, November 12 and November 18, made reference to what he feels are the stratospheric fare levels of Air Canada.

Senator Marshall: Not quite stratospheric.

Senator Perrault: Not quite stratospheric, but perhaps subsonic.

Senator Marshall: Subsonic, yes.

Senator Perrault: Between January 1970 and January 1980, Air Canada's economy fare for Ottawa-Toronto increased from $21 to $64, or 205 per cent; for Ottawa-Montreal from $11 to $51, or 360 per cent; and for Ottawa-St. John's from $76 to $144, or 90 per cent.

Air Canada sets its domestic economy fares according to a fare formula, consisting of a single, averaged ground handling or "boarding" charge and a single line-haul charge per mile of travel. Certain of Air Canada's short haul fares, such as Ottawa-Toronto and Ottawa-Montreal, have been below what they should have been under the fare formula. Air Canada is gradually eliminating such "anomaly" fares by increasing them at a higher rate than fares already at the level required by the fare formula. This helps to explain why the increases on these routes appear to be extremely large.

Air Canada advises that its air fares increased at a slower rate than the consumer price index during the 1970s. More recent air fare increases have had to provide for operating cost increases well above the consumer price index. At the beginning of 1980, Air Canada expected that the cost of its Canadian operations would increase by at least 11.5 per cent, due to inflation. It also expected certain major cost increases, such as 17.7 per cent for fuel, excluding the effect of any increase in the price of fuel after January 1 or any new excise taxes. For 1981, Air Canada expects an 18 per cent increase in its domestic operating expenses.

Air carriers are required to file with the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission details of new fares which they intend to take effect on a certain date. The Air Transport Committee examines the proposed fares to determine whether they are "just and reasonable," as required by the Aeronautics Act. Consequently, the carriers are not necessarily able to increase their fares by the desired amount. For example, the committee reduced a proposed 7 per cent increase by Air Canada, effective October 1980, to 3 per cent.

Air Canada has been allowed the following fare increases in 1980: 9.5 per cent in March, 3.2 per cent in June, 3 per cent in October, and 1 per cent in November for the new petroleum compensation charge, which Air Canada says amounts to an increase of 3.1 cents per gallon of fuel. The other major Canadian carriers have been allowed similar fare increases during 1980.

Air Canada's most recently announced fare increase of 9.5 per cent is not to take effect until January 5, 1981. The Air Transport Committee has 45 days to consider whether this proposed increase should take effect.

Senator Marshall: While I have to accept the answer read by the government leader, I do not accept what Air Canada or the Air Transport Committee are saying. I think I will discuss with the distinguished Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications the likelihood and advisability of bringing Air Canada or the Air Transport Committee before his committee to quiz them a bit.

PRIVATE BILL

PRESIDENT OF THE LETHBRIDGE STAKE OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-16, intituled: "An Act respecting the President of the Lethbridge Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints".—(Honourable Senator Manning, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that Senator Manning intended to move second reading of this bill today, because he specifically asked that it be put over to this date. He has not communicated with me about it, and I can only assume that something unexpected has prevented his being here. Therefore, I suggest that this order be allowed to stand.

Order stands.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1981.—(Honourable Senator Everett).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was speaking to Senator Everett today, and he said that he had not intended to make a speech on the consideration of this report, but simply to move its adoption. However, under the circumstances I think we would like to hear from him, so I suggest that this order stand, unless some member of the committee feels that there is some urgency in having the report adopted today.

Order stands.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Lafond).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, should this order not be standing in the name of Senator Godfrey?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Yes, it should be in my name. However, it is now standing in the name of Senator Lafond. I have taken the matter up with the Assistant Clerk, and I understand that, technically, it should remain in Senator Lafond's name. I am the one who will be speaking to it.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the Senate, I should like to report on the subject of our business for the rest of the week.

As you will have noticed, all items on today's order paper have been stood. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is at this moment considering Bill C-6, which was referred to it last evening. I understand the committee has the Honourable Pierre Bussières, Minister of State (Finance), before it. There is good reason to hope for completion of the committee's consideration of Bill C-6 this afternoon, which would put the committee in the position of being able to report the bill to the Senate tomorrow.

If the committee does report the bill tomorrow, it is our intention to proceed immediately to third reading. I have discussed this with Senator Roblin, and he sees no problem with respect to proceeding with third reading tomorrow. Of course, that does not mean there cannot be debate on the motion for third reading. In any event, it seems we will have leave to proceed with third reading tomorrow.

I am going into this detail, honourable senators, because the funeral of our late and beloved former Governor General, the Right Honourable Jules Léger, will take place on Thursday afternoon. It is the intention of the House of Commons not to sit until 8 o'clock in the evening of that day.

If the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on Bill C-6 is adopted tomorrow afternoon, and the Senate is prepared to proceed immediately to third reading, we would then be in a position to have royal assent tomorrow evening, thereby avoiding a sitting on Friday for the sole purpose of royal assent.

That is the program for the rest of the week, and those are the targets we are aiming for.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the deputy leader whether the reason for the Senate's not sitting on Thursday also prevents meetings of Senate committees. I know that some committees have meetings scheduled for Thursday morning. Will there be any difficulty in carrying out such plans?

Senator Frith: No, not at all. In fact, I had given some thought to having the Senate sit on Thursday morning for the purpose of royal assent to Bill C-6. However, there cannot be royal assent without the participation of the House of Commons, and that house does not intend to sit until 8 o'clock on Thursday evening. Therefore, I see no impediment at all to meetings of Senate committees on Thursday morning.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 26, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Henderson, Epp, La Salle, Dinsdale, Baker (Gander-Twillingate), Halliday, Lang, Young, Smith, Irwin, Corbin, Lapierre, Beatty, Nielsen, Nickerson, Ittinuar, Flis, Taylor, McGrath, Gimaïel, Lapierre, Miss Carney and Mr. Fraser had been substituted for those of Messrs. Harquail, Thacker, Speyer, Beatty, Lapierre, McCain, Irwin, Robinson (Burnaby), Corbin, Lang, Smith, Baker (Gander-Twillingate), Dinsdale, Halliday, La Salle, Young, Lapierre, Nielsen, Nickerson, Flis, Henderson, Fraser and Epp on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION BILL, 1980

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, November 25, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-6 intituled: "An Act to Revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association, and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof", cited as the "Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1980", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, November 24, 1980, examined the said bill.

In view of the statements given by the minister to the committee with respect to its concerns as outlined in its report on the subject matter of the said bill, tabled in the Senate on the 24th day of November 1980, relating to Prepayment of Consumer Loans, Ownership of Bank Shares by Provincial Governments and Extension of Exemption from Section 88 Security to Agricultural Products, in particular, to the effect that he would review such concerns and if he and his officials determined that they were well founded he would propose amendments to the bill to accommodate them; and further, in view of the minister's statement with respect to Reserves on Foreign Currency Deposits to the effect that if, after an appropriate period of time and study, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General of Banks report to the minister that the effects anticipated in your committee's report, for the reasons therein outlined, have indeed occurred, then he will propose an amendment to the bill designed to eliminate or minimize such effects, your committee is pleased to recommend to the Senate that the bill be favourably considered, without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Asselin: Explain.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, if I might, I should like to add a few words of explanation.

I think first I should tell you, in connection with the contribution by your Senate committee, at the various stages when the bill in various forms came before it, the committee projected recommendations which from time to time were reflected in a succession of banking bills, the sum total of which will amount to 70 to 75 amendments, starting with the white paper.

Several new subject matters have been incorporated in the present bill, Bill C-6. In respect of one, the letters patent method of incorporation of banks, where this was disclosed in the white paper, the committee took the position that there would not necessarily be available the opportunities to ascertain all the particulars with respect to incorporation, opportunities that would be available if the old procedures applied, namely, a special act of Parliament.

Therefore, we recommended in our report on the white paper that there be a public review provided for. We waded through Bill C-15, Bill C-14, and Bill C-6 and discovered nothing which could deal with that situation. But hope springs eternal, and in the Commons committee a motion was made underlining exactly this question of providing for a public review. That amendment was accepted by the government. Although it was late, it is better late than never. This is one of the last minute amendments.

The other amendment deals with automotive financial leasing. The government had projected an amendment at the committee stage in the House of Commons, the amendment being completely the reverse of the position taken by the government in the white paper, in Bill C-15, Bill C-14 and in Bill C-6, down to June of this year. That amendment practically amounted to a prohibition against banks operating in the field of automotive leasing, because it established a weight factor. The banks could not operate in that field in relation to any motor vehicle that weighed less than 46,000 pounds. So even in the situation of a tractor-trailer combination, the tractor would be weighed separately, and you would have the anomalous situation then of the tractor weighing less than 46,000 pounds, but the combination of the trailer and the tractor might weigh up to 90,000 pounds. The test would be that the motor vehicle, the tractor, weighed less than 46,000 pounds. So that field was closed to banks.

However, your committee kept bombing away. Evidence was developed to show that there was almost an infinite variety of applications of the leasing principle to motor vehicles, covering areas that automobile dealers did not engage in at all. Therefore, it struck us as a rather anomalous situation that prohibition should be provided to keep the banks out of that area, when the dealers were not operating in it. So we were finally able to convince the minister of this.

At the stage of the report of the Commons committee the minister proposed an amendment to define motor vehicles in such a way that it excluded many applications. They had failed to appreciate, for instance, that there are specialty manufacturers for special types of trucks. The dealers don't operate in that field at all. I am thinking of trucks with special features, such as cement mixers, ambulances, fire-fighting equipment trucks and hydro-electric trucks. Hydro-electric commissions purchase many trucks that have a built-in fully-equipped workshop so that repairs can be done when they are on the road. Bell Canada trucks are in the same category. Because leasing provides a better control of money management and money flow, more and more we find these major companies engaging in the business of leasing. The same applies to many municipalities. Ultimately, the minister proposed an amendment incorporating the features that we had been urging, and that is another one I included when I estimated the 70 to 75 figure.

There were still some points—possibly four in number—on which we were not in agreement with the conclusions reflected in Bill C-6. In relation to three of them, the committee decided that it would not be in the public interest at this stage to propose amendments, the feeling of the committee being that it is time that the Bank Act was passed into law. I suggested to the minister that he might join with us if we included in our prayers: "Lord deliver us from any further extensions of the Bank Act," and there was hearty applause from the committee to that. We have spend a long time working on it, and it has been worthwhile work.

The three items with which we were not in agreement included a provision added to the bill during the fall by the House of Commons committee prohibiting a charge or penalty for the prepayment of an individual loan, and also providing that if there were a charge or a penalty it would be such as is prescribed by regulation, thereby giving the minister complete control over that situation.

In relation to that, and in relation to the other two items, the committee took the position that it would accept an undertaking from the minister that he would make the necessary changes in the event that the actual operations under the bill bore out the committee's conclusions. We suggested that the minister carry out that review together with the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General of Banks within a very short period of time following the passage of the bill.

Then we insisted on a special form of recognition on the other item, which was the inclusion of a 3 per cent cash non-interest reserve on foreign currency held by residents of Canada in a Canadian bank.

Both in the white paper and in Bill C-15, that provision had been contained, but it was much more extensive. Then it provided that any foreign currency on deposit in a bank in Canada, regardless of the source of that currency, used for domestic purposes, was subject to this 3 per cent reserve. We objected very strenuously to that in our reports on Bill C-15.

• (1415)

Then we had the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General before us and they agreed with us that the circumstances had not been fully explored in relation to the application of this cash reserve in the form in which it appeared in the bill. It certainly appeared to create a substantial competitive disadvantage to the banks as against the trust companies and as against the foreign banks that had been operating for years in Canada under a financial corporation set-up with a company usually incorporated provincially. And, of course, such companies, trust companies and foreign financial corporations, were not subject to any of the reserve requirements of the Bank Act. The net result was that that provision was changed. I shall not say that it was split in two, but it was put into two parts; and then one part was eliminated. The part retained was this: The foreign currency deposits that were owned by the residents of Canada and were on deposit in a bank in Canada were subject to the 3 per cent non-interest cash reserve. We found, and this was made clear by the evidence given to us, that the dollar amount of such foreign currency deposits that meet that requirement would be of the order of possibly $10.9 billion, and we found that $8.5 billion of that would be held in deposits that were, individually, over $100,000, and mainly in the area of $1 million or more. The evidence before us indicated that the people who operated such accounts were sophisticated money managers and, of course, all they had to do, if the 3 per cent factor applied, was to move that money out of Canada to, say, the United Kingdom where there is no cash reserve requirement. That volume of business would then be lost to Canada. Or if the Canadian banks tried to retain it, they would have to reduce their interest payments to meet the cost factor of this 3 per cent. If they did not meet the cost factor, then they were in competition with the trust companies and the foreign financial companies which were not subject to the 3 per cent. So they felt the thing was still unfair.

This was the exposure we put in our last report; this was the exposure we made in the several sessions we had with the minister, and latterly in the last session yesterday.

Finally, the situation resolved itself to this: we had to decide what was more important. Was it more important to deal with the situation as best we could so that we could get at it again later, or simply propose an amendment and accept whatever the consequences might be? I think one consequence would be that you would have to assume that if the bill were sent back to the Commons at this stage it certainly would not meet the deadline requirements; that is to say, it would not be clear by Saturday of this week. So finally we decided to put it up to the minister. We do have a procedure in our committee work by which, if the Minister of Finance undertakes that at the next session he will amend a bill in the way in which we think it should be amended, we will report the bill without amendment. This procedure has applied for some considerable time. It goes back to the days of Mr. Benson, Mr. Turner, Mr. Chrétien, Mr. Donald Macdonald, and also Mr. Crosbie, who came to see me in December last year. He had the same type of problem with his income tax act, and he needed the provisions of the amendments for the purposes of his budget, or so he represented to us. He said, "I know that these provisions which we redrafted from the bill of the previous government do not cover the situation fully and that they should be changed." I said, "Well, the procedure is simple. You come to the committee; you tell the story to the committee. Of course, we know that the bill does not cover the situation adequately because we have studied it with our experts; but, if we can agree on the language of such amendments now, and if you will come before our committee and undertake that at the next session an amendment in that form will be presented to Parliament, then we will pass the bill without amendment now." I said, "Remember that that only means the committee is recommending the bill for passage without amendment. It will be necessary, of course, for the Senate to adopt that."

So he appeared before the committee and gave the undertaking. We subsequently reported the bill without amendment, reciting the undertakings, and the bill was cleared without amendment.

That is a simple procedure and in my opinion is quite justified. Certainly up to this date, over all those years as I have recited them to you, there has never been an occasion on which any objection has been taken in the Senate to that type of procedure. As a result, we continue to follow that procedure because we assume it carries the blessing of the Senate.

Certainly, it is an expeditious procedure; it is a sensible way of dealing with that kind of situation, as opposed to, for the glory of it, interfering with the government's legislation at the last minute, when there is no chance of recovering your position. Moreover, by following this procedure you achieve the desired result, and at least to me and the other members of the committee it is the sensible thing to do and I have not heard any voices raised against that kind of procedure.

On this occasion the minister agreed that, if the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General of Banks examined the application of this subclause in the bill and agreed with our conclusions, he would follow our recommendation. For those of you who wish to see just what is involved, I am referring to clause 208.(1)(g) of the bill. The agreement was that, if those two men examined the evidence referred to in our various reports on this particular item and examined the projections that we had made as a result of the available evidence, and if they concluded that there was merit in the position that the Senate committee had taken on this point and that, in fact, the provision should be deleted from the bill, the minister would introduce an amendment to delete it.

Having those agreements from the minister, we thought the ends of public interest were being best served by recommending to the Senate that it pass this bill without amendment. However, that is only a recommendation. Because of that I thought it necessary to add these words of explanation, which is why I have taken this time.

Senator Donahoe: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Hayden: Certainly.

Senator Donahoe: You spoke of the procedure having been followed on earlier occasions and undertakings having been given by ministers. Can you assure the Senate that in all of those cases those undertakings were lived up to and that, in due course, the amendments that had been promised were in fact advanced?

Senator Hayden: Yes, I can. I can recall one instance, when we were studying the new tax legislation back in 1968-69-70; we had proposed what some people would have said was an almost infinite number of amendments. Mr. Benson was the minister at that time. He approved of those amendments and agreed that they should be in the bill. He introduced many of them into the House of Commons while that house was dealing with this bill. There were some amendments, however, that he did not get through in time. He was unable to get some of them through in time, so they were not included in the bill. He said, "What can I do about that? They should be in the bill, but I can't get them in now." I said, "Give your undertakings." So he appeared before the committee, gave his undertakings, and during the next session many of those amendments were introduced.

Then when John Turner became the Minister of Finance and appeared before the committee on the income tax bill and announced the scope and effect of a number of amendments, he said, "This is the last of the amendments in respect of which the undertaking was given by the previous minister that they would be included in a subsequent bill."

I recall an incident when Donald Macdonald, as Minister of Finance, appeared before the committee in connection with a proposed amendment to the income tax bill which he agreed should be changed. He said, "I will undertake not only to change it at the next session, but in the meantime I will make use of a provision in the Financial Administration Act which permits me temporarily to accomplish the same result."

So all our experience has indicated that when we are given an undertaking it is sincerely given and observed; and, of course, what underlies all that is what would happen if a minister gave an undertaking of that kind and did not implement it the next time around. I would speculate on what might happen. He might have a very difficult time before our committee.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, as a critic from the opposition who has been present throughout all the proceedings, I would certainly agree with my learned friend that the bill should be reported without amendment with—and this is very important—the agreement of the minister to accept further amendments.

Having heard the chairman cross-examine the minister, I can assure honourable senators that the minister is hog-tied. He will have to do what he undertakes to do, and I am sure he will do so willingly.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

TRIBUTE TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the government I wish to thank our distinguished Senator Hayden and the members of this committee for their outstanding work with respect to the Bank Act revisions. It has been a detailed and arduous process, which has taken place over a great length of time. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has worked with its usual diligence and competence. At a time when constitutional reform, including the role of the Senate and the other place, is under consideration by parliamentarians and many other people, the Senate has again demonstrated that as a body of sober second thought, and in a less partisan manner than the other place, it does extremely valuable work for the people of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

November 26, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 26th day of November, at 5.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION" TABLED

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled, "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution."

With the report, honourable senators, I am tabling two research papers, to which reference is made in the report, entitled, respectively, "Standing Senate Committees," and "Special Senate Committees."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be allowed to make a remark or two about the procedure that we have just followed in connection with this report. I understand that a press conference is being held in respect of this matter, and I would like to make a comment about that.

The Honourable Senator Lamontagne did me the courtesy yesterday to tell me that this document would be released to the press in a lock-up condition at 1.15 p.m. today, and that he would be conducting a press conference at 2 o'clock. I listened to that statement, and I must confess that while I did not give my consent, because it was not asked in that sense, neither did

I express any objections. So I want to be clear about that. On reflection, however, there are a couple of points I would like to bring to the attention of honourable senators.

First of all, from a procedural point of view, the report was issued to outsiders before we got it. That, of course, is a happenstance of the proceedings of this house, as a result of which we did not receive the report from the committee chairman until ten minutes to three. We also have a situation where an extensive explanation of the report is being offered elsewhere before it is offered here.

Without wishing to make too much of this situation, I do suggest to the Leader of the Government, and others, that on another occasion when a report is being tabled we might arrange our timing a little differently so that the Senate is given first crack at it rather than have it displayed, as is happening now, outside this chamber in the first instance.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, if I may comment on what Senator Roblin has just said, I have to say that I did not make any arrangements about the press conference. I knew there was going to be one, because that was suggested and agreed upon at one of the committee meetings. The last meeting was on October 30.

Senator Lamontagne told me yesterday at the meeting of the Joint Committee on the Constitution, of which both Senator Roblin and I are members, that he had spoken to Senator Roblin and had arranged with him that both would appear at a press conference. I did not know about the time of the conference, but he assured me that Senator Roblin had agreed to attend the press conference and participate in it.

Senator Roblin: I certainly accept my honourable friend's statement without question. The matter of my appearance was certainly discussed, but in my view it was left up in the air. Anyway, I did not go, as you can see.

My point is that I am not really complaining about a press conference. It is wise to give substantial distribution to the work we do. That is fine. My remarks are addressed merely to the question of the timing. It would be better if we were a little more conscious of the propriety of dealing with the matter in this house first, before giving it first publicity.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would just like to say that, being one of the quietest members of this august body, my applause and enthusiasm a few moments ago was directed towards and in appreciation of the distinguished chairman, not in reference to the procedure that was adopted.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are in this position. As honourable senators know, when a report comes from a committee it can either be presented for adoption or tabled and dealt with under an Inquiry or otherwise. I understand the committee agreed to table the report and then proceed by way of an Inquiry. There is then a difficulty with reference to the timing in order to meet the objectives that everyone seems to agree with, namely, to have the document widely circulated, and at the same time make sure that the press or others do not get first crack at it, to use Senator Roblin's words.

[Senator Roblin.]

• (1435)

Senator Asselin: But they did get first crack at it.

Senator Frith: You are quite correct; in a sense they did. The committee did its work, and I understand that it opted to proceed in this manner. There was some contretemps as far as timing was concerned because of the fact that Senator Goldenberg was to speak before Senator Hayden. That would have at least reduced the time gap. It was a mistake that Senator Hayden proceeded first.

The plan, as I understood it and as understood by the committee, was to proceed by way of an Inquiry. Accordingly, I propose almost immediately to give notice, in Senator Lamontagne's name, of an Inquiry for Tuesday next when the Senate can and will, of course, proceed with it.

There was only one other way, it seems to me, to have proceeded. That was not to have released the report until after the Inquiry had proceeded. That was the alternative. This report is the result of very important work done by the Senate committee, and the advantage of proceeding in the way we did is that the tabling of the report and the press conference will attract the attention of the public before the Inquiry is proceeded with.

This is not to say it could not have been done any other way, but this is the procedure that I thought the committee had agreed upon, so that the public and the press could see the report almost coincidentally with the Senate. The fact that Senator Hayden rose to table his report before Senator Goldenberg tabled his, thus switching the order of the presentation of reports, resulted in a delay of approximately three-quarters of an hour. That was not in the plan.

Senator Thériault: Do I understand that the report just presented was distributed to the press, and that a press conference was held before this document was tabled in this chamber?

Senator Frith: It was, but that was not the intention. As I said, the plan, as set out in the Clerk's Scroll, was for Senator Goldenberg to table his committee's report immediately before Senator Hayden tabled his report. The press conference on Senator Goldenberg's report was to take place at approximately 2.15 o'clock this afternoon. The distribution for the lock-up took place ahead of that time, which is the procedure followed when the budget and other such material is presented to Parliament. The half-hour lead time for the press conference resulted simply because Senator Hayden presented his report first.

Senator Asselin: It is not his fault.

Senator Frith: Of course not; I am not blaming anyone. If it is a matter of blame, I ought to have tugged Senator Hayden and said, "Wait for Senator Goldenberg." If what we are searching for, honourable senators, is blame, I will take the blame. But if we are talking about what the plan was and whether there was an intended discourtesy to the Senate, the plan was that there would be distribution, as is often the case, with an embargo to 2.15. The press conference would then take place at 2.15—there is not much point in having a press conference on a document if the press has not had a chance to read it—and by that time the document would have been tabled in the Senate chamber. The intention was to table the document here ahead of the press conference. As I said, the only reason that did not happen was that there was a mistake in the order of reports of committees.

Senator Thériault: I am not seeking to attach blame, but I attach great importance to the fact that a document was distributed to the press, even on a "lock-up" basis, with the time factor being 2 o'clock. I heard the Deputy Leader of the Opposition saying that the press conference was called for 2 o'clock.

Senator Roblin: That is what I was told.

Senator Thériault: I have been in this chamber for only a very short time, but it is my experience—and I think all senators will agree—that when the Senate is scheduled to meet at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, it infrequently does so because certain formalities must take place beforehand. I am not seeking to attach blame, but as one who sat in a legislature for a number of years, I would humbly suggest that in future we should be very careful in matters of this type.

● (1440)

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, what I want to say is not contradictory to the honourable senator, my colleague from New Brunswick, but I was inclined to ask what senators were asked to attend at a "lock-up," if I may use that irreligious expression. I might point out that on matters of the Bank Act, I trust the distinguished chairman of the committee, and Senator Walker and others, but had I known that the Constitution matter was going to emerge full-blown I would like to have been there, but no one gave me a chance to be there. I think I have the same feeling that Senator Thériault had, that perhaps we might be a little more sensitive in these matters. I was glad to hear Senator Hayden, because he knows more about the Bank Act than anyone else in Canada, but I would have been at the lock-up on the Constitution if anyone had invited me there. I don't know what good I would have done but I would like to have been asked.

Senator Goldenberg: I want the honourable senator to know that the chairman of the committee was not locked up himself.

Senator Frith: The record should show that all observations which have been made will be taken into account. I do want to underline the fact that the plan called for the constitutional document to be tabled in the chamber before the time set for the press conference, but when the item "Reports of Committees" was called, Senator Hayden was up and speaking on the Bank Act.

Senator Asselin: It was your business to have stopped him.

Senator Frith: Exactly. As Senator Asselin has said, at that point it was my business to have stopped Senator Hayden. That is why I said earlier that if any blame is to be attached, it is mine, and I apologize to the Senate for what happened.

Senator Asselin: We will move a vote of non-confidence.

Senator Frith: Senator Asselin is going to move a vote of non-confidence, and we will have to see what comes of that. In any event, that is the story of how this contretemps—which I think is the right word—took place.

Senator Macquarrie: The government leader was procedurally wrong but strategically right.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to make an observation in line with certain questions I asked the chairman of this committee a few days ago about the extraordinary delay in bringing this report before any body, whether it be the press or anyone else. I remember my resentment about being hurried with the work of this committee away back in July and August on the pretext that it was of the greatest importance, in order that the report would have the utmost beneficial effect, that it be ready for release, first, before the First Ministers' Conference; then immediately after that conference, and then finally before Parliament resumed. The First Ministers' Conference began on September 8, if my memory is right, and Parliament resumed on October 6. It is now November 26, and the last meeting of the committee took place many weeks ago.

Senator Goldenberg: October 30; less than a month ago.

Senator Smith: Even that was many weeks ago; and if the last meeting was not held until October 30, then that in itself was a pretty poor show. I want to register my feeling that there was no excuse for hurrying and hasseling the committee to get this work done quickly to meet what was represented to be a most important need, to have the report released when it would do the most good, only to have it finally released at the end of November and in circumstances which seem to be less than happy so far as the Senate is concerned.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wish to give notice, for Senator Lamontagne, that next Tuesday, December 2, 1980, he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution," tabled in the Senate today.

Senator Asselin: With your permission, honourable senators, I would like to indicate that so long as the Joint Committee on the Constitution is sitting, a number of senators, who must attend the sittings of that committee, will be unable to take part in the debate which is scheduled for next Tuesday. Approximately ten senators will have to go to the sittings of the Joint Commons-Senate Committee and will therefore be unable to hear Senator Lamontagne. Naturally, I like to read Senator Lamontagne's speeches but I much prefer listening to him. Therefore, some honourable senators will be deprived of the right to hear Senator Lamontagne express his views on the report before us.

In all fairness to the senators who must attend the sittings of the Joint Committee on the Constitution, I think the discussion should be postponed until some other day or time when all senators could be here.

Senator Frith: We most certainly accept that suggestion, honourable senators. I fully understand the point raised by Senator Asselin. But we have no choice in the matter since the sittings of the committee and those of the Senate overlap. If we could reorganize our sittings, that would be an excellent suggestion. We could consider it and discuss it with the opposition leader.

I intend to give notice that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday evening. But we could always change that to Tuesday afternoon and begin with Senator Lamontagne's presentation or, with the consent of the Senate, we could hear him on Wednesday before Question Period, or else, as I said, we could meet at two o'clock on Tuesday. We could then hear his speech and move the adjournment of the debate, depending on what could and should be done. Therefore, we could perhaps adjourn to Tuesday afternoon, since the Committee on the Constitution normally sits—

Senator Asselin: On Tuesday morning.

Senator Frith: At 3.30 p.m., I think.

Senator Asselin: Tuesday morning, afternoon and evening.

Senator Frith: Tuesday morning is difficult for those who have to travel.

[English]

Senator Asselin: I am not talking about resuming the Senate on Tuesday morning. I am talking about the fact that almost ten senators won't be able to listen to what Senator Lamontagne is going to say about this very important report, and we are concerned about it. You could postpone the notice that you have just given to the house to the effect that we sit on Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday morning at 11 if it is so important to discuss this report right now, or you could postpone discussion of this report until after we have finished the study of the report on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: As I have said before, that is always possible. For the time being, we will adjourn until Tuesday evening but, in the meantime, we can try to make some arrangement in line with the suggestion made by Senator Asselin. That is one suggestion—not so much for his sake, but to follow his suggestions.

At this time, that notice stands as the Order of the Day for next Tuesday. However, as we are masters of our own procedures, we can make other arrangements if we so wish.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I only want to add one word to say that I agree with Senator Asslin. He is right.

Senator Asselin: I am very happy to see that Senator Goldenberg has been agreeing with me for some time now. This is the only time really because, in committee, as he knows, we do not always agree.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Goldenberg: This is not the first time.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, I must tell you that this meeting is scheduled for 3.30 this afternoon, I think.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is possible that we shall have the opportunity to discuss later on during this sitting the possibility of making arrangements so that honourable senators can go to the East Block to pay their respects to our former Governor General. I think that the visit by honourable senators and the members of the House of Commons is scheduled between 3 p.m. and 5 p.m. this afternoon.

[English]

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I had but a brief opportunity to discuss this with the government house leader, but I feel very deeply about it. I personally do not have to express to anyone my views about the late former Governor General, and certainly not to his magnificent wife, whom I have had the honour of knowing for many years. I think, honourable senators and dear colleagues, we should this day, not only pay our respects to that wonderful man, but we should do it officially and properly; not merely do it while we are waiting for royal assent, or while we are doing nothing between this item and that item.

I trust Senator Hayden and his wonderful committee respecting their work on the Bank Act, because I know they know a thousand times more about that than I do, and I trust them on all other matters, but I think it is not enough for us to go over individually in our spare time to pay respects to that very distinguished man, our former Governor General, whose mortal remains are in the room next to my office in the East Block. I address myself to the Leader of the Government and the government house leader. I think we should today decide that the Senate will adjourn for that purpose.

One of the best things about the Senate, as distinct from the other place, where I spent a long time, as Senator Muir knows, is that we have far better and more reasonable rules. I think we should adjourn at some time today for the purpose of paying our respects to a very fine, distinguished, great Canadian, whom we honour in death as we did in life.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I make the following suggestion for your consideration. Before we adjourn today until our next sitting, I will, pursuant to a message that His Honour the Speaker will read, be moving that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 4.50 p.m., because royal assent is scheduled for 5 o'clock. I suggest that we try to complete our business by 4 p.m., which will give us almost an hour in which to pay our respects. The record will show that we are adjourning to resume at the call of the bell, and that in the meantime it is our intention as senators to pay our respects to the late Jules Léger.

Senator Asselin: The Northern Pipeline Committee is sitting at 3.30.

Senator Frith: That is a problem. You will have to make arrangements with your committee. I cannot do much about that.

Senator Macquarrie: The Deputy Leader of the Government, who I think is a very reasonable man, has said that the record will show that we did not go casually to pay our respects, but that we adjourned with that properly and decently in mind, and that is what I had in mind.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to associate myself fully with remarks of my colleague, Senator Macquarrie, and with the suggestion of the leader of the house that we adjourn at 4 o'clock for the purpose that has been mentioned.

In connection with the rest of the business, I should like to offer this suggestion to the government. I suggest that we call as the next item of business the resumption of the debate on the government's energy policy, item 6 on the order paper, to which Senator Balfour would like to make a contribution. If he finishes before 4 o'clock, I would request that we revert to Question Period for the remainder of the time available.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 2, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Molson has asked me to advise honourable senators that he would like to have a meeting of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders at 5 o'clock in the afternoon next Tuesday. I hope Senator Macdonald will be able to attend, because it will be a continuation of the meeting last week.

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 6:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular

1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;

2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;

3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;

4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and

5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.—(Honourable Senator Balfour.)

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I should first express my appreciation for this accommodation to my schedule.

I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on the so-called constructive energy policy of Prime Minister Trudeau. I listened with care, and have since read with care, the remarks made in this chamber last Thursday by Senator Argue. I have to say, honourable senators, that in the eight years I have spent in the Parliament of Canada I do not recall ever listening to a speech on an important subject like Canadian energy policy so riddled with inaccurate statements of fact. Let me cite a few examples.

In the opening paragraph of his speech the honourable senator stated:

> One element of surprise came about because the government did not impose an export tax on natural gas. I take it that was a welcome surprise for many people.

I wonder if the gas producers of Canada felt relief when the Government of Canada, in lieu of a tax applicable only to gas exports, imposed a tax on all gas produced, whether for export or domestic production.

● (1500)

Then there is the table of energy prices the honourable senator included in his speech as reported in Senate Hansard. He refers repeatedly to Premier Lougheed advocating world prices or OPEC prices for Canadian oil. I do not believe the honourable gentleman would deliberately mislead his colleagues on this question. I prefer to think that he was merely careless in marshalling his facts.

Premier Lougheed is clearly and unequivocally on record as saying that he is seeking not OPEC prices, but rather 75 per cent of OPEC prices, or the Chicago price, which ever is lower. That is a significantly different price regime from that described by Senator Argue.

Perhaps, however, it would be best to let Senator Argue's remarks speak for themselves. I must confess that when he launched his attack on the so-called multinationals, which he practically accused of raping the Canadian economy and pillaging western Canada, I wondered if he had somehow reversed himself and rejoined his political colleagues in the New Democratic Party—although I must add that, from my perspective, I find it increasingly difficult to distinguish policy initiatives advanced by Prime Minister Trudeau and those advocated by Mr. Broadbent, particularly as they apply west of Thunder Bay.

I shall make one final observation on the remarks of Senator Argue. Not long ago in this chamber he dismissed out of hand any talk of western separatist sentiment. I think his words, in effect, were that he had travelled the west extensively and never met a separatist. Now he concedes that such a movement may in fact exist, but he refuses to take it seriously. At the risk of being presumptuous, I offer some gratuitous advice to the honourable gentlemen and his cabinet colleagues who may share his views. I suggest that they abandon their attitude of smug complacency and wake up to what is really going on out there. The sense of alienation and outrage does exist and is significant, and it is not helpful to characterize strongly held views on unpopular federal policy as being some form of hysteria or over-reaction.

I should now like to identify those characteristics of the so-called energy policy and budget proposals which I consider to be counterproductive in the sense that they will work against what should surely be our fundamental policy goal—self-sufficiency and security of supply.

Honourable senators, I submit that Prime Minister Trudeau's sweeping new proposals on energy policy are nothing less than a surefire prescription for disaster. The Government of Canada proposes to outdo its counterparts in the United States, Norway, the United Kingdom, or any other developed country. Each of these countries has taken action detrimental to energy development, such as controlling prices below world market levels, or taxing away much of the revenue from oil sales, or confiscating ownership of oil operations, or legislating increased domestic ownership of industry, but no developed country has ever proposed doing all of these things—until now, that is.

If Prime Minister Trudeau's government gets its plan adopted, the consumer will suffer under a scenario of rapidly increasing dependence on ever more costly foreign oil.

All product prices, despite a government mandate of low prices for domestic crude, will soar far above what they would have been under a policy encouraging domestic development, and the enormous potential of Canada's tar sands, heavy oil, frontier oil and gas regions probably will never be realized. Without exception, industry leaders forecast a deepening of the Canadian recession, which analysists have been tracking for months, as money and equipment have been moved south to the United States where returns on new oil and gas are infinitely better than they are in Canada. Now this trend will surely be accelerated.

[Senator Balfour.]

Attempting to break the back of foreign companies may make Prime Minister Trudeau seem like a giant killer to some consumers, but the price which all consumers will pay for that spells not only bad economics, but bad politics.

Honourable senators, I wish to make this point abundantly clear. The damage that the energy budget proposals will do will not be limited to western Canada. The effects will certainly be felt there first, but those effects will spread to touch and harm the whole nation. Because of oil rigs leaving Saskatchewan and Alberta today, jobs will be lost in Ontario and Quebec tomorrow. It is not just the west that will suffer; it is the nation that will suffer. This is not just a western question; it is a national question.

Just to make the point, already in the community of Orillia, Ontario, a Canadian company, Fahramat, which manufactures castings used in the energy industry, has laid off 33 employees. That is the first group of workers to be laid off in Orillia. Last week, as a direct result of the budget, a Stratford, Ontario, manufacturing firm had a half-million-dollar contract with Alberta withdrawn, and it had orders for several million dollars' worth of other work delayed, perhaps to the point of never being acted on, because of the budget. Simmons Drilling Company of Calgary has announced that 10 of its 17 rigs are being forced to move south of the Canada-United States border because of the budget.

The effects of that spin-out are affecting large Canadian industries, such as the steel industry. Of the total output of the Canadian steel industry, 12 per cent goes into the energy industry in western Canada. The Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors estimates that only 5,500 wells will be drilled in Canada next year. That is down 40 per cent from last year's figure. It is down 40 per cent in one year, and that reduction will mean a loss of $2 billion to the economy of Canada—not just to the economy of western Canada but the economy of all of Canada.

The special tragedy of turning away Canadian investment and Canadian growth in the energy industry is that Canada today is in a recession. Many sectors of our economy are weak for reasons that are beyond the immediate control of the Government of Canada. One sector that was strong was the energy industry. The energy industry had the opportunity and capacity to help lead the nation out of the recession, but instead of taking advantage of that capacity, the Ottawa government, in a time of recession, has struck at the one industry that could have helped it fight the recession.

There is a capacity in the Canadian energy industry to lead the Canadian recovery, to help create new jobs, to help create Canadian security of supply, to help create and secure individual Canadian futures, but the Ottawa government, instead of fighting the recession, has added deeply to the recession by weakening a Canadian energy industry that was naturally and potentially very strong.

The Trudeau energy policy will, in the name of protecting Canada, force Canadian companies to leave, force the reduction of Canadian jobs, and force Canadian consumers to rely on Saudi Arabia and OPEC when they should be counting on Canada. The Trudeau energy policy helps the OPEC sheiks more than it helps the citizens of Canada. It provides jobs in Michigan and New York that should be provided to Canadians in Ontario and Quebec. It encourages exploration in Texas, Oklahoma and Wyoming that should be going on in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Last week, honourable senators, a special seminar was held in Toronto by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Mr. J. L. Thibault, Director of Economics, Canadian Manufacturers' Association, told the meeting that the loud and clear message from manufacturers is that their most important need is to have adequate and secure sources of oil and gas where needed, and at internationally competitive prices. He concluded that the energy policy does not serve this need and likely will lead to rationing. Mr. Thibault noted that the cashflow of the oil and gas exploration industry will be cut by 10 to 50 per cent, depending on circumstances, and said it is estimated that the exploration effort as a result will be reduced by 30 to 50 per cent. He went on to say that the whole situation right now is one of uncertainty and instability, and the most critical result is that we are losing momentum in what should be an all-out drive to improve and secure our supplies of petroleum. We may even be losing some major participants in the whole game and once this momentum is lost, it cannot be easily or quickly regained.

Mr. Thibault said that it was understandable that many companies had guessed that self-sufficiency in oil would be a top priority for Canada and had oriented their strategy accordingly, but the energy program has shown that these companies made a bad guess. The top priority in energy policy is government revenues and Canadianization.

Another prominent Canadian, Mr. Darcy McKeough, formerly Treasurer of Ontario and now President of Union Gas Limited of Chatham, Ontario, said in Hamilton earlier this week that Canada could benefit greatly by having a majority government with a four- to five-year mandate if it used the opportunity to begin carrying out an energy policy uncomplicated by politics and not obscured by public relations illusions. What Canadians are getting from Ottawa instead is a multi-million dollar advertising campaign designed to lull them into a false sense of security concerning oil resources; a program to change the ownership of existing enterprises, when the real need is to generate more activity by both foreign-owned and Canadian companies; increased uncertainties and delays when there is no time to spare; and disputes and regional animosities that have the potential for great harm to the economy and the unity of the country. Mr. McKeough went on to say that while a few people have passed a harsh judgment on Alberta's response to the federal budget, its measures were really quite moderate compared with some of the actions the province might have taken or might have tried to take. He described Premier Lougheed as a devoted and dedicated Canadian.

It is unfortunate that policy disagreements and disputes over the sharing of energy money and control are capable of dividing individual Canadians as deeply and as bitterly as our current disputes are doing. Mr. McKeough concluded by stating, "A subtle and deadly kind of detraction is going on in Canada in which an impression is spread that those who disagree with one are unpatriotic." He warned that the feelings engendered by this kind of debate could become a permanent threat to the real unity of the country.

Those were wise words uttered by an individual with great experience both in government and in the private sector. I would urge honourable senators to weigh them carefully.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if no honourable senator from the other side is going to move the adjournment to this debate, I shall do so, and I shall resume the debate at the appropriate time.

Senator Frith: I thank Senator Murray for noting that honourable senators on this side who might wish to adjourn the debate are not present at the moment. With his permission, I would ask leave to adjourn the debate myself. If it turns out that no one on this side wishes to participate, I shall yield to him.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are two courses open to us now. I understand that all the other items on the order paper are to stand. We can either stand them formally now and then revert to Question Period, or we can proceed to Question Period now and stand the remaining Orders of the Day later. Since we intend to adjourn at 4 o'clock, I suggest that we dispose of the remaining orders, and then revert to Question Period.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that all other Orders of the Day stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Orders stand.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ATTENDANCE OF CABINET MINISTERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, we on this side of the house have a number of questions which we wanted to put to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Leader of the Government advises us that he is at a cabinet committee meeting.

The Minister of State for Economic Development was here for less than an hour this afternoon. He left shortly after 3 o'clock. I want to make the following point about this: Up until very recently the attendance of ministers in this chamber has been more than satisfactory. The attendance of the minister who is still present, the Leader of the Government, has been exemplary. But in recent weeks it is happening more and more frequently that ministers are either absent or leaving early, and this interferes with the Question Period, especially on days when other orders are called between 2 o'clock and 3 o'clock and the Question Period is not reached until after 3 o'clock.

Today, the Minister of State for Economic Development has left early again, and I want to make the point that, while the Leader of the Government has said that the minister has to attend a cabinet committee meeting, I do not believe it is being presumptuous to suggest that when there is a conflict between a minister's attendance in this chamber and his other administrative duties, his attendance in this chamber should take priority.

GRAIN

SALES TO U.S.S.R.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, having delivered my word of complaint and caution, perhaps I might put a question to the Leader of the Government concerning the grain embargo on the Soviet Union, about which there were some exchanges with the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board the other day. My question, however, is to the Leader of the Government because I am asking him to ascertain from his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the basis on which the government calculates that five million tonnes or more per year is a normal and traditional level of Canadian sales. I ask him to obtain that information from the Secretary of State for External Affairs because it is Mr. MacGuigan who has to explain these matters internationally.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be directed to my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I suggest that we hear from the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, our colleague, Senator Hazen Argue, who in the national interest has spent many long hours working with this question.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, Senator Murray has complained that the ministers are not here. I have been guilty of not being present when I had other calls which I felt required my absence from the chamber. His question relates, I believe, to the policy of the Department of External Affairs, and neither the Leader of the Government nor I can discuss that, but I think I can answer the question on the basis of what is normal and traditional. To do so I may have to go through a little bit of a rigmarole, since one cannot just say offhand what is normal and what is traditional because we have seen what we feel to be a normal and traditional pattern build up with regard to the sale of grain to the Soviet Union over many years.

We were the first in that market. The pattern that has built up is that when the Soviet Union requires grain they come to Canada first. The normal and traditional pattern has also been that when we have had the grain supplies we have endeavored to provide them to that market. Over the years we have sold, depending on which year you take, anywhere from about 300,000 tonnes to something in excess of 5 million tonnes. If I recall correctly, in the year in which we sold an amount in excess of 5 million tonnes, the 5 million tonnes came out of western Canada, and some smaller additional quantities came from other parts of Canada.

Looking to the future and following the policy that I announced in the Senate on July 16, we are prepared to sell at normal and traditional levels. In this current year we are not prepared to accept, and have not accepted, a fixed ceiling. We have not endeavored, and we are not now endeavoring, and we shall not endeavor, to supplant the Americans in that market. I think in fairness it has to be pointed out to everyone that in the crop year just ended Canada was reduced to the fourth position in this market. We are the only exporting country that did not sell record quantities in that market in the crop year just ended.

We have suffered from the policy of the administration of Prime Minister Clark, which held us to 3.8 million tonnes. We do not accept that as a reasonable and fair basis; and if we should go to 5 million tonnes, or somewhat beyond 5 million tonnes, in the sale of grain to the Soviet Union this year, it should be kept in mind that the United States this year will sell larger quantities of wheat in that market than to Canada. We think it is certainly normal and traditional within those patterns to sell 5 million tonnes, or perhaps even more.

Senator Murray: The minister has indicated that there was one year, I believe, in the past 10 in which we sold 5 million tonnes to the Soviet Union. To clarify the point, I take it that the minister is selecting the one year in which we sold 5 million tonnes and defining that amount as being "normal and traditional."

Senator Argue: It was normal and traditional under the kind of criteria I have used for that particular time. Obviously, the Soviet Union bought 5 million tonnes because they needed it, and, obviously, we sold them 5 million tonnes because we had it for sale. That was normal and traditional at that time for that year; and under similar circumstances we want to be able to do that again.

I have no objection to the honourable senator's questions. It is pretty clear from his questioning that he is opposed—and I take it his party is also, but he may not be speaking for his party—to any sale beyond 5 million tonnes, or perhaps he is opposed even to going beyond 3.8 million tonnes. It would be interesting to me—and I am sure it would be interesting to the farmers out west—to know that the Conservative Party not only put this unfair arbitrary restriction on sales to a market where other exporting markets were allowed to sell record quantities, but would not have us get away from these restrictions.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Senator Murray: The Conservative government took its position and explained it, with the results that I think we are all aware of—in western Canada at any rate—in the last election. What I am trying to get from the minister is some information about the policy of the government. What he has just suggested is that what is normal and traditional as a level of sales is what the Soviet Union indicates it is willing to buy from us. If that is the case, what the minister is telling us is that the embargo no longer exists.

Senator Argue: I shall not comment on the honourable senator's contention that the embargo no longer exists. The honourable senator says that if we sell 5 million tonnes it means that we are into that market as hard as we can go. I would say this: As I understand the policy of the government, we are not endeavouring to supplant the American sales into that market, and we are not looking to go from 5 million tonnes to 10 million tonnes, or to some astronomical level; but we are endeavouring, in our own way, to protect what we believe are the legitimate interests of Canada, and of prairie producers, in that market, and that certainly does not mean staying at 3.8 million tonnes. Indeed, we moved away from that policy as long ago as mid-July.

Senator Murray: I will not ask the minister to define an "astronomical level", since I have failed to get him to define with any precision what is a normal and traditional level. What the minister has really said is that a normal and traditional level is whatever the Soviet Union indicates it is willing to buy from us.

Let me leave that on the record for the moment, and perhaps we can come back to it another day when we have some more information, because I would like to have the report, through the Leader of the Government, from his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As I say, it is that honourable gentleman who has to explain these things for Canada in the international community.

Senator Perrault: Because of the expertise of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, the Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs listens carefully to his views.

Senator Murray: I am extremely interested to hear that. Perhaps some questions could be asked of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the other place about that matter. I will leave it for the moment.

However, I want to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, as one who follows world grain markets and is interested in these matters—without entering into a discussion of the appropriateness or otherwise of grain embargoes as a policy recourse in international affairs, since that decision was made when the embargo was imposed—what his perception is of the effect of the grains embargo on the Soviet Union and its allies. For example, what can the minister tell us about the reported slaughter of livestock in the Soviet Union and the extent to which the grain embargo, together with the poor crop year in that country, may have been partly responsible; and, secondly, about whether the grains embargo to the Soviet Union has affected that country's ability to export grains to its allies in Europe—Poland, for example—and in Asia—Laos and Vietnam, for example?

Senator Argue: I have now quite a few questions to answer. Earlier Senator Murray said something like this: Is it the Canadian policy, when there is a demand in the Soviet Union for a large supply of grain, that we supply it? It takes two things. First, it takes a large demand, if there is going to be a large sale, and it takes a large supply. So there is—

Senator Murray: And the transport system to get it there.

Senator Argue: Our transport system is very capable. Last year—

Senator Murray: It has a terrible reputation under your government.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Senator Argue: —we transported and exported the largest quantity of grain in history.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Because of our minister too.

Senator Argue: The Tory government was not there all year. The honourable senator may have wished it was there, and it was his own party's fault that it wasn't there. Imagine losing a vote after you were in government. Imagine Mackenzie King being in office and letting the division bells cease ringing when he was not able to carry the vote. He would have had them ringing for 48 hours and thus saved his government. But they never thought of that. You see, that cabinet did not want anybody with experience. They said, "Well, if you were a John Diefenbaker cabinet minister, there is no place for you in the Clark government." But if they had taken in a few of those old-timers—

Senator Macdonald: On a point of order, I wonder if the minister would answer the question rather than vilifying the former government.

Senator Argue: It may be a point of order, but we get these little needles that do not really have any substance to them. However, there is a little substance to my reply, because it is accurate.

Senator Frith: I hope it is perfectly clear that we on this side do not complain in any way about the result.

Senator Argue: I am not complaining; I am enjoying it. I get an opportunity to talk a little longer.

Senator Perrault: Carry on.

Senator Argue: From what I have read, I think it is correct to say that the partial embargo—and it was only that—on the export of grains to the Soviet Union did have some adverse effect on the maintenance of their livestock. I believe there were increased sales, so that initially it probably increased their marketing of livestock; but the immediate effect was to reduce their production, their breeding herds, and so on.

Senator Murray should also take into account—and I believe this to be a fact—that the reduction undertaken by the United States was a reduction in the sale of feed grains into the Soviet Union, and what they called on Canada to do—and the Clark government went along with it—was to hold back our sales of wheat for human consumption.

The honourable senator may think there is no difference, but I really think there is. When you say to a country, "We are going to reduce the sales of grain for your livestock industry," that is one thing, but when you say, "We are going to reduce the sales of grain for human consumption," that is something else.

It may well have been the case that the embargo resulted in the U.S.S.R. exporting lesser quantities of grain to satellite nations, but I think the honourable senator should keep in mind that the Americans had no embargo on American sales to Poland. So if the holding back of Canadian grain to the Soviet Union resulted in the Soviet Union being able to supply less grain to Poland, the Americans would welcome that because their policy was to supply grain to Poland, which they did.

● (1530)

Just a little while ago the present American administration removed its restrictions on United States multinational companies taking grain to the Soviet Union. They said, "We have an embargo, but ships can go there." If that is not an encouragement to "bootleg", or whatever the right word would be, I do not know what is.

I think Senator Murray should also take into account the fact that the President-elect of the United States has said that he will not go along with this embargo, that he will remove it, and that there will be a new policy. The other day I saw a quote from Clayton Yeutter, who was the leading authority in the Reagan campaign, having to do with agricultural policy in which he said that when the Reagan administration takes office, it will remove the partial embargo to the Soviet Union. I believe Clayton Yeutter was the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture when Mr. Butz was Secretary of Agriculture.

I think it is in our interest, either today or in the near future, to remove these restrictions placed upon us with respect to the sale of grain to the Soviet Union, and to revert to our past pattern of providing quantities to that market at normal and traditional levels without any ceiling.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, from the outstanding potato-growing area of Canada, I have a question about wheat, supplementary to the question asked by my colleague, Senator Murray.

I was in the House of Commons with the honourable minister when his political heroes were J. M. Woodsworth and M. J. Coldwell. Today he has venerated Mackenzie King, and I say, "What a decline into mediocrity," but that is his business, and I do not make judgments.

I should like to ask the honourable minister if, in fact, the basic problem is that the government of the day—regrettably the government of the day—has been following the policies of the government which it criticized, namely, supporting the American boycott, the burden of which, in the long run, was placed upon the backs of Canadian farmers, Canadian athletes and very few other Canadians. Does the minister not feel great resentment that the Yankee traders have made a deal with the Chinese with no regard for Canadians, and are playing games which are not incumbent upon a decent relationship between our two countries?

Senator Argue: We are concerned about the deal that was made between the Government of the United States and the Chinese government in this last grain arrangement of from 6 to 9 million tonnes. The agreement is that if the Chinese need a larger quantity of grain than 9 million tonnes, the United States will expect them to purchase it from the United States. If they have to go below the floor of 6 million tonnes, they will apportion the reduction among other exporting nations. That is a very disturbing matter as far as our relations with the United States are concerned. We are concerned about that particular agreement.

If I may revert for just a moment to our policy with regard to the embargo, I have taken a very strong lead position in having this policy changed. I have made recommendations to the Government of Canada, to the appropriate places that Senator Murray would expect, and I feel that my recommendations have met with every success, for which I am appreciative.

Senator Macquarrie: As a supplementary—and it is semi-smuggled—I want the minister to know that I am not one of his worst critics, because all his faults are usually not by intention. I recall that the man who knows more about the movement of western grain than anyone in Canada, the Honourable Alvin Hamilton, has said good words about this minister, and I listen to that. I would ask him to reflect upon the expression that Benjamin Franklin used many years ago, that perhaps on this international matter the Americans "diddled" us.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government if there are some delayed answers to questions which he could present at this time. If not, we can continue with questions. I ask this only because I know it is the intention of honourable senators to adjourn at approximately 4 o'clock.

Senator Frith: The Question Period belongs largely to the opposition, so perhaps we should hear what their feeling is in the matter. Would they prefer to proceed with further questions or move to delayed answers?

Senator Macquarrie: More questions.

ITALY

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—SAFETY OF CANADIANS IN AREA

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a very brief question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I asked him yesterday if he had any news concerning Canadians in the earthquake area of southern Italy. Can he give this information to the Senate today?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do have some information. Yesterday I was asked whether any Canadians had suffered as a result of the terrible earthquake tragedy in Italy. In the latest telegram today, of which I have a copy, our embassy in Rome reported that they had just been informed by Italian authorities that there are no Canadians among the victims who have been identified to date. It is possible, however, that a Canadian connection with some persons among the casualties—persons who are citizens of both Italy and Canada—may yet be established.

In addition, Canada has already announced a donation of $100,000 to the Canadian Red Cross. Cabinet is formulating a plan for Canada's financial response to the situation beyond that amount. It is expected that that response will be announced shortly.

Honourable senators, shortly before the commencement of our sitting today, I was advised that there has been another severe earthquake in Venezuela and Colombia.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PEACE IN MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN INITIATIVES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Before the Question Period ends, honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would bring us a more full and complete statement on what the Prime Minister had in mind when, in the press conference with President Sadat, he indicated that Canada might be more involved in the pursuit of Middle East peace.

I am not one of those who think that any man, even our Prime Minister, is always wrong, and I would like to hear more about what the distinguished Prime Minister had in mind and, at some later date, I will ask the government leader to tell the Senate what positive measures the Prime Minister did, in fact, indicate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, honourable senators. I do not have a current status report.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, pursuant to the earlier discussion and, more specifically, the intervention of Senator Macquarrie, I propose that we now suspend our sitting to reassemble at the call of the bell shortly before 5 o'clock for royal assent, and that we use the intervening time, as we had planned—it is not an accident that we are free now, but a deliberate plan—to pay our respects to the memory of the late Right Honourable Jules Léger. Further to that same sentiment, the Senate will not sit tomorrow, the day of his funeral.

If that meets with your approval, honourable senators, the bell will summon you to royal assent at approximately 4.50.

Senator Macquarrie: The deputy house leader has expressed well the sentiment which this body feels at this time.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF MEETING

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, before we rise, may I make an announcement?

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs was called to meet on the rising of the sitting of the Senate this afternoon. That meeting has now been cancelled.

A number of witnesses were summoned to appear before the committee. They have been discharged, and asked to return at 9.30 tomorrow morning. The committee will meet tomorrow morning at 9.30.

I make this announcement for the benefit of members of the committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The committee does not need permission to meet because the Senate is not sitting at that time. I hope honourable senators have taken note of that announcement.

Incidentally, that is connected with the point raised by Senator Smith yesterday. I understand that a number of committees will be sitting tomorrow, but the Senate itself will not be sitting.

To allow honourable senators to pay their respects to the late Right Honourable Jules Léger, the sitting was suspended, to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 4.50 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

> An Act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 2, 1980, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 2, 1980

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTILAC LTD. AND SOCAM LTD.—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-13, to revive Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd., and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

TREMUS INDUSTRIES LIMITED—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-14, to revive Tremus Industries Limited, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons in the following words:

Tuesday, December 2, 1980

Ordered,—That the Order of Reference creating the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada be amended by deleting the words "December 9, 1980" and substituting therefor the words "February 6, 1981"; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof and to invite them to join with this House in the aforementioned action.

Attest:

C. B. Koester
The Clerk of the House of Commons.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER OF REFERENCE AMENDED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

That the Senate join with the House of Commons in amending the Order of Reference creating the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada by deleting the words "December 9, 1980" and substituting therefor the words "February 6, 1981"; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

● (2005)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it seems that the mover does not wish to speak in introduction of this motion, but I should like to make some comments about it. I am not at all critical of the mover's silence, because the motion is self-explanatory and does not require further explanation. However, it might be useful for the house to know that at this afternoon's meeting of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution a resolution was carried to the effect that when this motion becomes the approved statement of both houses of Parliament, the timing in respect of the presentation of briefs and the receipt of applications from interested parties to appear as witnesses will be reconsidered.

As honourable senators are aware, the deadlines have now passed and people cannot at this point submit new briefs or ask to appear as witnesses. It is, I think, useful for honourable senators to know that consideration will be given to extending those deadlines. The matter has been referred to the steering committee for the purpose of giving consideration to such extensions.

I am also glad to say that it was made quite clear—and again the steering committee will be looking into this—that we do expect to receive more briefs and to have other witnesses come forward. Contrary to the previous decision of the committee, it now appears that there is a possibility that private citizens will be able to present briefs in addition to those representing organizations. This could be a valuable change in the plan of operation as it would, no doubt, permit expert witnesses to be called to testify.

In light of the terms of reference, which instruct the special joint committee to consider the suitability of the government's action in this respect, it is quite obvious that questions of legitimacy and constitutional propriety, and, indeed, of the effect of court applications, are proper subjects to be discussed. Certainly, in my opinion, they are proper subjects to be discussed by this committee.

The committee, I submit, will not be able to fulfill its mandate unless it has an opportunity to do these things. So, I am cautiously optimistic that the committee's previous decision not to hear expert witnesses will now be reconsidered. That is certainly my hope.

It is for those reasons that I have some interest in seconding this motion. I am also interested in the fact that the date of February 6 was the date originally proposed by some opposition members of the committee as being the proper date to which to extend the committee's hearings. Whether we will be able to complete our business by February 6 is still, to my mind, an open question, but we will have a much better chance to do so than under the unrealistic deadline of December 9.

While I am on my feet, I wish to refer to an interchange which took place last Tuesday between myself and the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the status of the Senate in these proceedings. I pointed out to the government leader that the matter had been referred to the house leaders by the committee and that it appeared at that time that that did not include the house leaders in the Senate. I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate about that, and in reply to me, as reported at page 1305 of Debates of the Senate of Tuesday, November 25, he said:

> With respect to Senate participation in the process of that final determination, there will be substantial Senate involvement.

Perhaps the government leader could report to the Senate exactly what that involvement consisted of.

He went on further to say:

> However, now that he has suggested—

And I think he was talking about me at the time.

> —that he thinks there is merit in house leaders discussing this matter, and has said so publicly and in his usual eloquent way, with the support of the Honourable Senator Asselin who spoke on it today, I will be more than delighted to meet with the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate to discuss this matter.

I should like to know whether such discussions took place between these two leaders.

It seems to me that if we let the matter of a joint committee's procedure with respect to reporting back to the two houses go without remark when the Senate has been overlooked, at least to some degree, we would not be serving the interests of the public in the matter. So, I would ask the government leader to tell us what the "substantial Senate involvement" was in the final determination, and I would also ask him whether there was any consultation with the Leader of the Opposition, as his statement indicated there would be.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Let me say, first of all, that I know that all honourable senators welcome the decision taken by the members of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution to recommend that the hearings of the committee be extended until February 6—

Senator Roblin: They did not do that; they recommended that they not be extended.

• (2010)

Senator Perrault: But the decision to extend the hearings was taken in the other place.

Senator Roblin: Not by the joint committee.

Senator Perrault: I can assure honourable senators that the decision in the other place to extend the time in the ultimate, had the support of the government supporters on the joint committee.

Senator Roblin: That is not the way they voted.

Senator Perrault: Secondly, I want to assure every member in this chamber that the views set forth by honourable senators during the course of debate and Question Period here were brought to the attention of the government. I reported to the government the general consensus of senators that the joint committee reporting date be extended. I stated that in my opinion my recommendation represented the view of both the supporters of the government in this house and representatives of the official opposition. As I inferred in a reply given me last week, consideration was being given then by the government to the possibility of an extension of committee hearings. I was very much involved in the discussions which took place in cabinet, and in discussions with certain members representing the government in those committee deliberations. I know that honourable senators welcome the fact that a positive decision has now been taken in the other place.

I regret that the Leader of the Opposition and I were not able to get together for a discussion during that period of time, but the ultimate result, I believe, has more than met the expectation of the honourable Leader of the Opposition and his deputy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not exactly. If I recall correctly, the motion we made when we were discussing the resolution was to invite the committee to report no later than March 1, but that was defeated.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only say that the distinguished leader of the Conservative Party—

Senator Flynn: You have come half way.

Senator Perrault: —seconded the motion in the other place, which rather suggests to me that there was a substantial amount of support for the date of February 6 on the part of the Conservative Party.

Senator Flynn: I am not opposing it.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I intend to support the motion before us, which I consider an excellent one. I do not believe there is any thinking person in Canada who thought that there was anything proper or realistic about the original deadline that was set for the report of this committee. It must have been obvious, and was obvious, from the very beginning that December 9 would give no real opportunity for those persons who wished to do so to make their views heard and thus play some part in the shaping of our Constitution.

Accordingly, from the very beginning, we on this side said that the date should be extended. As my leader has just said, we moved in this house that it be extended to March 1. Subsequently, in the other house there was a motion, and I believe the date selected there was February 6. February 6 is now the date for the presentation of the report of the special joint committee.

I rise because I would not want it thought that because we once moved that the reporting date be extended to March 1, while in the other house there was a motion moved to extend it to February 6, we necessarily thought that was the beginning and end of the matter, or that we agreed that by advancing the report date to February 6 we were, in fact, giving adequate opportunity to the Canadian people to make themselves heard in this process of constitutional amendment. At the time we moved that the date be March 1, and members of the other house moved that it be February 6, there was a list of persons who had indicated their desire to be heard, but since those motions were made that list has grown considerably longer. Instead of there being relatively few people saying they had views which they wanted to put before the committee, there are now hundreds of such persons and groups of persons. At that time we were of the opinion that it would be possible to bring before the committee all those persons, learned in the law and skilled in constitutional matters, who would have opinions on the propriety and desirability of what was being done, and that those views would be put before the committee in order that it might have the benefit of that distilled wisdom. As it turned out, they have been deprived of that opportunity, and even now, with the extended date, they have no assurance that that opportunity will be granted to them.

I rise at this time merely to say that nobody should interpret the agreement today on February 6 as meaning that those who agreed to that date are necessarily saying that that settles the matter once and for all, and that there might never arise in the future conditions which indicate that there is no necessity for extending it further. I do not believe anybody should have that opinion, since it may very well be that as February 6 approaches it will still be possible to demonstrate that that date is too early. I understand, in some of the speeches made in the House of Commons before the vote was taken on the extension, that the caveat was voiced that this was, in fact, the attitude of those who were prepared to support the extension to February 6.

I want to be sure that there is no misunderstanding about what we on this side of the house feel with respect to this. While I support the motion, because I think it is desirable, I reserve the right to insist later that it may be appropriate to extend the date still further.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I am not going to take up very much of your time—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Smith: Do not be so encouraging, or I might find it useful to help you appreciate more the fact that at some other time I might take less of your time.

I rise to say that I concur with the view of the Honourable Senator Donahoe to the effect that we may find—and I think it very likely that we will find—that February 6 is not a tenable date, and I do not want to be bound by silence tonight to the view that I subscribe to this as being the final date. It is obvious to anybody who knows what is going on in that committee, and the requests to be heard that have poured in, that the committee would have to perform marvels of accomplishment of hard work, day and night, to give adequate response to all those requests before February 6.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I have said from the beginning, and I repeat, that the best you will do in respect of this matter is patriate the Constitution, and, if you are lucky, you may get a formula. That, however, is all you will get, and that will go through the British houses of Parliament. This extension of time just means more waste of time, if one can judge by the complete lack of progress to date. It is like the confusion of Babel over and over again.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have listened to the arguments on this question so far, and as a Canadian I appreciate the extension of the time, within which the conclusions of this committee are to be reported, from December 9 to February 6. I think that is great, but an understanding of why there might be a further extension is beyond me.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Robichaud: I can understand Mr. X and his wife, or perhaps Mr. Flynn and Mrs. F, making an application to appear before the committee, but that could be kept going indefinitely. There is absolutely no question about that. Our friends on the opposite side realize that.

Last night I watched a program on television called Front Page Challenge. Everybody knows that program. One of the interviewees was Premier Angus MacLean. He was chastised by the panel, in the persons of Pierre Berton, Betty Kennedy, Gordon Sinclair and Paul Hellyer, of all people. Paul Hellyer said, "The action you are taking is just atrocious," or something to that effect. They ridiculed the action of Premier MacLean in challenging in court the action taken at the moment by the government on what is not even law. I think it is ridiculous.

● (2020)

In my view, it is a good move to extend the time to February 6, but there has to be a deadline somewhere. Everybody who has a voice can be heard between now and February 6; everybody who represents a group of people can be heard between now and February 6. I repeat that I welcome this move, but any extension of this new date would be in effect saying that we have been working on this for 53 years—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no.

Senator Robichaud: Well, you may say 60 years, you may say 30 years, or you may say from 1960—anybody can select his own date, but the fact remains that we have to have a deadline, and the government of the day, with the consent of honourable senators serving on the committee, agreed that it should be extended to February 6. As I have said, I welcome this, but I do not think the date should be extended beyond February 6.

Senator Donahoe: Will the honourable senator permit a question? Is it not true that in the course of the program about which he spoke, when Pierre Berton charged Premier MacLean that the premiers had been unable to reach unanimity, he received the answer, "We had the unanimity of ten premiers, and the only one who would not agree was the Prime Minister of Canada." And did he not say, in effect, that everybody was out of step except Johnny, so everybody had to change step in order to get in line with the views of the federal government. Is that not what was said on that program?

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, yes. That is what was actually said on television, but it was not true. I do not want to get into a debate right now, but it is true that he said that, but what he said was not true.

Senator Asselin: How come you know that?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not really want to stop this interesting review of last night's TV program—I am sorry; I did not realize Senator Smith was on his feet.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I want to know if my old friend and colleague from New Brunswick, Senator Robichaud, would allow me to ask a question. Is he advocating that we should accept the view that government by television is the way in which we should run the affairs of this country to the extent that we have the power to do so.

Senator Robichaud: No. I say, in answer to that silly question, that it is not my view that government should be controlled by television.

Senator Smith: You gave me a silly answer.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as mover of the motion, I point out that I do not have the advantage that Senator Roblin has of being a member of the committee, but I thank him for his report indicating that there are a number of things—

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Are you closing the debate? I wanted to speak to the motion.

Senator Frith: I am sorry.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, there is a motion before the house. Usually I find myself in agreement with my friend, Senator Robichaud, the former Premier of New Brunswick, but this time I don't. I want it clearly understood that if I support this motion, which I intend to do, I am in no way saying that I would not entertain a motion at some future date for a further extension of the work of this committee.

● (2025)

I think it is impossible at this time to determine that we will have properly heard the people of Canada, who are legitimately interested in this important matter, by any specific date. I felt from the beginning that it was unrealistic to have a target of December 9. It seems to me that February 6 may be reasonable. I certainly hope it will be and that the work can be done by then. If it cannot, I would not want my support of this motion now to be taken as an indication that I would not entertain a motion for a further extension of the date if that seemed necessary.

Senator Frith: To continue briefly, honourable senators, I want first to thank Senator Roblin, a member of the committee, for giving us some perspective of the increased opportunities for study this extension will afford.

Secondly, I want to thank Senator Roblin for his implied support for the proposition that the government always keeps an open mind and pays very close attention to suggestions made by the opposition, as it has in this case, by accepting, specifically, the date proposed by the opposition.

Thirdly, I want to thank Senator Smith and Senator Donahoe for drawing to our notice that if we had been paying any attention to the procedures and activities of this committee, we would not be under any illusion that, when the Conservative Party supports this extension to February 6, we will hear no more from them on the point. We are under no such illusion.

Senator Flynn: You forgot to thank Senator Robichaud.

Senator Frith: I thought I would leave that to you. I thanked him for the TV review.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 3rd December, 1980, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

By way of explanation I should like to say that the committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Smith, has moved very quickly on the reference by the Senate to look into the question of the closing of express offices and other related matters. The committee expects to have before it tomorrow the President of Canadian National Railways. Because of some time exigencies relating to the president's schedule, as I am given to understand by Senator Smith, it would be preferable for the committee to commence its sitting at 3 o'clock instead of, as originally intended, when the Senate rises.

I think the chairman of the committee should be congratulated for the expeditious way in which his committee has put this reference into effect, and therefore, I suggest that we agree to the committee's having this special right to sit tomorrow, even though it means it will be sitting at the same time as the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his remarks and his support in this situation.

Perhaps I should say one or two further words. I felt, from the mood of the Senate, that it was desirable to start hearings on this reference as soon as that could reasonably be done. After some negotiation with the President of the CNR we were able to reach agreement that he would come tomorrow afternoon if we could free him by about 5 o'clock. In order to do that it seemed to me that two hours would be the minimum time, from 3 o'clock to 5 o'clock, in which to accommodate the wishes of senators who might want to ask questions of him. Therefore, with the consent of those members of the committee who were present at the time, I agreed to make this request of the Deputy Leader of the Government.

I hope it will be possible to have a good attendance, particularly more than a quorum, at that committee meeting tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock, assuming the Senate agrees to this motion, so that it will be clear, not that we have the bare minimum requirement of attendance in order to carry on business, but that we have a demonstration of the fact that members of the Senate are indeed keenly interested in this problem.

Hon. Daniel Riley: I should like to put a question to the chairman of the committee. Although, as the chairman says, Dr. Bandeen has other commitments at 5 o'clock, I take it that does not preclude his officials from remaining in case there are further questions by members of the committee. I think we discussed this at the last committee meeting.

Senator Smith: I am glad Senator Riley has mentioned that, because I should have included it in my brief comment. I am assured that Dr. Bandeen will be accompanied by the President of Canadian National Express, who has not the same time commitments as Dr. Bandeen and should, therefore, be available to the committee for a longer period, should the committee so desire.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I appreciate, as I am sure we all do, that traditionally the Senate has been a bit reluctant to grant committees the right to meet when the Senate is in actual session. However, as one of those senators who raised some issues here a week or so ago, and as one who supported the idea that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, under the chairmanship of Senator Smith, should try to arrange a meeting with Dr. Bandeen and other officers of Canadian National Railways, I would like, although I am sure I do not need to do so, to urge that tomorrow the committee be given this special right to meet while the Senate is sitting.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF MEMBERS TO MEET NON-STATUS INDIAN CONSTITUENTS

Hon. Daniel Riley: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government to instruct members of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution not to grant interviews to non-status Indians who seek to meet with their elected representatives sitting on the committee?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no information, or even any intimation, that any such suggestion has been made or any such instructions have been issued.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I suppose the question refers only to members of the committee who are of the government political allegiance, because I am quite sure that no instructions like that have been given to members of the other parties sitting on the committee.

Senator Riley: I did not refer to members of the opposition. I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if that was government policy, because I am informed that non-status Indians with whom I met today—young people and mostly women—were refused the opportunity to meet their elected representatives. Quite apart from the Senate, I think an elected representative is bound to meet with his constituents, whether they be natives, black, white, Catholic, Protestant or anything else, and I deplore this attitude.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—PROPOSED INCLUSION OF PMU UNITS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board in relation to his responsibility for the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program. I believe that the minister has received some representations regarding the operators of PMU units in western Canada, certainly from the Province of Manitoba regarding their inclusion under the program. I believe that the program has already been extended to include other types of livestock operations. In this particular case I think the operators are faced with the obligation of maintaining their herds, because most of them operate under contract, and if they do not fulfil their contract they will lose the opportunity to remain in that type of business. I think there are some 94 operators affected in Manitoba. There may be some affected in other western provinces. Is the minister considering extending the program to cover these operators?

Senator Flynn: Of course.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I doubt if the Leader of the Opposition knows what the initials PMU stand for, but he may well.

I am pleased that this question has been brought to my attention, because certainly the operators of those units in the western provinces have been under exactly the same disability as have beef producers or dairy cattle operators. I do not have control over the policy. That is dealt with by a cabinet committee, but I think Senator Molgat's suggestion is an excellent one. It carries a great deal of merit, and I shall be pleased to bring it to the attention of my colleagues.

Senator Molgat: I have a supplementary question. Could the minister indicate when the decision might be made in this regard?

Senator Argue: In time to get the money out. We need to have a meeting within a few days to make some other decisions with regard to the administration of this, so I hope it will be quite soon.

Senator Murray: What cabinet committee is considering this matter?

Senator Argue: It is one of the special committees. It may be an ad hoc committee, but it is an important functioning committee and it does a great deal of valuable work. The committee is chaired by Senator Olson, who chairs many other important cabinet committees. I am pleased that he is in the Chair because he understands the problems, and we get important decisions made.

Lloyd Axworthy is a member of the committee, as is—

Senator Flynn: Don't spoil it.

Senator Argue: —Senator Perrault. It consists of a group of western ministers, plus the Minister of Agriculture. It is an important program and it will pay out approximately $60 million to help maintain the herds in western Canada.

FINANCE

TAXATION OF CAPITAL GAINS—DEFINITION OF CANADIAN-CONTROLLED PUBLIC COMPANIES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development arising out of a document entitled "A Review of the Taxation of Capital Gains in Canada," published by the Department of Finance last month. In that document the government is arguing against exempting, as was proposed by the previous government, publicly traded shares of Canadian-owned companies from the capital gains tax.

In arguing against that, the government is citing the difficulty of identifying what is a Canadian company. In doing so, the document states, in part:

> For example, if relief were to be provided for shares of Canadian-controlled public companies, one would need to decide how Canadian control was to be determined. Should the relief apply to common shares only (voting, non-voting) or should it extend to preferred shares that are convertible into common, to all preferred shares, to rights, warrants, and income debentures? Would Canadian control be determined by 50-per-cent ownership of a class or classes of shares or would some other concept of effective control be necessary? How would the true beneficial ownership of shares be determined? This effective control test should take cognizance of the dispersion of shareholdings, the residence and/or nationality of management and the characteristics of different classes of shares, and would inevitably require rules to look through registered shareholders to determine the ultimate shareholders.

I am sure the Minister of State for Economic Development can anticipate my question. If the Department of Finance feels that this cannot be done in the case of exempting publicly traded shares of Canadian companies, how is it that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources feels it can be done in the case of its national energy policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Senator Murray has raised a very complicated problem. He went through quite a lot of the problems that may be involved in deciding ownership, control, beneficial ownership, and that sort of thing, but certainly not all of the problems associated with that. Certainly the government is in a position, because of the energy policy, to indeed come up with a formula at least for that purpose, whether or not it applies or extends to taxation law. As soon as that formula is available, I will be pleased to provide it to him.

Senator Murray: I believe the formula, or what purports to be a formula, has already been published by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I wonder whether the minister would also ascertain how the formula to be used by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources compares with the formula used by the Foreign Investment Review Agency, and bring a statement to the Senate explaining those matters?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice.

[Senator Murray.]

ENERGY

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—FEDERAL LOAN TO IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

A statement in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, November 29, 1980, claims that officials of Imperial Oil believe that the putting of $40 million into the Cold Lake project by the Government of Canada has indicated the government's willingness to rethink its oil prices and tax policy.

Have indications, other than the granting of the $40 million, been given to Imperial Oil Limited? Can they really anticipate changes to the energy package announced as part of the budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I answered a question similar to that on November 25. It was not put exactly in that context, but the advancing of $40 million to keep the Cold Lake project alive is not conditional on any changes being made in either the energy program or the budget. It is there because we believe that that project has the potential of supplying perhaps as much as 10 per cent of Canada's oil requirements when it comes on stream. Therefore, we believe that, and a number of other projects, developing the tar sands, or the heavy oil, whichever you like to call it, is probably one of the best prospects for fulfilling the government's aspirations toward self-sufficiency.

Senator Doody: The same report says that Imperial Oil officials regard the $40 million as a down payment and need much more help in the development of its Cold Lake project. I gather from the minister's answer that there has been no further government commitment to invest in that particular project, but that, perhaps, it might be looked at as it goes along?

• (2050)

Senator Olson: The extent of the commitment is already known to the honourable senator, and I would like him to understand, as I am sure he already does, that is it a loan. It is a loan which, once the project comes on stream, will be paid back with interest.

COME-BY-CHANCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—OIL REFINERY—ACQUISITION BY PETRO-CANADA

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might trespass upon the good nature of the Minister of State for Economic Development to ask him a question about the purchase by Petro-Canada of the Come-by-Chance oil refinery in Newfoundland.

Has Petro-Canada been able to come up with a firm plan for the operation, in a successful commercial sense, of this refinery?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the short answer is that I shall take the question as notice, because I understand Senator Smith would like an update as to where the negotiations are at

now. There is, of course, more than one consideration involved in this. One would be to use the facilities as they were designed; another would be to modify the refinery to the point where it would be capable of refining oil of a somewhat lower quality, if that is the right description, or a different specific gravity of crude—

Senator Flynn: Mexican oil?

Senator Olson: A somewhat heavier oil than that. The fact of the matter is that the total world supply of oil is getting to the point where some of the refinery capability has to be modified to take care of a different gravity of crude. In any event, I shall take the question as notice and provide a detailed answer.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable senator for his undertaking. I can appreciate the problems in differences in quality of oil, or at least I think I can. I would be grateful if the minister, in his inquiries flowing from his taking the question as notice, would give particular attention to determining whether or not there is now in being a firm plan for the commercial operation of this refinery on a successful basis, or a basis which might reasonably be hoped to be successful.

Senator Olson: I shall provide as much detail as I can in my reply.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

THE BUDGET—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Despite several questions, the government ministers have not indicated precisely how much of the increased funding for the economic development envelope provided in the budget will be allocated to research and development expenditures. Is the minister able to provide the Senate with a precise figure in this regard?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, I cannot give that figure off the top of my head. I want to check as to whether the minister directly responsible for science and technology has made some announcement recently in this respect, and for that reason I shall take the question as notice and provide the Senate with whatever information is available.

Senator Phillips: I thank the minister for his offer to obtain the information. Recently, the President of the National Research Council outlined three scenarios, each predicated upon the assumption of a given amount in funding being available.

I would also ask the minister to determine which of the three options presented by the President of the National Research Council is favoured; that is, the minimum, what was termed the second option, or perhaps we might even hope for the so-called deluxe version, as outlined by the President of the National Research Council.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Phillips is asking a question for which the answer may or may not be available within the next few days. Funding for the ensuing years, which includes some of the proposals in that, involve a number of fiscal years—not only 1980-81, but 1981-82, and I think three or four years beyond that. While I am prepared to give an undertaking that I shall get as much information as I can, I obviously cannot commit the government beyond what the minister is ready to indicate.

ENERGY

IMPORTATION OF OIL FROM SAUDI ARABIA

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and my question arises out of the announcement by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister concerning the availability from Saudi Arabia of 100,000 barrels of oil a day.

Can the minister say whether the 100,000 barrels a day in question would be over and above our current import levels from that country; secondly, can the minister assure the Senate and the country that the Canadian government will not accept any political conditions being attached to such a sale?

I have in mind the conditions that were attached by Saudi Arabia to a contract with Denmark last spring for 20,000 barrels of oil a day. Those conditions were widely interpreted as meaning that the Saudi Arabian authorities would have a virtual veto over the showing of a film such as Death of a Princess on Danish television.

Will the minister assure the house that no political conditions would be accepted by the Government of Canada to such a transaction?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, dealing first with whether or not the 100,000 barrels a day would be in addition to what we are now importing, I should like to draw attention to the fact that what has been offered is that up to 100,000 barrels a day could be made available from Saudi Arabia. We shall assess that in terms of whether or not it is needed; whether or not it is a more secure supply, and all of the other factors that would go into making that kind of an arrangement.

I do not think my honourable friend ought to infer that negotiations were moved beyond the point that an offer has been made which we may wish to consider. Whether it is in addition to what we are importing now or a substitution or alternative to some that we are importing now has not been determined. Indeed, it has not been determined whether we require any of it.

As to the political conditions, I can express the hope on my part that there would be none. But I will convey that representation, if you like, to the negotiators.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RECAPITALIZATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised by Senator Smith on November 19 concerning the recapitalization of the Canadian National Railways.

I am informed that in the statement referred to by Senator Smith, the President of CN was expressing his concern that capital expenditures required to handle forecast traffic, especially in western Canada, may be beyond the ability of the company if it is to maintain its debt load at prudent levels.

As honourable senators know, under the existing legislation CN is limited to providing for its capital needs through self-generated funds, borrowing or federal financing. As the situation now stands, the issue raised by the President of CN is currently being studied. I can assure honourable senators that adequate capital for its 1981 plant expansion needs are being budgeted for by CN.

ENERGY

GAS TRANSMISSION COSTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on October 29 by Senator Haidasz concerning the cost of transmitting gas.

The city gate price for maritime consumers will be the same as that paid throughout the entire eastern zone. One of the main objectives of the federal government is to encourage consumers in the maritime region to convert to energy sources other than oil. This is a primary concern of the federal government, ensuring a common city gate price. We believe in the long term that all consumers will benefit as we reduce our dependency on foreign oil.

EFFECT OF SPOT PURCHASES ON OIL PRICING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to two questions asked on November 13 by Senator Austin and Senator Roblin concerning the effects of spot purchases on oil pricing.

I am informed that oil consumption within International Energy Agency countries is currently low compared with recent years, resulting in high oil stock levels, and utilization of spare capacity could contribute to a better world energy balance.

As a result, on October 1 member countries agreed to undertake certain measures to limit spot market activity through the use of surplus oil inventories by companies in consultation with the governments. Commencing the week of November 17, the effects of these measures were being reviewed by the IEA's Standing Group on the Oil Market and the Governing Board.

At the IEA ministerial meeting scheduled for December 8 and 9 this program will be reviewed in relation to the Iran-Iraq situation, and at that time it will be decided if further action will be required to ensure an orderly international oil market.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RECAPITALIZATION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I thank the Minister of State for Economic Development for his answer relating to the CNR and capitalization; but perhaps he will permit me to say that the answer, as I heard it, does not respond adequately to the question I was trying to ask. As I recall it, I was reminding the minister—and I am sure he did not need reminding—of the recapitalization which was approved by Parliament in 1978, I believe, although I do not have the date before me—

Senator Olson: It was 1952 and 1978.

Senator Smith: —and what some of us, perhaps innocently or naively, thought were the assurances given in 1978 that this recapitalization would serve to meet the needs of the CNR for some considerable time in the future. My real desire was to find out what has occurred within that relatively short span of two years to cause the recapitalization—which Parliament was then led to believe, in my opinion at least, would be adequate for some considerable time in the future—to turn out to be so inadequate.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice, but my honourable friend should realize that the CN has taken on some very necessary and very large increased capacity projects in western Canada, particularly through what they call the northern route, from Edmonton to Jasper, and from there to Vancouver, or down into the lower mainland; and also what appears to be a rather significant if not very large capitalization requirement for the capacity to accommodate a large tonnage to Prince Rupert, where we have announced we are building a new port, and indeed a great amount of rolling stock necessary to respond to what may be a demand for greatly increased coal shipments to those two ports.

Senator Smith: Certainly I would not object to the usefulness and necessity of financing those great projects, which are of value not only to the west but to the whole country. I do not quarrel with that, but I do find myself wondering how it is that two years ago, when representations were being made concerning the capital needs of the CNR, those great projects—which even then were in process of consideration, if not construction or implementation—could have been forgotten.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice and obtain some more detail. However, I would assure my honourable friend that I believe the possibility of rather significantly larger capital requirements has been accelerated in the last few months, even in 1980.

Senator Smith: Thank you.

LOWER NELSON RIVER—POLICY RESPECTING HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 29 Senator Roblin asked, in light of federal assistance being given to Newfoundland and Labrador for the development of the Lower Churchill River, if the federal government would consider providing the same type of assistance to Manitoba toward the development of the Lower Nelson River.

The decision to offer financial support and participation in a joint enterprise to assist Newfoundland and Labrador in the development of hydro-electric potential in the Lower Churchill River was designed to meet the very special circumstances of this situation.

These circumstances are the high initial cost of constructing a transmission system to the Island of Newfoundland with particular reference to the crossing of the Strait of Belle Isle. In addition, the scale of generation available at the specific sites on the Lower Churchill River exceed the immediate requirements for electricity demand on the island, while, in the long run, Labrador hydro will be the more economic choice of additional generation.

The situation described above is rather similar to the position faced by Manitoba in the early 1960s when the first developments on the Nelson River were being contemplated. The federal government, at that time recognizing a unique situation, agreed to construct the first stage of the Nelson River transmission system at a cost of over $200 million, and to provide very favourable guarantees of interest rates for the funds invested in that project. Further, the project was relieved of the full burden of carrying charges for a period of 15 years until 1988.

In addition to the construction of the initial phase of the transmission system by Canada as described above, the federal government also provided loans for up to $193 million, of which over $110 million has already been advanced to assist Manitoba Hydro in the construction of additional facilities to expand the capability of the transmission system.

Manitoba is now, in all likelihood, in the position of being able to support further incremental additions to both generation and transmission facilities within the revenue base available from sales of electricity, and in the same way it can be anticipated that after initial federal involvement the Province of Newfoundland will also be placed in a position to follow a more independent route for future additions to its system in Newfoundland and Labrador.

ATLANTIC REGION—HOME HEATING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Phillips on November 5, relating to the length of time required to convert an oil burning generating plant to coal. It was one of a series of questions asked by the honourable senator.

Under the National Energy Program, a Utility Off-Oil Fund will be established, with funding over the next four years of $175 million, to provide grants to maritime utilities of up to 75 per cent of the cost of environmentally acceptable conversions of oil-fired electricity plants to coal. Electric utilities estimate that it would take 15 to 18 months to convert each generating unit.

BANKING

ELECTRONIC TRANSFER OF FUNDS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 5, Senator Nurgitz asked a question concerning the implementation by the government of a system of electronic transfer of funds.

I am pleased to advise that the Treasury Board has recently approved a pilot project to be carried out by the Department of Supply and Services to obtain further experience with electronic funds transfer. This particular project will allow payments on behalf of Canadian Forces personnel to third parties and will permit us to evaluate the merits of such a system in due course.

INCOME TAX

UNINCORPORATED BUSINESSES—DEDUCTION OF SALARIES PAID TO SPOUSES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 24, Senator Bielish asked a question concerning the deduction, for purposes of income tax, of salaries paid to spouses by persons carrying on an unincorporated business.

The April 21, 1980 Ways and Means Motion included the proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act to give effect to the removal of the attribution rules in respect of remuneration received by a spouse of a taxpayer employed in his business or partnership.

The relative proposed draft legislation was released to the public in August last. Proposed amendments to the Canada Pension Plan have also been prepared.

Amendments to both the Income Tax Act and Canada Pension Plan are intended to be effective retroactively to January 1, 1980, and await approval by Parliament and royal assent to be passed into law. The bill, including legislative amendments, will be introduced in Parliament shortly. The government places considerable priority on this measure and remains committed to it, even if the measure is considered in February or March. We will, of course, be counting on the good will of all honourable senators opposite to ensure its rapid passage when it reaches this chamber.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INDEPENDENT AUDITS OF INDIAN BAND TRUST FUNDS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 25, Senator Nurgitz asked a question concerning the auditing of Indian band funds by the Auditor General.

I am informed that the Auditor General has indeed taken action in this regard. Specific information will be available in the Auditor General's report which is due before the end of December.

• (2110)

To give details at this stage would violate the confidentiality of the report. As soon as the report has been tabled I shall be pleased to answer any further questions that the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, or other senators, may have concerning this and other matters covered in the report.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—WITNESSES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have here, honourable senators, a delayed answer to the question by Senator Roblin on November 25, 1980, concerning the number of groups that have submitted briefs and wish to appear before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

In response to Senator Roblin's question, I table the following:

> A list of witnesses who have appeared before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. (English Text).
> A statistical compilation of witnesses heard or wishing to be heard by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, and submissions received by the said Committee. (English Text).

(For text of documents see appendix, p. 1345.)

Honourable senators, this compilation is a very long list. First comes a list of witnesses who appeared before the committee through December 1. Next comes a compilation asked for by Senator Roblin, which is a complete list of witnesses by organization, and each person in the delegation, according to the date they appeared. This may be of interest to honourable senators.

The second document I can just briefly say something about. The entire document, of course, is being tabled. Perhaps it can be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: The number of briefs and written submissions received was 529, plus 22 after the deadline of November 25. These include letters, telegrams, et cetera.

The number of groups wishing to appear was 274, plus five received after the deadline of November 25.

The number of individuals wishing to appear was 130, plus six after the deadline of November 25.

The number of groups making representations only was 74, plus one received after the deadline of November 25.

The number of individuals making representations only was 400, plus seven received after the deadline of November 25.

The numbers wishing to appear by category are listed in great and exhaustive detail in the document I have tabled this evening.

Honourable senators may have further questions after they review this list, but I think it will be of interest to all, and perhaps will provide the most cogent and succinct reason why members of this house and other place have proposed that the hearings be extended to February 6. The Canadian people have proven that they are not backward at coming forward.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PEACE IN MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN INITIATIVES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie, on November 26, asked a question concerning Canada's role in the pursuit of peace in the Middle East.

During his press conference in Cairo on November 22, the Prime Minister said that Canada can exercise some modest influence in bringing both sides closer together by speaking its mind as it has in the United Nations and in our direct relations with Arab nations and with Israel. I would like to quote exactly what the Prime Minister said:

> It's not out of modesty but more out of realism that we realize that we cannot have a great influence. But I'm sure that Israel is sensitive, as they have told us before, to the position the Canadian government takes in speaking its mind either in private with Israel or in public at the United Nations or in the Canadian Parliament. And this, I think, will be the extent of our role. I've said it many times before, that in this day and age, the countries with the mightiest military forces are sometimes incapable because of the strength of those forces to influence the course of events and it can be the role of lesser nations to use their influence through ideas and persuasion.

ITALY

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—CANADIAN AID

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, because I know there is a lively interest in the chamber on the subject of the plight of the survivors of the dreadful earthquake in Italy, I would like to refer to a body of information which I have here. It is rather lengthy, but I think it will be of interest to many of you. It details in very specific terms the Canadian aid which it is proposed to extend to Italy, and the requests which have been received for additional aid. With the leave of the chamber perhaps this, too, can be incorporated in the record of this evening's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(Text of document follows:)

What is the Canadian contribution?

—An immediate grant of $300,000 for emergency relief, through the Canadian Red Cross and the League of Red Cross Societies. This includes the $100,000 announced in the House on Monday.

—A contribution of $1.5 million to assist in rehabilitation and reconstruction. This contribution will be coordinated with private sector efforts including those of the Italian Canadian Community.

Has the emergency grant been spent?

—The Canadian Red Cross was officially notified, November 27, that the government would provide it a total grant of $300,000. This notification constitutes sufficient authority for the Red Cross to spend the money immediately.

Why have no special DND flights been sent?

—I requested from the Italian Ambassador a list of priority items required in Italy (trailors, temporary accomodation, tents, water purifiers, blankets).

—My concern was that these items reach the stricken areas as fast as possible.

—It was clear that the League of Red Cross Societies could deliver these items more quickly, with access to stores in Europe itself.

—DND flights have not been ruled out, especially in the event our resources at Lahr were requested by the Italian authorities, with whom I am in constant contact.

When will the $1.5 million be spent?

—It is earmarked for reconstruction and rehabilitation; priority needs in this respect will only be possible to identify after the initial period of emergency relief is over.

—In the private sector and among the Italian-Canadian community, efforts to organize fund raising are still under way.

—While no precise date can be given at this time, our hope is that this money could be spent at the earliest realistic date, probably early in the new calendar year, definitely before end of the current fiscal year.

How will the $1.5 million be spent?

—As stated before, we intend to join our efforts with those of concerned Canadians who are actively and commendably raising funds from the private sector.

—Efforts in the private sector are still under way, including efforts to structure the collection of funds.

Therefore,

—Exact mechanisms have not yet been defined, to discuss the most appropriate ones with those organizations most active in the private sector, among which the National Congress of Italian-Canadians (NCIC) plays a most prominent role. In a general way, we would plan to make this money available in the form of a grant to a national reconstruction fund.

Is the NCIC the only organisation the government will consult?

—As a nationally based body, the Congress has played a commendable leading role in the collection of funds. We would want to consult with it, but would also wish to include other organizations or individuals who have devoted themselves to this effort.

Why was the announcement made by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and not the SSEA?

—Because of the importance of the matter, we wanted to announce the measures as soon as they were decided, on November 26.

—The SSEA was out of town on that day.

—Mr. Fleming was the person indicated to make the announcement in the SSEA's absence both because his responsibilities put him in contact with the Italian-Canadian organizations collecting funds and because he payed an official visit to the stricken area last September.

Airlift to Italy:

Why has to government chosen to make contributions in kind, so late after this disaster?

—Specific needs were difficult to identify earlier. The League of Red Cross Societies was the most adequate mechanism to coordinate the international relief effort;

—Last Friday, the Italian government provided us in Rome with a specific list of items of which there remained a shortfall; —From available stocks at C.F.B. Lahr, Germany, we were able to identify items that could make up part of this shortfall (1,000 blankets, warm clothing, foodstuffs);

—We provided these goods after clearing with the Italian Ambassador, Friday evening, that they were indeed required. The requirement was confirmed once again yesterday, Sunday, both by the Italian government and the Italian Red Cross.

What guarantees did the government seek to ensure that these goods would be put to effective use?

—While there is little we can do to help the relief operations on site, we can and we chose to ensure that they are conducted with all the supplies required for their success;

—The goods are being airlifted to Bari, on the Adriatic coast, (rather than Naples), because access to the stricken area is easier from the east than from the encumbered west coast.

What is the cost of the airlift?

—Approximately $67,000.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ORIGINAL WORKS OF ART—CLASSIFICATION UNDER DUTY-FREE TARIFF ITEMS

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, before we proceed to Orders of the Day, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government if he has any prospect of getting an answer to the question I posed on October 23, being question No. 39 on the Order Paper.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to thank the Honourable Senator Molson for bringing this matter to my attention. The question is, I am sure, being diligently researched at present. Some replies take longer to prepare than others.

SENATORS AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRANSPORTATION EXPENSES, TRAVELLING ALLOWANCES AND REMOVAL EXPENSES

Question No. 38 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. What are the regulations governing travel by a Newfoundland senator from Ottawa to his province?

2. Do the same regulations apply to Members of the House of Commons from Newfoundland; if not, why not?

Reply by the President of the Privy Council:

1. Transportation Expenses, Travelling Allowances and Removal Expenses: Pursuant to subsection 43(1) of the Senate and House of Commons Act, the following expenses shall be paid to Members of the Senate:

(a)(i) Subject to paragraph (v), such expenses incurred by Senators in travelling one return trip each week between their place of residence and Ottawa by common carrier not in excess of the cost of first class air transportation fares, which are supported by receipted vouchers, plus airporter service ground transportation expenses between the airline pick-up point and airport, in Ottawa, and in their place of residence;

(ii) Such expenses incurred by Senators in travelling one return trip each week between their place of residence and Ottawa by motor vehicle not in excess of the cost of first class air transportation fares or fourteen cents per kilometre, whichever shall be the less;

(iii) Such expenses incurred by Senators in travelling 10 return trips in each period of twelve consecutive months to any place in Canada from Ottawa or place of residence by common carrier not in excess of the cost of first class air transportation which are supported by receipted vouchers plus airporter service ground transportation expenses between the airline pick-up point and airport, in Ottawa and their place of residence.

(iv) Such expenses incurred by Senators for their spouses to travel six (6) return trips in each period of twelve (12) consecutive months by common carrier not in excess of the cost of first class air transportation fares which are supported by receipted vouchers, between their place of residence and Ottawa plus airporter service ground transportation expenses between the airline pick-up point and airport, in Ottawa and in their place of residence; and

(v) The trips set out in paragraphs (iii) and (iv) shall not be in addition to the trips for the Senator provided for in paragraph (i) but each trip undertaken under paragraph (iii) and each trip undertaken under paragraph (iv) shall be considered a weekly return trip provided for the Senator under paragraph (i).

(vi) Senators will be allowed to claim, without supporting vouchers, ground transportation costs up to $10; furthermore, taxi fares over $10 but not exceeding $20, incurred in getting to and from airports, will also be allowed subject to the presentation of receipts.

(b) Senators are eligible for removal expenses for their furniture and effects, either to or from Ottawa once during their parliamentary career, provided that all claims for such removal expenses, supported by receipted vouchers, are made within six (6) months of the date he ceases to receive his indemnity.

2. Yes.

PRIVACY BILL, 1980

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-9, intituled: "An Act to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to government files containing personal information relating to themselves".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand until January 21, 1981.

Order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

PRESIDENT OF THE LETHBRIDGE STAKE OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS—SECOND READING

Hon. Ernest C. Manning moved the second reading of Bill S-16, respecting the President of the Lethbridge Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

He said: Honourable senators, I need only take a few moments with regard to this matter.

The purpose of this bill is to grant a new charter to a religious corporation that is responsible for the management and control of the property, affairs and interests in Canada of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, commonly referred to as the Mormon Church.

Perhaps a brief explanation of the term "Stake" would be appropriate. A stake is a territorial division of the Mormon Church. As such, it is roughly the equivalent of what would be a diocese in other churches. Within a stake there are generally about 10 congregational units known as wards, each of which is headed by a bishop. A ward is roughly the equivalent of a parish, as generally understood in other churches.

In 1927, by private act of the Parliament of Canada, namely, chapter 112 of the Statutes of Canada, 1926-27, the President of the Lethbridge Stake was incorporated as a corporation sole.

A corporation sole, as those senators who are lawyers will know, is a corporation consisting of one person only, together with his successors in office, who are incorporated by law in order to give them the legal capacities and benefits of a corporation, which they do not enjoy as natural persons. One particular advantage is that of perpetuity.

One of the principal purposes of the corporation sole that is the subject of this bill is to manage and control the property, affairs and interests in Canada of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The corporation, in addition to managing the affairs of the church in the Lethbridge area, acts, in effect, as a holding company for the property and assets of the various missions and stakes of the church in Canada.

Since its enactment in 1927, the original act of incorporation of the President of the Lethbridge Stake has never been amended. With the passage of time the act has become outdated and inadequate. It contains, for instance, certain limitations on the holding of property that are now archaic, and that can only be corrected by Parliament.

The purpose of this bill, therefore, is to repeal the original act of incorporation and replace it with a more modern, up-to-date charter. The bill contains a provision stating that, for all purposes, the new corporation, created by this bill, is deemed to be a continuation of the corporation created by Parliament in 1927.

Since this is a private bill, it will be necessary for a Senate committee to examine the allegations of facts set out in the preamble of the bill. I would propose, therefore, if second reading is granted, to ask that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which is the committee of the Senate that normally examines private bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Ernest C. Manning moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular

1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;

2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;

3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;

4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and

5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask that this Order now stand in the name of Senator Murray. We, on this side, do not plan to proceed with it at this stage, and therefore I would ask that it stand in Senator Murray's name.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, it would be my intention to resume this debate tomorrow afternoon if time permits.

Order stands.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 20, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk," tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I would like to start by congratulating the senators who have spoken before me. I hope I shall not duplicate the material in the report which they have discussed, but I make no apology for duplicating the tributes which all have paid to Senator McGrand.

I suspect that Senator McGrand at the conception of this committee, when it was formed, felt something like a putative father—he did not have official sanctification for his creation. Indeed, the prenatal period in the formation of this offspring seemed to suggest that it was indeed a child at risk. I also know that he hoped that every page of the report would ring out with a clarion call, a good lusty cry, from this little red-cheeked baby. I think that he probably feels that I and several others tried to mute that to some extent, but I hope he is satisfied that I still think it is a formidable and substantive effort, and I hope its vigorous cry will be heard in the corridors of power.

Certainly, as Senator McGrand has said, it has been heard as far away as New Zealand because the Parliament of New Zealand is interested in looking at this report, which I think is a credit to the Senate, and I know from Senator Bonnell, the overall chairman, that he has received many letters from provinces and individuals all across Canada concerning the report.

I would like to focus, if I might still on the author and, as far as I am concerned, the genius and the inspiration of the report.

Senator McGrand, I don't know how many children you, as a doctor, have brought into the world, but I do know from some of your colleagues from New Brunswick that you were a legend as a country doctor in the 1920s and 1930s; that no matter how cold and chilly the night or how harsh the blizzard, if there was a cry of desperation from some lonely farmhouse for help, your sturdy figure would get out the horse and sleigh and start through the clogged roads, and, when the horse stumbled and faltered, you put on your snow-shoes and still gamely pushed through to answer the need.

I would say as well, Senator McGrand, that as Minister of Health you have also been a pioneer in your province, in immunization, in preventative programs, and in building hospitals.

In fairness to Dr. McGrand, honourable senators, it was not his intention that this should just become a theological study on the origins of sin or a philosophical discussion on the nature of man, or even that it should be a discussion of astrology and the influence of stars towards criminal tendencies. But certainly for me, as I looked at the original term of reference, which is to examine "such experiences in prenatal life and early childhood as may cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour in later life" I felt, somewhat like Senator Macdonald, that this was perhaps a wee bit too esoteric and too mystical an adventure. If I might quote King Lear:

> This is the excellent foppery of the world, that, when we are sick in fortune—often the surfeit of our own behaviour—we make guilty of our disasters the sun, the moon, and the stars: as if we were villains by necessity; fools by heavenly compulsion;

And I wondered if we were not trying, in going back to prenatal circumstances, to make ourselves provide an excuse for criminals—"fools by heavenly compulsion".

[Senator Thompson.]

But, in fairness to Dr. McGrand, it was never his intention even to study the chromosome composition or the DNA code of life. Indeed, I know that Dr. McGrand subscribes, as I understand all reputable geneticists do, to the conviction that acquired characteristics are not inherited. The Soviet geneticist, Professor Lycenko, was descredited even in the Communist bloc, as David Suzuki said in referring to him, "Lycenko's mumbo jumbo held back Soviet generics for many years." In other words, he was emphasizing—that is, Lycenko was—that acquired characteristics are inherited. What Senator McGrand wanted to study and examine were the hazards in prenatal life, at birth and early childhood, a series of physical and emotional assaults, which can begin to lead towards a pattern of susceptibility towards withdrawal, resentful frustration and on towards antisocial behaviour.

Because of my own past interest in the corrections field, I have read a number of the reports—the Stewart Report, the Archambault Report, the Fauteux Report and the Ouimet report. I am also very impressed with the MacGuigan report. There has been a mountain of volumes on treating the offender, and I think the penology profession as a whole would agree with Alexander Pope's remark: "As the twig is bent, the tree inclines." But Dr. McGrand—and I know he admires René Dubois and I suspect he also admires Thoreau—agreed with Thoreau when he said, "There are a thousand hacking at the branches of evil to one who is striking at the root."

What I learned from the committee, first, was that there is a large constituency all across this country and internationally, many disciplines and professions, who are digging down to examine sometimes one and sometimes more of the entanglement of roots and fibres to see what has led towards a life of crime. We were not alone in our study by any means, or in our interest. Other speakers have talked about a recommendation for a Canadian institute for the study of violence in society, and its purpose, as well as initiating and promoting research, would be to co-ordinate and evaluate research.

From the testimony of witnesses, from the press, and from research papers, our committee recognized that some roots in the entanglement had become twisted and deformed, causing a malformed outcrop—the violent criminal. If I can be so bold as to use agricultural terms about which I know so little, there may be too much acidity in the soil, too little sun or too much buffeting by rain and storms.

At this point I wish to thank the two very able research personnel from the Library of Parliament, Helen McKenzie and Grant Purves, for their diligence and talents in co-ordinating the committee's findings.

The committee recommends the development of preventive resources—to enrich the soil—to assist the fetus, the infant and the young child in order that it will not develop the weakness of later susceptibility to crime—stunted growth.

Having described in terms of plant life the dangers of deformity, let me add that, in my eyes, there is a glorious, magnificent contradiction on the part of the human species.

We have a free will which at times seems to overcome the most terrible hazards and obstacles. In this connection, I think of one example: I had intended to catch a plane at Peterborough, but as is often the case, the plane never arrived at Peterborough airport. As a consequence of this, at about 6 o'clock in the morning I had to drive from Peterborough to Malton to catch the plane to Ottawa. It was a cold, wet summer morning and, in the company of four or five other men, I was travelling along a lonely stretch of road. Ahead I saw a police car's lights flashing at the side of the road. As we drew nearer we saw a young man hobbling along the road. As we passed him we recognized that one of his legs was a stump and saw the pain seared on his face as he struggled on. The young man was Terry Fox on his run across Canada. You may ask, "What on earth has Terry Fox to do with this study?" I say, "Everything."

During the committee hearings the emphasis was on those who had failed—why they had become criminals. In my view we overlooked the raw courage and steel determination which are the main ingredients of characters who fight obstacles. We should learn how they achieve that. Almost all the evidence presented to the committee concerned children who had become twisted criminals. There was no evidence of what enables some children to surmount the hazards of genetic, psychological and environmental disadvantages.

In this connection I had to go to the United States in order to see some studies. Very few have been done. However, studies have been done in Berkeley and Minnesota, and I would refer to one of those case studies. Michael, aged 10, had a schizophrenic mother who had been in and out of institutions; a father who was in prison; and an older sister who lived in a home for the mentally retarded. Yet, his teachers described Michael as charming, bright, a good student, a natural leader and loved by everyone in the school. The extraordinary contradiction of the human species is such that our theory of a series of calamities stunting growth and leading to crime is so often refuted by the will of the individual. Frankly, I get great encouragement from that.

Another study done in Berkeley concerned 403 eminent people, and demonstrated that three out of ten had childhoods in which they were despised, rejected, abused, abandoned, ignored or brutalized. Their parents were cruel, cold, bizarre, insane or alcoholic; yet, these children succeeded and became prominent, eminent people in the United States. The question I ask is: Why? How do they overcome these hazards that seem to hold back so many?

The committee readily admits that it did not have a chance to study all aspects and provide all the answers. That is why we want to set up an institute to study these matters. Frankly, my belief, honourable senators, is that we will never know how to grow people. Having said that, I do not want to mislead you into thinking that our committee felt that good, responsible parents would want to expose their children to hazards over which so many are stumbling. No level of government should ignore the elimination or diminution of such hazards when it is possible, collectively, to raze them.

Honourable senators, we rely on the family as a centre of warmth, caring, nurture, and a citadel for our young, but let us face the reality of some facts in this Canada of ours. All of us at some time feel smug about the care of our children even as we recognize that 15 million children in the world will die this year. We think how fortunate our children in Canada are. Many of us still live in the myth of the Victorian days where the father returns home from work, is greeted by his wife, and reads bedtime stories to his children. I am reminded of Longfellow's "The Children's Hour" where it says:

> Between the dark and the daylight,
> When the night is beginning to lower,
> Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
> That is known as the Children's Hour.

Honourable senators, Canadian fathers are not returning home. A 1976 census showed that there were 464,000 single-parent families headed by a woman. One-third of the working mothers had children under three years of age. There are almost 900,000 Canadian children living in single-parent families, many in poverty.

On the subject of pregnancies, statistics show that there were over 50,000 pregnancies in Canada between the ages of 15 and 19; of those about one-third were aborted. Although we have this idealism about children in Canada, there were over 62,000 abortions in 1978.

With regard to the care of our children, in 1977, there were 2,268 admissions to mental hospitals of children between the ages of 10 and 14 and, between the ages of 15 and 19, the number of admissions was 6,371.

There are 600,000 children under the age of seven with no access to any kind of professional, assured daycare. Many are sitting watching television because their parents are pressured to go out to work. It is not uncommon to see 10 or more children in some apartment sitting watching television while their parents are at work. There are one million so-called "latch-key" children in Canada.

The family unit is under enormous strain and bombardment, not only in Canada but in all of North America. This is more obvious in urban centres than in rural areas, and yet we recognize that in the 1990s 80 per cent of Canadians will be living in urban areas.

With stress comes violence. I am not talking about watching violence on television in the home. God knows, that is something that should be looked into, and Senator McElman constantly pushed that during the hearings. It might interest honourable senators to know that children between five and fourteen could watch the violent destruction of more than 13,400 characters within a period of ten years. Many of our children are exposed to that.

I am talking of the violence in the home, real life violence, the screams of terror as a child witnesses its mother being battered and beaten by her husband or common-law husband. Last year 12,000 women in Canada sought refuge in emergency shelters, of which we have far too few. It is estimated that one in ten are battered every year. There is a beautiful poem by Helwig, whom I know many senators will know, which speaks of the Canadian child:

Sleep on my child

Still in your innocence.

I was trying today to get the figures from the child welfare people in Toronto, and they say it is hard to prove it, but the dark stain of incest is starting to come out of the closet. In the first six months of 1979 there were 95 cases of incest reported in Ontario.

I believe, as I think we all do, that the family is a citadel and the place to nurture, care for and bring up children. Yet I think we all recognize that the traditional role of the family is changing in our society. There is a book by Keniston, All Our Children, in which he shows the trend that is taking place in the family. Instead of the family being a functioning place for bringing up children, the parents become co-ordinators to get the best agencies that are being provided around the community.

The dilemma that at least I faced in the committee was that, in proposing further government agencies and services to assist children, we are having the state carry out further functions for the family, so could we then be weakening the family? Let me give an example.

We propose day-care centres to be available to children of working mothers across the country. We do not question that in many, many cases it is of necessity that the mothers are working. But, again, I would like to see this institute do a good, hard study—and I realize I am very brave in raising this question—of why women are not taking the responsibility and duty—or why a parent is not; perhaps a father should do this—of staying at home to look after the young child for a period rather than demanding that the community provide outside services.

If it is because they have to go out to work, as I agree in many cases they do, perhaps we should have an overall look at all the ways governments interfere to bolster the family with medicare, education, and going through the whole thing—hospitalization, nutrition, immunization, income tax. Perhaps there should be a hard look focusing on the child and seeing how we could make conditions such that at least it would be financially rewarding as well for one of the parents to stay at home during that critical period of the first couple of years.

I should like to say that we are being nostalgic and not very realistic in thinking that we can hold back and not bring forward some services. When I mention to you, as I did, the enormous number of children for whom there are no services right now across this country, it is obvious that we have got to move and recognize the changed structure of the family.

I said that the stresses on the family are causing violence and brutality to children. The third section of our report talks of the effect of abuse and neglect of children by their parents, or parent, or guardian. I suppose there is nothing quite so chillingly abhorrent to us here in this Senate chamber as the brutality of some parent or guardian towards some small defenceless child.

If I may, I should like to read from Mary van Stolk, who appeared before us and has written a book that I think every one of us should read. I am sure it would shock you greatly to realize the prevalence of this across our country. She takes a typical case of a child abused: Age, two years; sex, female; assailant, step-father; injuries, many bruises and abrasions over face, scalp and trunk; fractures, ribs, recent. This is a typical case, honourable senators. Internal injuries, contusion; brain, sub-dural hemorrhage; presenting story, fell from bed downstairs; method of injury, beaten with, among other things, a hairbrush; reason for injury, child had messed his bed.

Honourable senators, we hope, surely to God, that that is some peculiar pervert, one among millions. Unfortunately in reality, reading from this book and from statistics, it is no such thing. Mary van Stolk, the witness, suggested that between 7 per cent and 8 per cent of Canada's children are battered and beaten, bruised and assaulted across this country, but hidden within the sanctity of the home. We know that there are 5,000 to 9,000 a year across Canada. We know that in Ontario alone 9,000 children have been battered and abused since 1965, and social workers and other witnesses say that this is really not the picture at all, that the number is far larger, probably double.

Why do we keep looking at this in our study? Because overwhelming research showed that violence breeds violence. One study of all the criminals at San Quentin prison showed they had violent upbringings as children. All assassins in the United States during the past twenty years had a history of being abused as children.

I will dwell briefly on two areas where I think we would make a great contribution, where those who are active in working with abused children know that these children, if they survive, can, with resentment and hate, become violent criminals.

The first thing that was suggested by the witnesses was that section 43 of the Criminal Code, the correction of children by force, is being interpreted too permissively. I suppose one always thinks in subjective terms, but I was brought up in an English boarding school, where, I have to admit, one would get beaten off and on, but I thought it was reasonable. I boxed when I was in the Navy. I should tell my former captain that I was not that great a boxer, because I suffered unreasonable punishment in the ring on occasion.

There really is a vagueness in the interpretation of this section of the Criminal Code of Canada. It permits parents and guardians to abuse children. We are being warned that there should be a second look at this. That section, in part, states:

> —if the force does not exceed what is reasonable under the circumstances.

I know the adage: "Spare the rod and spoil the child." As I mentioned, when speaking in support of Senator McGrand's committee, I was a probation officer. I remember going before a magistrate with a little girl who was termed "incorrigible." That is a vague term used with children, but that would not stand up in an adult courtroom. As I was saying, the child was before the magistrate, and he turned to this burly Irishman and said, "What you have to do is apply more discipline to this child." Turning towards me, he said, "Follow this up to see that this is done."

About a week later I went to this girl's house. I asked where the girl was and was told that she was locked in a room with the windows boarded up. The father, who was a big man, proudly explained to me how he unbuckled his belt and, using his buckle, had tied her down to a kitchen chair and raised welts on her back to discipline her. When I saw her I thought that she was not completely broken down, because there was a fire in her eyes. I do not know where that has led her, but I would suggest, honourable senators, that that kind of abuse could very naturally lead many children to move on, as we have shown, to become violent criminals.

I could refer to a judgment given by the court where it has looked into what is meant by the words "reasonable under the circumstances." The court suggested that it had not been able to find a judgment clarifying what is reasonable under the circumstances. That was a 1978 case. I can cite cases of reasonable assault to children of the ages of six, eight and ten where bruises, contusions, welts, chipped teeth and bloody noses occurred. These were called "reasonable under the circumstances."

I suggest, honourable senators, that that is one section that should be looked at thoroughly, because it may be that through looking at it we will be able to avoid some of these terrible tragedies.

Let me make my next point. I should like to say to you that, in the past, our society has paid more attention to—cruelty to animals than it has to cruelty to children. Legislation against cruelty to animals was enacted in 1820, while legislation against cruelty to children was not enacted until 1893, when the Ontario Legislature passed an act for the prevention of cruelty to and the better protection of children.

What I am coming to is the evidence required to show that a child has been abused. Parental assaults to children are often extremely difficult to prove in a criminal court because there are usually no witnesses to the crime. It is done behind closed doors. There is a spouse or a partner and a terrified child, in some cases so young that it does not even know how to talk.

If an animal is abused or maltreated, the onus is on the owner to prove that he did not inflict the injuries. Similarly, if a car is stopped and burglary tools are found therein, and that car is on a darkened street by a house, the occupants of that car must prove that they are not up to any criminal activities. I suggest that, surely to God, we can say to two people who have beaten a child, and in some cases broken its ribs, that they must prove that they did not do it.

Honourable senators, I think that Dr. McGrand has done a tremendous service to this country. He used to go out over clogged roads, over snowdrifts, to answer the desperate cry of one child in a farm house. With this report he is answering the desperate call of thousands of Canadian children. I am proud of him and thank him for having the New Brunswick tenacity to drive on and on, despite our initial coldness to his proposal. I congratulate him on what he has done.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1981, which was presented November 20, 1980.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved that the report be adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER DISCHARGED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Lafond).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the authority of Senator Lafond and Senator Godfrey, in whose name this probably should be standing anyway, to ask that this order be discharged.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order discharged.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION

INTERIM REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On the Inquiry of Senator Hayden:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of the Bill C-6, intituled: "An Act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof", tabled in the Senate on 17th July, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with reference to this Inquiry standing in the name of Senator Hayden, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1980 has now been assented to. Therefore, I ask leave, in Senator Hayden's name, to withdraw that Inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE— INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On the Inquiry of Senator Hayden:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject-matter of the Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act respecting bankruptcy and Insolvency", tabled in the Senate on 8th October, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this Inquiry also stands in the name of Senator Hayden. I am informed that this report need not be discussed for some time, probably not until the New Year. I have Senator Hayden's authority to ask leave to withdraw this Inquiry, it being understood that he may wish to draw attention to that report at a later date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Wednesday, December 3, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which was referred the document, entitled: "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms or errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970", tabled in the Senate on Wednesday, July 9, 1980, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of that date, examined the said document and now reports the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 1: Delete proposed clause 2

2. Page 19: Delete proposed clause 29

3. Page 23: Delete proposed clause 35

4. Page 26: Delete proposed clause 42

5. Add the following additional proposed headings and clauses:

(1) ADJUSTMENT OF ACCOUNTS ACT

(1) Subsection 21(1) of the Adjustment of Accounts Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"21. (1) Subsections 136(1) and (2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"136. (1) In respect of each fiscal year of the Government of Canada commencing with the fiscal year 1980-81, there shall be credited to the Unemployment Insurance Account an amount equal to the government cost of paying benefit for the fiscal year.

(2) For the purposes of this section, "government cost of paying benefit" in respect of any fiscal year means the amounts payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund in respect of the portions of the two calendar years that fall within the fiscal year for extended benefits under section 35 and subsection 38(8) and 39(3)." "

(2) Schedule III to the said Act is amended in the column entitled "Order in Council Date" by substituting, in respect of Order in Council P.C. 1959-24/1146, the year "1959" for the year "1969".

(2) CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Paragraphs 57(1)(c) and (d) of the Canada Elections Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(c) in the Province of Manitoba or Saskatchewan, to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench for the Province; or (d) in the Province of Quebec, Alberta or New Brunswick, the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories, to a judge of the Court of Appeal thereof."

(3) COPYRIGHT ACT

Section 19 of the Copyright Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(11) For the purposes of this section, a record, perforated roll or other contrivance by means of which sounds may be reproduced and by means of which a literary or dramatic work may be mechanically performed made within Canada with the consent or acquiescence of the owner of the copyright in the work and intended for and primarily distributed to persons unable to read print because of a physical handicap is deemed not to be a contrivance made with the consent or acquiescence of the owner of the copyright in the work."

(4) LORD'S DAY ACT

The Lord's Day Act is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 7 thereof, the following section:

"7.1 Where an activity referred to in section 4, 6 or 7 is permitted within a province on the Lord's Day by a provincial Act or law, it shall be lawful for any person to engage in that activity on the Lord's Day on any Indian reserve in that province."

Respectfully submitted,

Richard A. Donahoe
Deputy Chairman

He said: Honourable senators, there are four amendments consisting of deletions of entire sections from the proposed bill, and there is a fifth amendment, adding certain other sections, which was presented to the committee by the Department of Justice at the time of the committee meeting.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I expect that Senator Donahoe will be moving that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. Perhaps that would be a more appropriate time for us to hear about the amendments.

Senator Donahoe: Very well.

The report which I move be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate, as I said a moment ago, contains five amendments. Perhaps I should say briefly that this is not a bill that is before us. It is a report on material gathered together with respect to miscellaneous amendments to a wide variety of statutes. The amendments are said to be of relatively light consequence, in some cases correcting anomalies or archaisms. The practice is to submit the material for a proposed bill to a committee of the other house, and then to a committee of the Senate.

If an objection is raised to a proposed amendment—and it need only be raised by one member of either committee—the amendment is dropped if the objection is considered to be substantial. As a result, in this case four clauses have been dropped, those being clauses 2, 29, 35 and 42. I do not think I need take the time of the house to go over those in detail. Four new sections were added by the committee and do form part of the report, and I shall read those. The first is an amendment to—

• (1405)

Senator Macdonald: I think Senator Donahoe should move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Senator Donahoe: I understood that I had made that motion. I am now merely giving an explanation of what it is that will be taken into consideration.

Senator Frith: If it is done briefly, I cannot see any objection to that. However, I think we had agreed that the report would be just presented at this point and we will look forward to hearing the distinguished deputy chairman of the committee provide the Senate with an explanation of the report tomorrow. In the meantime, honourable senators can read the report and be better able to follow the explanation given tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Donahoe: I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY

SELF-SUFFICIENCY PROGRAM—IMPACT OF PREDICTED INTERNATIONAL OIL SHORTAGE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development relating to energy.

A few days ago the Chairman of Petro-Canada, Mr. Hopper, stated that there will likely be a critical international shortage of oil by 1985. If that is so, does the minister believe that that will in any way affect the decision of the government to have Canada become self-sufficient in oil by 1990?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, before making any comment on that, I would want to check the context in which Mr. Hopper's statement was made. Whether or not there is a critical international shortage of oil, the government is committed to doing those things that are necessary to make Canada self-sufficient in crude oil requirements by 1990.

Senator Smith: Would the minister be kind enough to indicate the sources which are now thought to be capable of utilization in reaching this happy state of affairs, and tell us the part that is expected to be played by the so-called oil sands projects?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could give a detailed description as to how we expect to reach that self-sufficiency point, but this has been outlined a number of times by others. It includes such things as substitution of natural gas for oil, this being achieved through deeper penetration of natural gas into existing markets, and by an extension of a line to make natural gas available to all parts of Canada east of Montreal that are not serviced by gas at the present time.

I can provide the figures in relation to substitution. In addition, there is the possibility of some further exploration in the conventional sense. A high figure is not placed on that because it is not known. A very large portion in meeting the deficit is potentially attributable to the heavy oils and tar sands deposits in Saskatchewan and Alberta. We believe that we have the technology now to bring on several hundreds of thousands of barrels from that source between now and 1990.

• (1415)

We sadly regret that an agreement between the producing provinces and Canada has not been reached, an agreement which would allow the industry and both levels of government to move as rapidly as is physically and financially possible into putting the processing and enhanced recovery schemes into place.

Senator Smith: I notice that the minister attributed a potential of "several hundred thousand barrels"—I think those were his words—to the tar sands or the heavy oil sands. Is that per day?

Senator Olson: It is per day.

Senator Smith: Then might I ask the minister what figure he has in mind when he uses the word "several"?

Senator Olson: Some of these figures are known. We know, for example, that the Cold Lake project is expected to produce about 140,000 barrels per day within four or five years after construction is under way. Alsands is another plant that is of about the same magnitude in terms of output that could be on stream before 1990. We know there is a potential to increase by, perhaps, 70,000 to 100,000 barrels per day the output of the Lloydminster heavy oil sands on both the Alberta and Saskatchewan sides of that border. There is a pilot project near Peace River in which about $80 million has already been invested. I cannot say off the top of my head the exact amount projected as being on stream there by 1990, but certainly it is a very significant amount.

In addition to that there is another project following in behind the Alsands project for the Fort McMurray area that could be on stream by 1990, if all the necessary permits were issued allowing it to go forward. So if you add all those figures up, it is safe to say that it does come to several hundred thousand barrels per day.

[Senator Smith.]

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—PRICE NEGOTIATIONS WITH IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a few questions on the same general theme of my honourable friend, the Minister of State for Economic Development. I suppose he has noticed the statement made recently by the President of Imperial Oil about the price set for crude oil coming from the Cold Lake project. I think the minister told us the other day that it was set at $38 a barrel plus an escalation for inflation. I observe that the company seems to think that this is inadequate. They say that even if they had no problems with the licence from the Province of Alberta, the project does not look attractive to them.

Can the minister tell us if any negotiations have been entered into or any discussions started with Imperial Oil Company as to the price to be granted for oil developed from the Cold Lake project.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, when the price of $38 per barrel was announced, and when it was announced that we were prepared to accept that price in 1980 dollars, this amount was, according to the best information available to us, adequate to attract the investment necessary to do it.

There is some concern about the escalating formula, and I think the one that comes automatically out of that is the CPI. Imperial Oil and others who are contemplating these megaprojects are concerned that the actual cost of construction will escalate more rapidly than the consumer price index. At the present time that escalating factor is under negotiation and discussion.

Senator Roblin: I think the minister has described the position fairly, that the escalation in costs is considerably greater than provided for in the formula. I take it that he is telling the house that the government is giving consideration to increasing, in effect, the gross payment for oil that will be provided by the development of these facilities. Unless he nods his head to the contrary, I will take that to be a fact and proceed with another question.

Senator Olson: I want to be sure that the honourable senator does not reach the wrong conclusions—that it is automatically more. The industry would be more comfortable and, I think, more confident in its investment if the escalating formula was related to the actual costs of construction rather than to the CPI. That may or may not turn out to be more, but it would be more directly related to the kind of investment that the industry would have to make.

Senator Roblin: I congratulate the minister on his optimism. I think he is just as optimistic about the trend of building costs as he is about the possibility of Canada's becoming self-sufficient in oil by 1990. I wish him well. I wish him no bad luck in his forecast; but I think he is just bandying words with us if he tells us that the price will probably be lower—

Senator Olson: I did not say that. I said it was related to the formula, and not an automatic conclusion that it is going to be more.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend left me with the impression that it would either go up or down, and I suggest to him that it will only go up.

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—FEDERAL LOAN TO IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my next question has to do with the $40 million that has been so kindly provided by the administration for that poverty-stricken group of people in Imperial Oil—which makes an annual profit of hundreds of millions of dollars per year. I would ask my honourable friend what happens to that $40 million if Imperial Oil does not go ahead? The company says quite plainly, in a quotation attributed to its spokesman, that "it just doesn't look attractive today." If it does not look attractive today, what happens to that $40 million if the project is not proceeded with?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there are one or two things that my honourable friend left out of the agreement that I believe are fairly important. One is that it is a loan that is repayable with interest when the project comes on stream. We have expressed over and over again our determination to make use of that and the other heavy oil deposits that are already known as one of the most important contributions to self-sufficiency. So long as one has the kind of confidence that I have in Canadians being able to make use of resources that are already known, and to bring them on stream, if there is a co-ordinated determination by all levels of government and the industry to do it, then I believe the risk that my honourable friend is talking about diminishes greatly.

Senator Roblin: I see, honourable senators. I have misunderstood my honourable friend entirely. His contribution of $40 million to Imperial Oil is another step in the Canadianization and the Canadian ownership and control of the oil industry, no doubt.

Senator Frith: It's a loan.

Senator Roblin: It is not even equity; so it's a loan. We are going to give or loan the largest American-owned oil company in the country $40 million in support of the government's policy. If they do not go ahead with the project—and that is a possibility—then it will not be a loan, it will be a bad debt, because there is no stipulation that I know of for the government to get the money back if Imperial Oil does not go ahead. But let us assume that they go ahead. I must say that I find the minister's convolutions of policy with respect to Canadianization rather strange.

I would ask him, however, if he is prepared to agree with the estimate of the Imperial Oil Company that it will take eight years to bring this plant into production?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is now leading into a technical question. We have not done that technical assessment independently of Imperial Oil, and therefore I do not have any opinion available to me other than what comes from their assessment, especially based on the engineering data they have. We just do not have it, but we are so confident that that is one of the desirable projects for Canada that we think it is worth maintaining what has been termed "the excellent team" that has been put together to bring that project on stream. That is what the $40 million involvement is all about.

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—PRICE NEGOTIATIONS WITH IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, in view of what Senator Roblin has just asked the minister, I should like to know, as I am sure the average person would, what profit will the company make at $38, even though the company is quoted as saying that the price is not attractive? What profit would the company consider attractive with the increase in the Canadian price? That is something we should know.

● (1425)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will have to take that question as notice. The senator is asking for details about what may come out of an application of $38, plus the escalator that is involved, and I cannot give those details off the top of my head.

I would like to amplify and correct the impression that Senator Roblin is trying to leave here, namely, that we somehow lose the money. The asset is there. The tar sands are known. We have enough confidence in the technology that is being develop to say that that project will go ahead, certainly if we have a major investment in it. It is a decision for Imperial Oil to make, and we are confident they will make it.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his explanation. I would ask him if he would be good enough to provide us with a copy of the agreement with Imperial Oil that covers this loan of $40 million.

Senator Olson: I can try to do that, but as my honourable friend will know, this matter is being negotiated and I will not have the agreement until the negotiations are complete.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

If I am correctly informed, the Minister of Finance made a statement recently indicating that his budget and inflation forecasts are likely inaccurate. We can understand him making a statement of that kind, because you only have to look around to see that unemployment is escalating, interest rates are going up, the dollar is falling, and with every passing week predictions of our probable growth rate for next year are going down.

We can see that the projected deficit is likely to be several billions of dollars higher than it would have been under the Crosbie budget. I am sure the minister will agree with me that the budget of October 28 addressed none of these traditional economic preoccupations that are usually dealt with in a budget, but served only as a vehicle to launch a somewhat less than adequate energy policy.

Will the minister therefore tell us if we can expect his government to bring in soon an economic statement, or, indeed, even a new budget, designed to deal with our economic situation, which seems to be worsening on every front.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No. I cannot give an undertaking that there will be another statement immediately. I guess the only thing I can say about the honourable senator's comments is that his hindsight seems to be at about 20-20.

Senator Walker: That's pretty good.

YUKON TERRITORY

POSSIBLE PURCHASE OF WHITE PASS AND YUKON RAILWAY

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government.

The leader has been quoted recently in the western press as being in favour of the White Pass and Yukon Railway being purchased with funds from the Western Development Fund. Is the leader pursuing this, and is he talking about purchasing all the assets of White Pass, or just the railroad?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been quoted as expressing a personal view that the White Pass and Yukon Railway should be purchased if that option is in the best interests of all parties involved. May I say that I think this is an attractive option. It is an important transportation link for the Yukon, and I believe that as part of northern development strategy it could be a very construction move. I think, as far as any purchase of the line is concerned, it would have to await an appraisal of the line's assets in order to determine the extent of any government purchase and participation.

Senator Lucier: Is the leader prepared to pursue this with his cabinet colleagues and try to get their agreement that the White Pass and Yukon Railway should be purchased?

Senator Perrault: The matter of how best to preserve a viable railway operation in the Yukon will be thoroughly discussed with my cabinet colleagues.

Senator Guay: By whom would the line be purchased?

Senator Perrault: By such an entity, for example, as the Canadian National Railways.

[Senator Donahoe.]

ENERGY

OIL—FORECAST REDUCTION IN EXPLORATION DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a further question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is the minister aware that Gulf Canada has announced a cutback in exploration spending for 1981 of more than 25 per cent of its originally anticipated expenditure?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, I am not aware of that.

Senator Donahoe: If the minister is not aware of that, perhaps he might be aware of the declaration by the Canadian Oil Well Diggers Association that exploration spending is likely to fall by 40 per cent as a result of the budget. On this side of the house we were pleased yesterday by the government's retreat from its inflexible position on our proposal for a delayed reporting date for the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. We commend the government for that. My question now is: When may we expect the government to show the same sensitivity to the energy needs of Canadians and reconsider its budget policies, which clearly imperils any possibility of oil self-suffciency by 1990.

• (1430)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is difficult to deal with questions the premise of which is that something is likely to happen based on someone's opinion. My honourable friend will realize, of course, that it is really a violation of the rules to ask a minister his opinion on these things. You can ask about government policy. Government policy is known; that is in the budget.

What we are working on now are some of the regulations that would be based on these bills. This is being done in consultation with the industry and they are giving us some useful technical advice as to the practical application of what is contained in the budget. That is going on now.

I would also tell him that there is movement of oil rigs between Canada and the United States from time to time. There is nothing new about that. The chance of finding commercial production in Canada based on known seismic data is about five times greater than in the United States. In other words, the chance of finding successful commercial production on that basis, in the United States, is about 20 per cent of what it is in Canada. That is a pretty important factor when doing exploration work.

AIR CANADA

SERVICE TO AND FROM OTTAWA

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am on a transportation kick today. It seems to me that Air Canada's service in and out of Ottawa leaves an awful lot to be desired. You have to reserve a week in advance in order to be sure to get in or out of Ottawa. Sometimes when you fly from the west to Toronto you can sit at the airport for three or four hours waiting for a connecting flight to Ottawa.

Would the Leader of the Government ask Air Canada to increase its capacity between Ottawa and other points or allow some other airline to provide the service? Air Canada seems to have a lot of objections when another airline wants to provide certain service. Could Air Canada be asked to provide the service or allow someone else to do it?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it may be useful at some point for the distinguished chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to ask representatives of Air Canada to appear before his committee to answer questions of the kind posed by Senator Lucier.

I would point out that the honourable senator, in terms of travelling, has to come from by far the most distant point to attend the deliberations of the Senate, and one can understand his special exasperation at the situation as it exists. The discussion in the chamber will be brought to the attention of the appropriate authorities of Air Canada.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: On this subject, if I may inform Senator Lucier, I have just attended a meeting with the vice-president of Air Canada on another matter, and during the course of our discussion I raised with him the need for a competitive non-stop service from Vancouver to the nation's capital. Mr. Miller assured me that this is being actively considered by Air Canada at this time.

ALBERTA

RUMOURED DISTRIBUTION OF HERITAGE FUND

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I do not expect an answer today, but I hope he will take my question as notice.

It is currently rumoured that a request was made to the Government of Alberta to distribute its Heritage Fund to all residents now residing in Alberta. If that were the case, how much would each individual resident of Alberta receive from that fund?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have heard that rumour many, many times. If the honourable senator can give me some basis for this assertion, then I would try to find out how much is in the Heritage Fund. We would also have to know the date, because the population of Alberta increases between five and seven thousand a month. We would have to know several more specific things before we could find out how much each individual would get if the fund was distributed.

Senator Robichaud: The date would be January 1, 1981. Could the honourable minister ascertain the amount of money that each individual citizen of Alberta would receive out of the Heritage Fund if this rumour were based upon fact?

• (1435)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. That question is not within the competence of the Minister of State for Economic Development. It concerns the Government of Alberta, and I suggest that Senator Robichaud should write to Premier Lougheed if he wants an answer.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can take the question as notice, but I am not sure that all of that information is available to me.

Senator Flynn: Not to you.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—INVESTIGATION OF CP RAIL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. He has undertaken, I think, to give me a statement on government policy as to whether or not an investigation of the Canadian Pacific Railway will be entered into. I would like to know if he has any statement to make about the decision on that matter.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I do not have anything to report on that question at this time. I am still as interested in it as the honourable senator asking the question, and as soon as I am able to report on it, I shall do so.

Senator Roblin: I am much reassured by my honourable friend's interest in the subject; however, I would ask him to indicate whether he can give us an approximate date as to when he expects the policy on the Crow rate to be announced. I notice that the Minister of Agriculture in the other place did make some estimate as to when that might be. I think he said in the first quarter of the coming year. Would my honourable friend be prepared to substantiate that statement?

Senator Argue: I am not able to substantiate that statement. I do not know what the grounds are for making it. The whole idea is under consideration, but I do not have any idea when an announcement will be made.

Senator Roblin: I should tell my honourable friend that he has been given credit, along with his seatmate, the Minister of State for Economic Development, for holding up the decision. I am not really willing to say whether that statement is correct or not, but I know it is being widely mooted in western Canada. Perhaps I should give him an opportunity to say whether or not he is holding it up.

Senator Argue: Was the question to me?

Senator Flynn: Both jointly—the gold dust twins.

Senator Roblin: Both honourable ministers were given credit for disposition of that matter, so I think either one could answer, or each can answer for himself.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can think of several ways to answer the question.

Senator Flynn: I don't doubt that.

Senator Olson: I think the safest way to answer it is to repeat the assertion that I know better than to comment on allegations that sometimes appear in the press.

Senator Roblin: Well, I think that is a pretty safe answer, honourable senators, but I will probably produce something more than a statement in the press one of these days in order to secure a more positive statement.

PUBLIC WORKS

TERMINATION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM—EFFECT ON WINNIPEG

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? It concerns a question which, I suspect, he will have to take as notice because it has to do with the Community Services Program. This is a program that the Government of Canada has made available to municipalities to support various municipal works of value. It was made available to the City of Winnipeg, but it has now been cancelled. I would like my honourable friend to tell this chamber, if he can, why it was cancelled—I presume money was one of the problems—and, more particularly, when it was cancelled, and whether any consideration was given to phasing-in this cancellation, because it is quite a blow to the budget of the City of Winnipeg to be suffered as it were, in one fell swoop, especially in the middle of budget negotiations.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall be pleased to bring a full statement to the Senate on this important subject. May I say, however, that this is not an abrupt termination of what was, I think, a very valuable program, and, certainly, a popular program, in Canada's provinces. There is a phasing-out of the program but we will see, despite the cancellation of the program, a substantial amount of public funds invested over the next few months. In other words, some projects, which were on the drawing board, will go ahead and will be completed. So this is not an abrupt termination.

Additionally, I might say that the government has been under criticism for its budget deficit, and in response to extensive opposition criticism, the government has been attempting to find ways to reduce expenditures in certain areas, especially in those areas where programs have been introduced and good works have been initiated. The feeling is that, now that some of the projects are under way, local resources can carry on these programs. Undoubtedly the program has been very popular and has been constructive. May I add that alternative ideas are under consideration now, which I believe will be very acceptable to municipalities across the country.

Senator Roblin: I thank the honourable senator for that assurance. I can tell him perhaps that one of the reasons advanced by the minister responsible, the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, for junking the program was that Ottawa was not getting sufficient public credit for its contributions—which I admit is a pretty serious drawback to any expenditure of public funds—and that anyway these are really not projects that Ottawa should be financing.

That brings me to a point I should like to underline in respect of the minister's statement, because he said that it is all very well to start something, and once it is going you can safely drop it. Perhaps there are instances where that is correct, but in most cases all you do is start something going and then, to the great discomfort of the other parties in the deal you pull the props out from underneath them and they are left alone, because it is not always possible or sensible for them to immediately follow suit and curtail their own expenditures to the same extent. I ask the Leader of the Government to take that concept under advisement when he is answering the question.

I think he is quite right in saying that the government will have other programs, because, while they appear to be taking away from the City of Winnipeg $8 million in this respect, they also appear to be handing back $6 million for a new project that is called a core project in the centre of the city, so the government gives, the government takes away, and the City of Winnipeg loses $2 million.

Senator Perrault: Most of these programs when introduced are not introduced with any assurance that they will be continued in perpetuity. Usually local governments and provincial governments are served with notice that federal funding is available for a certain period of time or for a certain purpose.

I well recall the federal Local Initiatives Program, which, while controversial in some respects, saw a great deal of local involvement a few years ago. The specific terms and conditions of those LIP grants were that they were for a period of, say, one or two years. In some cases the groups, after this preliminary period had come to an end, would immediately re-apply and say, "But this is such a marvelous work. The government has a responsibility to carry on this program."

This is a self-defeating exercise, if the government, in order to trigger certain good initiatives in a community by providing initial seed money is then asked to continue the program in perpetuity. One can well understand, if it were to be government practice to carry on programs well beyond the formal termination dates, why huge and unmanageable deficits could exist in the country.

I think the honourable senator, with his extensive experience in provincial government, is aware that the same circumstances occur from time to time as well in provincial municipal programs.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROPOSED SALE OF ST. PAUL'S COLLEGE GROUNDS, WINNIPEG

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: The City of Winnipeg is very interested in what we call the St. Paul's College Grounds, a very valuable property, which was bought by the CBC a few years ago for several millions of dollars. They are asking the federal government to consider their request to turn over that land for $1. Would the Leader of the Government find out if this matter is being seriously taken into consideration by the federal government?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I shall be pleased to make efforts to obtain a reply to that question. One dollar seems to be substantially below current land market values in downtown Winnipeg.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS—RENEGOTIATION OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS

Hon. Lowell Murray: I was interested in what the Leader of the Government had to say about the need for the federal government, because of its own financial stringencies, to withdraw from some of the programs it had initiated in the provinces and communities in the past.

My interest is in the range of programs under the Established Programs Financing Act, which is up for renegotiation very shortly. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would take the question as notice. I should like him to tell us what the procedure is going to be. Will there be an opportunity for the country and the provinces to examine well ahead of time the federal position in this regard, rather than have a take-it-or-leave-it proposition thrown on the table at the last minute when the provinces and the federal government meet; and will we have some opportunity to discuss this matter here in this chamber?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That question will be taken as notice. However, there has not been a take-it-or-leave-it attitude demonstrated by the government with respect to any of these programs. All of these programs are the result of extensive consultation prior to introduction of the program, and certainly there have been many discussions held with provincial governments with respect to this Community Service Contribution Program which is being terminated. The importance of discussion with other levels of government cannot be underestimated.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 26, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Argue calling the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular

1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;

2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;

3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;

4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and

5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, as the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board put this inquiry on the order paper, there were and are a number of matters I want to get off my chest about the national energy policy. I will not deal at any length with the minister's speech in opening the debate, because I think it was disposed of, with all its inaccuracies and distortions, pretty effectively the other day by our colleague, Senator Balfour. However, there are some things I want to say about national energy policy.

The first is that I think it is no exaggeration to say that the energy policy of this government is built upon a lie—the lie that there can be such a thing as cheap energy for Canadians. That lie was first propounded to win the election of last February. Since that time, in order to prop it up and lend it some credibility other distortions have been added; figures have been fudged by this Liberal government in order to produce the answers and the projections that would appear to support the policy.

The country has been divided by federal negotiating positions that have no other purpose than to keep that fiction alive and perpetuated. Now $4 million of the taxpayers' money is being spent by this government on a huckster's advertising campaign to refine that lie, to retreat it and to make Canadians so believe it that they will not be able to recognize the truth when it comes. International commitments entered into by the previous Government of Canada have been abandoned, and our international reputation has been damaged to perpetuate that fiction.

So, one lie has led to another, so compounded that today the Liberal government has an energy policy that would have us believe not only that we can have cheap oil, but that we can decrease demand for it now, that we can go on to achieve Canadian self-sufficiency and Canadian ownership, and that we can do it all at the same time and all in this decade.

As with any program, there are elements of sanity that stand out more conspicuously in the context of an otherwise irrational program. By way of example, there is a conservation program that was lifted from work undertaken by the previous government. But these exceptional elements do not in any way give credibility to an overall policy that has as its starting point an incredible proposition; nor can the conservation measures by themselves meet the energy challenge that Canada must face in the 1980's.

The respected British weekly The Economist headlined an article in its November 1 edition about Canada's new energy program with the caption "Wildcat Canada Resigns from the World." The International Herald Tribune, several weeks ago, called the new Liberal program a disaster. We have heard within the past few days what the High Commissionner of the United Kingdom in Canada had to say about our policy. In commenting on the fact that we are paying our producers about half what we are paying foreign suppliers, he made the following statement:

> As a result you are postponing the day of Canadian self-sufficiency and you are buying more oil than would otherwise be necessary on the world market. This helps keep world prices high and works to the particular disadvantage of the poorest among the developing countries which have no oil of their own. It also gives Canadian industry what amounts to big subsidies for energy use and thus raises among industrialists in Europe pressure for protective measures against what they regard as damagingly unfair competition.

Honourable senators, what the Liberal government's policy is doing to our international reputation is far less important than what it is doing to our economy and to our future as a country.

Can there be any serious doubt that the major energy problem we face in this country and in the world right now is that of oil supply? Can there be any doubt that oil supply is the major problem when the International Energy Agency estimates that there will be oil supply shortfalls of 2.1 million barrels a day in 1985, and a 5.7-million-barrels-a-day shortfall in 1990? Those shortfalls assume that supply will not be interrupted by political or military upheavals. Such upheavals would make the shortfalls even worse.

Canada will be trying to import oil in 1985 from that world market, with its estimated shortage of 2.1 million barrels a day. Contrary to the predictions served up by the government in Mr. Lalonde's policy paper to the effect that Canada will be producing more oil than it consumes in 1990, I believe Canada will be trying to import oil from that world market in 1990, when there will be an estimated world shortage of 5.7 million barrels per day.

Senator Frith: Who estimates that?

Senator Murray: The International Energy Agency, the IEA.

I have further evidence, which I shall come to shortly, to support that contention, and certainly the considered judgment of most experts outside the immediate circles of the Liberal Party back up the contention that we will still be importing oil in rather great quantities, not just in 1985, but in 1990, which is supposedly Mr. Lalonde's target date for self-sufficiency.

In any case, there is no question that our own Canadian oil production is dropping. Canadian production, or produceability, stood at over 2 million barrels a day in 1973. The government's policy paper projects it will be 1.3 million barrels a day in 1985, moving to 1.5 million barrels a day in 1990. Even those estimates of future production may be too high if the Liberal government's energy policy is as counterproductive as many believe it will be.

The Liberal government's so-called National Energy Program affirms a commitment to oil supply development, but that commitment to supply development is negated by its own energy policy; by its own budgetary policies. The reaction of the industry over the past few weeks since the policy and the budget were brought down gives the lie to that commitment of oil supply development. But even in making that ritual bow to oil supply development, the government specifically rejects—and I want to emphasize this—the government specifically rejects what it calls a "supply solution" to Canada's import problem. I quote the relevant passage from pages 98 and 99 of The National Energy Program:

> In short, the National Energy Program does not assume a "supply solution" to the nation's oil import problem. The supply forecast may well turn out to be pessimistic, in which case Canada could be in the enviable position of having an oil surplus. However, this in no way reduces the obligation to improve the domestic oil supply-demand balance now. The major part of the solution, as has been suggested earlier in this document, is to reduce oil demand to a level consistent with reasonably-anticipated domestic supply.

I think it is extremely important for Parliament and the country to understand exactly the effects of this policy of the government. Facing a world market in which there will be a serious shortfall of oil supplies, the Government of Canada is betting that we can overcome our dependence in that uncertain world market, not by a combination of increased domestic production and a curbing of demand for oil, but effectively by curbing demand alone—conservation and substitution.

Anyone tempted to take this government's commitment to conservation seriously should have a look at the track record. Since 1975, the government has announced three different targets for rate of growth in energy consumption, each higher than the previous one. It has made energy conservation announcements at least ten times and that does not include the programs that have been announced and re-announced. In one case we had the same program announced and re-announced. In another case we had the same program announced at least three different times.

The effectiveness of this government's conservation policies has been very poor indeed. Even their in-house program was a failure. In 1975, Mr. Macdonald, the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, announced a conservation program within the government, and then in 1976 Mr. Gillespie appeared to be putting some teeth into the program when he announced that in one year all departments were to reduce their consumption of energy by 10 per cent. In fact, 17 departments actually increased their consumption. Even the Department of Public Works, which was responsible for implementing most of the program, fell short of the target. So, it is very difficult, even for the most optimistic or the most trusting among us, to take seriously this government's commitment to conservation.

But their betting on conservation notwithstanding, they have come up with projections which purport to show that their conservation program will result, in 1985, in 290,000 fewer barrels of oil a day being consumed than would otherwise have been the case, and in 1990 they say some 334,000 fewer barrels of oil a day will be consumed because of their conservation policy than would otherwise have been the case.

Perhaps those reductions can and will be realized. Perhaps I will include myself among the most trusting and the most optimistic of people; but we still have to consider what the bottom line—

Senator Frith: It is just that we do not trust that you are in that category.

Senator Murray: I still have to consider what the bottom line on oil consumption will be, and here the government has produced some statistics that are, at best, questionable. In the policy paper put out by Mr. Lalonde, it is said that under the so-called previous policy—that is to say, without these new conservation and substitution measures—total oil consumption would be a 1.9 million barrels of oil a day in 1985. Yet last June, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources produced for the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance a table showing that total oil consumption in 1985 would be not 1.9 million barrels per day but 2.1 million barrels per day.

Again, Mr. Lalonde's policy paper indicates that without his proposed conservation and substitution measures, consumption in 1990 would be at 1.8 million barrels per day. Yet six months ago the projection was 2.2 million barrels per day in his department's background paper. If we go back as far as 1976, when the government issued a strategy for Canadians, they were predicting that consumption would be 2.3 million barrels per day in 1985, and 2.7 million barrels per day in 1990.

But what concerns me is that some time over the past six months the government has subtracted 200,000 barrels of oil per day from its base projections of 1985 demand, and subtracted 400,000 barrels per day from its base projection of demand in 1990. I would like to know what new information has been discovered in the past six months, either about economic growth or price, or about anything else, that would explain this sudden reduction in the government's base projections of oil demand over the next 10 years.

Senator Olson: The energy program of substitution.

Senator Murray: No, sir. I beg your pardon. I am talking about the base projections before this famous energy plan was to come into effect. It may be difficult for the minister to follow me, but I gave him the figures that Mr. Lalonde was using under the heading of "Previous Policy," which is to say before the National Energy Program was to take effect; and I am saying that under that heading of "Previous Policy" he has already subtracted 200,000 barrels per day in the past six months. In other words, he is starting with a base projection of demand that is far lower than it was six months ago, and I want to know why—because unless there is much more convincing evidence adduced, the suspicion will persist that the government is fudging basic demand assumptions in order to make the answers come out right, in order to produce a set of projections that will make it look as if self-sufficiency can be achieved under its policy.

It is rather interesting that the National Energy Board started some hearings in the country not long ago, to look into this very question of oil supply and demand, with particular emphasis on price sensitivity. I believe that is the first time they have done it with the emphasis on price sensitivity, and they are going to report next spring. So it may well be that the projections in Mr. Lalonde's paper are premature, in any case. But in Calgary they had scheduled two weeks of hearings, and they called them off after two days because so many of the companies withdrew saying, "We want a couple of weeks or months in order to revise our forecast because of the MacEachen budget and the Lalonde energy paper, and we will be back in January."

Senator Benidickson: Here.

Senator Murray: Here in Ottawa, as Senator Benidickson points out, when the hearings resume. But what has happened is that the base projections are being knocked into a cocked hat by the MacEachen budget and the Lalonde white paper. In order to highlight this point, showing how the base projections of the government on oil demand have been mysteriously reduced over the past little while, I would like to have incorporated in my remarks in Hansard a short table containing the information that I have just cited. I trust that in this respect honourable senators will grant me the same courtesy that they granted to Senator Argue the other day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows:)

Base Projections, Demand for Oil
MB/Day

	"An Energy Strategy for Canadians" (1976)	Government Background Paper (June 1980)	National Energy Program (Nov. 1980)
1985	2.3	2.1	1.9

Senator Murray: So much for the government's demand assumptions. Let us look for a moment at the supply side, at the projections of domestic production, and see how much confidence those figures inspire. The government predicts that in 1985 Canadian oil production will be 1.3 millions barrels per day, and that in 1990 it will be 1.5 million barrels per day. The latter figure assumes, among other things, that both the Cold Lake project and the Alsands project will be on stream in 1987. Earlier today we heard some questions and some non-answers on this matter from the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yet sources in and close to the industry are already being quoted as projecting that because of the tax provisions in the recent federal budget, Canadian oil production in 1985 will be not at the level of Mr. Lalonde's 1.3 million barrels per day but at the level of one million barrels per day, and that in 1990 production will be Mr. Lalonde's 1.5 million barrels per day, but 1.1 million barrels per day. Again this assumes that the Cold Lake and Alsands projects will be on stream by 1987.

An Hon. Senator: No way.

Senator Murray: Without those projects, total Canadian production in 1990 would be only 789,000 barrels per day.

The producing provinces and the industry are obviously convinced that the federal budget will have a seriously negative effect on future production in Canda, and, in terms of our goal of self-sufficiency, that effect, according to my information, will be as follows: In 1985 Canada's import requirements would be not Mr. Lalonde's 258,000 barrels per day but rather 597,000 barrels per day. The President of Imperial Oil said yesterday the import requirement would be 600,000 barrels per day in 1985. In 1990, far from exporting 45,000 barrels per day, as Mr. Lalonde predicts, we would be importing 510,000 barrels per day. If the oil sands projects are jeopardized, the import requirements would be at 868,000 barrels per day.

I was rather interested that at the National Energy Board hearings, to which I referred earlier, the Deputy Minister of Mineral Resources for Saskatchewan—and here I am quoting from a report in the November 27 issue of the Globe and Mail—told the Board:

> —the province fears a downturn in energy activity similar to the situation in 1974 when the federal Government disallowed write-offs of royalty payments on income tax, because the new tax regime reduces substantially a producer's net profit per barrel of oil. In some cases, he said, netbacks are zero, or negative.

Senator Frith: It depends on the kind of producer.

Senator Murray: Senator Frith says that it depends on the kind of producer. Indeed, and I will come to that before I am finished. Mr. Lalonde's policy paper says that the National Energy Program makes a massive, unprecedented commitment to improving the demand side of the equation. It describes its conservation and substitution measures as "the centrepiece" of the National Energy Program. Yet the demand assumptions are questionable from the start. As for supply, if Canadian oil production turns out, as a result of the budget and the Lalonde energy policy, to be closer to the new estimates that I have referred to, that are being produced by the industry and the producing provinces—if actual production turns out to be closer to those estimates than to the government's estimates, we in this country will be in very serious trouble indeed. To import half-a-million barrels of oil a day or more at a world price that, according to the government, will be $70 per barrel in 1985 and $116 per barrel in 1990, will be disastrous for our economy. Yet government policies are leading our country in this direction.

Canada is to depend, under those policies, on a reduced demand for oil in order to reduce our dependence on world markets. The validity of that assumption is, at best, questionable.

[Senator Murray.]

• (1510)

As for supply, Mr. Lalonde's policy paper says:

> —there is a basis for optimism. The new system should result in more vigorous exploration, especially in the frontier. There are new and encouraging signs of early production potential, especially from the east coast off-shore.

It seems to be obvious that their ace in the hole is going to be the east coast off-shore production; yet, the fact is that the potential there remains to be proven—in commercial terms, at any rate.

Neither the industry nor the producing provinces share Mr. Lalonde's "basis for optimism." On the contrary, they are projecting a much different supply situation. They are projecting a much different supply situation not on Mr. Lalonde's "basis for optimism," but on the basis of the budget and on the basis of Mr. Lalonde's policy.

Senator Frith: That is why Dome's shares went up by so much, I suppose—because of pessimism?

Senator Murray: My honourable friend, of course, pays much more attention to the stock market than I do. He is very sensitive today to these points. If he got beyond the stock listings in the newspapers today, he will have read some of the comments people from Dome were making about this policy, as well as what some of the people from Imperial Oil were saying.

Senator Frith: I would have to wait for the McIsaac Commission report to be implemented before I could afford to buy any of those shares.

Senator Doody: If we keep the price of energy down, we will all be able to afford them.

Senator Murray: Senator Balfour the other day, and Senator Roblin today, referred to the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors who put out a news release on November 5 saying:

> The combined effect of the federal budget and the cutback in production in the Alberta government may reduce available funds for exploration and development by approximately 40%. That could translate into the drilling of about 5500 wells in Canada in 1981 compared to nearly 9000 in 1980. The downturn will have a dramatic effect on the economy of the country. Jobs in Ontario in such activities as steel mills, automobile plants, as well as the petroleum servicing industry will be affected. We can expect a loss of jobs throughout the country as a result of the downturn—

Senator Perrault: Gloom and doom.

Senator Murray: "Gloom and doom," says the Leader of the Government in the Senate. No, reality, by people who recognize reality.

Senator Perrault: Gloom and doom.

Senator Murray: Let me cite from the publication, Drilling Contractor, perhaps a more objective source, published, as it is, in Houston.

Senator Frith: Is that the criterion?

Senator Murray: It is certainly more objective about the Canadian government's policy than the honourable minister, because it observes the same phenomenon of Canadian drilling rigs moving south, and it adds this comment in its October issue:

> Canada's problems aren't all bad news for U.S. contractors. The drilling machinery is being preceded by large sums of Canadian money to finance exploration. Current estimates are that these funds are already arriving at a rate equal to $1 billion per year. This exploration capital seeks refuge in the U.S. for the same reason drilling rigs will—disenchantment with the Trudeau Government's policy on petroleum prices.

I believe the evidence, honourable senators, is pretty strong that under this policy our country will be facing serious oil shortages and perhaps rationing before the midway point in this decade.

Instead of a budgetary policy that puts the emphasis on increasing Canadian production, we have a revenue grab by the federal government—a revenue grab that the government and its apologist in this debate, Senator Argue, try to disguise by telling only part of the truth. Senator Argue said that in the period 1980-83 the new policy will give the federal government $21 billion or 24 per cent of the revenue; the industry will receive $30 billion or 33 per cent of the revenue; and the provinces will receive $38 billion or 43 per cent of the revenue.

Senator Argue included in this calculation the distribution of revenues from wellhead prices of oil and gas production. He conveniently neglected to mention the petroleum compensation charge and the natural gas tax which together will add $14 billion to the federal treasury over that period 1980-83. If these are included, the revenue distribution dramatically changes.

Over the period 1980-83 the federal government will receive $35 billion or 34 per cent of the revenue; the industry will receive $30 billion or 29 per cent of the revenue; and the provinces will receive $38 billion or 37 per cent of the revenue. When we arrive at the year 1983, the federal government will receive $17 billion or 45 per cent of the revenue; the industry, $9 billion or 24 per cent of the revenue; and the provinces, $12 billion or 31 per cent of the revenue.

Of course, if you wanted to add the Canadian ownership charge of up to $4 a barrel, if and when it comes, the revenue distribution would be even more weighted in favour of the federal treasury. Here again, I have a very short table I would like to have incorporated in my remarks which will show Senator Argue's estimates of the revenue distribution under the new program, and what the revenue distribution will be when we include the petroleum compensation charge and the natural gas tax that he omitted. I should like to have that incorporated, as Senator Argue has done with his statistics, in my remarks in Hansard.

WELLHEAD PRODUCTION TAX AND PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Senator Murray: Our colleague, Senator Manning, described the implications of government taxation policies in this field in a well documented speech in this house on November 21, 1979, which can be found at page 389 of Hansard of that date:

> Much of the often irrational debate about so-called windfall profits misses entirely what should be the main point of government and public concern. If the goal is energy self-sufficiency, the concern must be to make certain that the maximum amount of increased cash flow generated by higher prices does not go into government coffers or company dividends, but back into the production of additional energy supplies.

Later, in the same speech, Senator Manning added:

> The matter on which governments must concentrate is not how much additional tax revenue they can gain for the public treasury through higher prices, but what steps are necessary to ensure that the revenue to producing companies generated by higher domestic prices goes into development of new sources of energy supplies. Honourable senators will agree that it is well within the legislative competence of the federal government of this country to do this, and to do it effectively. What is more, they can and should do it without the government itself going into the oil business. That is probably the most inefficient and undesirable way of attempting to attain the desired goal of energy self-sufficiency.

There have been some other interesting speeches on energy policy made in this place in the past, and since I arrived here in 1979. One of those speeches was made by Senator Austin, but another, and one which I wish to refer to today, was made by the Minister of State for Economic Development when he sat on this side. In fact, he made two speeches touching on energy policy in my first session here, but there is one in particular that I want to refer to, much of which bears retreating. On October 18, 1979, Senator Olson was discussing the need to increase recoverability from conventional oil fields, and he said:

> Those people who criticize the Premier of Alberta and his government for some of the positions they are taking should realize that the giving of incentives and rewards for increasing recoverability from the fields and discoveries that are already known is a very important part of Alberta's energy policy. I hope that the federal government takes that into account, too. Some people think that, with depletion allowances and a number of other things, they already have a great advantage, but if we want to do Canada a service, and if the government wants the oil industry to be of service in the government's objective of self-sufficiency by 1985 or 1990, incentives and rewards provide a very specific, and probably the most useful, inducement.

> The tax incentives have not been specific enough, and an examination of that area ought to be carried out. When you come to the bottom line, you find it is going to cost more money to bring this oil to the surface and put it into use. Let us not kid ourselves into believing that the oil companies or the provinces stand to make a bonanza through increased oil prices. It may be that they can skim off some of the easy, cheap oil at the top of these oil pools and make a few dollars on that—in fact, quite a few—but the oil that will come on stream after that to fill the reserves requirements for Canada is going to cost a good deal more money than the initial discoveries.

I am not going to go into this at great length today, but if the minister thinks that the incentives that he and his colleagues have put into the new policy for this enhanced recovery, are going to produce any results, he should talk to some of the people in the industry, some of the people in the producing provinces and some of the people in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources where confusion reigns on this very point.

Senator Olson: What have you quoted is as valid today as it was then. I have no problem with that.

Senator Murray: Then why do you not have policies that will support and implement it?

Senator Olson: We do.

Senator Murray: I have just told you about your policies.

Hon. David Walker: It is the minister that is confused.

Senator Murray: It is not my opinion. I am not an expert in the petroleum business. I am telling the minister that what he should do is consult, particularly in respect of this matter of enhanced recovery and the incentives in the new policy that purport to encourage it, with the industry and the producing provinces and perhaps even with some of the people in his own Department of Energy to find out exactly what these incentives are likely to produce.

I want to continue to quote for a few minutes more from this speech by the Minister of State for Economic Development when he sat on this side of the house. He said:

> There is a popular notion across Canada today that there are a whole lot of people out in Alberta who are going to bleed the rest of the country white; that everyone in Alberta is a millionaire, and then some.

Senator Donahoe: It's a great speech.

Senator Murray:

> They forget that there are constitutional matters involved in some of the proposals that have been made. It happens to be a fact that the resources of Alberta belong to Alberta, and, unless it is changed, I hope that fact will be respected.

A little later the minister is reported as saying:

> I want to say one other thing. The idea has been bandied about that if they cannot achieve redistribution through negotiation, they can circumvent the agreement by some changes in the tax equalization formula, or perhaps the imposition of some harsh federal law in relation to energy appropriation and the right of the federal administration to set prices. I hope that this government is not tempted to do that.

Later in the same speech Senator Olson said:

> Honourable senators, I think we should look at this very seriously. While the government might get a few dollars by trampling provincial rights with respect to natural resource revenue, they should consider the longer term implications of doing so. This applies not only to Alberta. It applies to British Columbia and Saskatchewan, and perhaps Newfoundland in time.

Senator Doody: Boy, what a speech!

Senator Murray: Again, I am quoting Senator Olson:

> We have to educate the Canadian people. They have to understand that if they want petroleum products on the scale that they are used to, or even on a more conservative basis, then the oil coming on stream to produce those products is going to cost more than it has over the past few years.

What a difference a year make.

Senator Flynn: You lied to the Canadian public.

Senator Murray: What a difference it makes when one takes ministerial office.

Senator Olson: May I ask the honourable senator a question at this time? What were the incentives and the price structures offered at that time by the existing government to bring those higher-priced supplies on stream?

Senator Murray: I am sorry, I didn't hear the beginning of that question.

Senator Olson: What were the incentives, both in terms of price of oil and other incentives, that the then government offered to the industry to bring those supplies on stream?

Senator Murray: I am going to come to that, as a matter of fact.

Senator Olson: Zero.

Senator Murray: I am prepared to say a few things about that before the end of this speech. I wonder why the minister checked those convictions at the door when he entered the government.

Senator Perrault: Oh, oh.

Senator Murray: It seems it was a very sensible—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Murray: It seems to me to have been.

Senator Olson: It is very political now.

Senator Flynn: He had no convictions at all when he said that.

Senator Murray: I sat over there and I listened to that speech, and I was so impressed with it that I sent it to some of my friends in the Tory party as an example of an honest and sensible view.

Senator Walker: It depends who is talking today.

Senator Murray: Today the honourable gentleman is a minister in a government that has embarked on a $4 million advertising program, a million-and-a-half dollars of it already spent, the purpose of which is not to educate the Canadian people about the facts of the oil situation but to deceive them as Senator Donahoe says, or to hoodwink them as Senator Walker says, and I was going to say to mislead them, to brainwash them and—I quote from the government's energy communication strategy—"to remove energy from the list of high-ranking national concerns." I wonder if the minister thinks that is a proper objective for the government? It is a communications policy designed for this fall and this winter "to remove energy from the list of high-ranking national concerns." There is more just in case the Leader of the Government should accuse me of quoting out of context.

Senator Perrault: I will try to be objective.

Senator Frith: And trusting.

Senator Flynn: You will never succeed.

Senator Murray: Later in the same document, prepared by the Director General of the Energy Communications Division, of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, there is the following section entitled "The Energy Issue Take Out":

> Despite some expected difficulty in the early going with regard to the impact of the energy package on the constitutional talks, it should be possible—given the general cast of the strategy thus far—to make substantial gains towards the removal of "energy" from the pantheon of major national issues.
> This is regarded as the essence of the strategy, recognizing that it may take several years to achieve such a goal.
> No propagandizing is envisaged here. The unassailable premise is that through clean, attractive, relevant information—basic information, completely in line with overall federal communications objectives—

Indeed it is.

> —we can dramatically alter the public's perceptions of the energy situation, and thereby change their beliefs (and perhaps even their attitudes and behaviour).

A bit later in the document, what is called a "semantic contrast" is outlined, listing in one column words that have been used up until now to describe the energy situation, and it says, "Don't use those words any more." The opposite column lists the new words that are to be used from now on.

Where, until now, the word "crisis" has been used, from now on the word "resolution" is to be used. The word "vulnerable" is to be replaced this fall by the word "manageable"; the word "waste" by the word "conservation"; the word "imbalance" by the word "balance"; the word "depletion" by the word "discovery"; the word "studying" by the word "deciding"; the word "uncertainty" by the word "certainty"; the word "indecision" by the word "decision."

Senator Doody: And "black" by "white."

Senator Murray: The first group of words are to be abolished from the vocabulary. It is a huckster's guide to a Liberal vocabulary. That is what it is.

Senator Frith: It must come as a terrible shock to an innocent like Senator Murray who has never been known to deal with words in this way.

Senator Murray: This is not a question of euphemism. This is not a question of using a softer term to describe reality. This is a question of falsifying reality. It is not an information program. It is what the intelligence community would call a "disinformation program." Again, to quote from the document itself:

• (1530)

> At the end of the day, one suspects, we would have created a montage of ideas, beliefs, and perceptions of the Canadian energy situation that would clearly demonstrate that we're really not talking about "energy" so much as its constituent elements—that we are really not talking about some grand national design, so much as a typical Canadian approach of managing, at the federal level—

This is from the government's communication strategy.

Senator Frith: Which government? Yours?

Senator Flynn: Yours.

Senator Murray: The Liberal government.

Senator Flynn: Probably Kirby.

Senator Murray: No. I have the name of the officer in question, but I don't think it is relevant. He is Director General of the Energy Communications Division at EM and R. In any case, I do want to quote this final paragraph in full:

> At the end of the day, one suspects, we would have created a montage of ideas, beliefs, and perceptions of the Canadian energy situation that would clearly demonstrate that we're really not talking about "energy" so much as its constituent elements—that we are really not talking about some grand national design, so much as a typical Canadian approach of managing, at the federal level, an efficient system of matching, balancing, interlocking, discrete regional energy sources and distribution systems.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Sentor Frith: It sounds like one of your disciples. Is that where you got the document?

Senator Murray: The quotation concludes:

> In short, we should be able to move from "national energy policy" to a public perception of "regional energy balances" (without ever using such words).

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: What a communications strategy. Not a "montage of ideas". It's a tissue of lies that they are planning to tell the Canadian people. I think it is scandalous enough that a communications strategy of a government would attempt to manipulate the Canadian people, but I must say it shocks me to see that ministers of the Crown would allow themselves to be manipulated and become the tools of this kind of communications strategy.

Senator Flynn: Think what they did during the election campaign. It was much worse than that.

Senator Murray: So this government has a demand policy that is questionable in its assumptions. It has a supply policy that its own budget, its own budgetary policies and its own energy policies negate. It has an energy policy that will keep Canadian production below potential and delay self-sufficiency, on the word of everybody outside the immediate circle of the Liberal Party who has any expertise in the matter. And it has an advertising policy whose declared objective is to "remove energy from the list of high-ranking national concerns." It is an information program unworthy of the name.

Meanwhile, we are paying Mexico and Venezuela and other OPEC countries $22 more per barrel of oil than we are paying Alberta, and the Prime Minister is congratulating himself on getting an apparent undertaking from Saudi Arabia to sell PetroCan 100,000 barrels of oil per day. It is not known, and I was not able to ascertain as a result of a question I put to the Minister of State for Economic Development last night, whether those 100,000 barrels are over and above present import levels from that country. In any case, the Prime Minister is quoted as saying that it is nice to have friends who will sell oil to you.

Senator Perrault: It certainly is.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: When Saudi Arabia entered into an agreement last spring—and this is a matter I raised briefly last night—to sell some 20,000 barrels of oil per day to Denmark, the Danes were obliged to accept political conditions imposed by Saudi Arabia, conditions which were widely interpreted as giving Saudi Arabian authorities a veto over the showing, for example, of a film such as Death of a Princess on Danish television.

All of us hope—and the Minister of State for Economic Development was able to do no more than express the hope last night—that such conditions attached to our purchase of oil on world markets would never be accepted by the Government of Canada, whether they relate to television programs, to boycotts or to anything else in the way of political conditions. But the point cannot be made too strongly or too often that increasing dependence on foreign oil means increasing vulnerability to conditions imposed by OPEC countries or to other political and military events which we can neither foresee nor control.

Quite apart from these factors, the economic cost to Canada of our dependence on imported oil is horrendous. Imported oil is now costing Canada a total of $8 billion annually. About half of this is coming from the federal treasury. The Oil Import Compensation Fund cost taxpayers $8.6 billion to the end of the fiscal year 1979-80. It will cost a further $18.3 billion to the end of the fiscal year 1983-84. Instead of using a dynamic energy sector as the source of economic growth we are exporting jobs and economic growth.

We hear a lot about Canadianization of this industry, and of course Canadianization must be a goal of public policy. But the people are still entitled to the truth from their government. The Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board said on November 20 that the industry is 72 per cent foreign-owned—a figure he arrived at by using revenue comparisons. This criterion seems to distort reality to some extent, because PetroCan, for example, is a large Canadian company with low earnings. On the basis of assets, foreign ownership, according to a survey by the Petroleum Monitoring Agency of this government, is not at 72 per cent but at 61 per cent, a reduction of over ten points in four years. Again, on page 1263 of Hansard of November 20, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board says that the industry has supported net capital outflow from 1975 to 1979 of $2.1 billion. He says:

> —some of this outflow has represented a return of capital to foreign owners, while some has represented new foreign investment by Canadian companies.

What the minister neglects to point out is that a great deal of this money went to the United States to pay for the purchase of Husky Oil by Nova, an Alberta Corporation, and of Pacific Petroleum and ARCAN by PetroCan. I do not have the precise figures, but I would be surprised if it was anything less than $1 billion.

So it is important to know what the facts are now with regard to foreign ownership and control, and it is important that more analysis be done by people who have political responsibility of the likely effects of policies that are ostensibly designed to Canadianize the industry.

Perhaps the government's policies will indeed result in some of the multinationals entering into joint ventures with Argus or Brascan or Power Corporation in the energy field, if that is the objective of the government. But there is no doubt that existing Canadian companies in the petroleum field will have their growth impeded by the reduction of some 30 per cent in cash flow.

Some economic commentators would agree with Michael Walker's observation in The Financial Post of November 22:

> The seeming inconsistency of a goal of Canadianization and a revenue-raising scheme bound to produce a negative reaction from Canadian firms, is completely resolved if the new energy policy is regarded as a first step in the effective nationalization of the industry. That would also explain the impassive reaction of the Energy minister to the protestations of such firms as Dome Petroleum and Canadian Hunter Exploration—shining examples of aggressive Canadian enterprise. If, on the other hand, the ultimate intention really is to buy out the industry, a decline in share values would be a desirable development from the government's point of view.

There is a wide range of policies open to a federal government that intends to pursue the goal of Canadianization. The Progressive Conservative government last year proposed the establishment of a $1.6 billion National Energy Bank that would have sought to develop an all-Canadian group to bring on stream the next oil sands project. It would have provided financial support for a gas pipeline to the maritimes, and it would have acted as a catalyst in the assembly of the consortium to build a Canadian-owned oil upgrader. Under the agreement between the federal government of the day and Alberta—and there was an agreement—

● (1540)

Senator Olson: That is only part of the truth, too.

Senator Perrault: Half truths.

Senator Murray: We have been over this ground before in this chamber—

Senator Olson: You say there was an agreement, and I do not accept that.

Senator Murray: The minister says he does not accept it. I have pointed out in this place before—

Senator Perrault: The mystery agreement.

Senator Murray: I have pointed out in this place before that both the federal government of the day and the Alberta government have testified that there was an agreement.

Senator Perrault: Why didn't they tell the people about it? The phantom agreement.

Senator Olson: Could we have a look at it now?

Senator Frith: We will consent to your making that an appendix to today's Hansard.

Senator Murray: I have not suggested that there be any appendices in connection with my statement. I have provided a couple of tables, and honourable senators have kindly given me permission to include those tables in the context of my remarks. I should like at this point to read, for the benefit of the Minister of State for Economic Development, and the Leader of the Government in the Senate, a statement made by the Alberta minister, Mr. Mervin Leitch, and I quote from Hansard of the Alberta Legislature for November 24:

> We had reached an agreement on all of the essential elements of the energy package. We said at the time of the budget that there were some i's to dot and some t's to cross, some matters to put into formal form, letters that may have been exchanged between the Prime Minister and the Premier, and other formal documents. But all of the essential elements of the energy package had been agreed upon.
> Mr. Speaker, in any language I am aware of, people call that having reached an agreement.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Could I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Perrault: Those two would not even campaign for your leader.

Senator Olson: I would ask the honourable senator to answer one simple question: Was there an agreement on revenue sharing?

Senator Frith: That was one of the little i's that had to be dotted.

Senator Perrault: They would not even campaign for your leader.

Senator Murray: The minister is saying that we cannot divorce price from distribution of revenues. That is where he is wrong. That is what has his compatriots in the west so infuriated. They want to settle on a fair price first and then talk about a redistribution of the wealth.

Senator Olson: I take it you are not going to answer the question.

Senator Murray: I have answered the question.

Senator Olson: There was no agreement on revenue sharing.

Senator Murray: All the essential elements of the agreement were there. I have answered the question in the words of the Alberta Minister of Energy, and that was confirmed by the federal government then in power.

Senator Olson: It should be noted for the record that you have refused to answer the question.

Senator Perrault: And they refused to campaign for your leader.

Senator Macdonald: I think, Senator Murray, you have hit a sensitive nerve with those people today.

Senator Murray: It seems to be a very sensitive nerve. Whether they refused to campaign or not, the fact is that we had 100 per cent support and 100 per cent success in the Province of Alberta.

Senator Walker: Anyone who was a Tory got in.

Senator Donahoe: Someone must have campaigned for our leader. We got all the seats.

Senator Murray: Under the agreement between the federal government and Alberta, Alberta would have lent $400 million to the Energy Bank and provided the infrastructure and financing for three new tar sands plants during the 1980s.

Senator Benidickson: Are you again quoting Mr. Leitch?

Senator Murray: No, I am not now quoting Mr. Leitch. I am stating what the agreement provided for.

Senator Olson: You are quoting again from the non-existing agreement.

Senator Perrault: The phantom agreement.

Senator Murray: I am stating that the agreement provided that Alberta would have lent $400 million to the Energy Bank and provided the infrastructure and financing for three new tar sands plants during the 1980s. That is a matter of public record.

Senator Perrault: Written in vanishing ink.

Senator Olson: But we have not got the agreement yet. This is based upon a non-existent document.

Senator Murray: As the Minister of State for Economic Development says, we do not have the agreement yet. You denounced the previous agreement and went back to Square 1. You have nothing now by way of an agreement, and the Canadian economy and Canadian energy self-sufficiency are suffering as a result.

Senator Frith: No, we have not got the previous agreement that you were talking about.

Senator Olson: It is the previous agreement, including the revenue sharing agreement, that we would like to hear about.

Senator Murray: The honourable minister did not find the cupboard bare when he came to office.

Senator Perrault: Give us the details now. Share it with the public.

Senator Murray: Let me remind the minister of some of the things that were in the Crosbie budget, which his counterparts in the other place defeated—

Senator Olson: Tell us about the excise tax.

Senator Murray: The Crosbie budget offered $2 billion in tax deductions to smaller companies, which are mostly Canadian-owned—tax breaks which would have improved their cash-flow positions and, consequently, their ability to expand. The previous government's proposed sale of shares of PetroCan to the Canadian public would have provided that company with $5 million more in funds and would have allowed that company to buy a major Canadian operator. The present government proposes to provide the money for PetroCan to take over existing companies by imposing a special Canadian ownership account tax of up to $4 a barrel.

The frontier lands provide an opportunity to increase Canadian ownership and control. I am advised that 90 per cent of the exploration permits on those lands are coming up for renewal within the next three years. The government could have increased requirements for Canadian participation in those lands, thereby ensuring a much more aggressive Canadian private sector involvement. Instead, they decided that the government itself would make a retroactive seizure of 25 per cent equity participation in all projects on the Canada Lands.

There is no shortage of policy options available to the government in order to increase Canadian ownership and control. The range of policies announced by the Liberal government has left open to serious question whether these policies can achieve the desired objective, and at what cost—at what cost to the ability of existing Canadian-owned companies in the private sector to expand; at what cost to the investment that is needed to develop supplies; at what cost to the overriding goal of self-sufficiency?

Honourable senators, we come back to the original lie that there can be such a thing as cheap energy for Canada. To perpetuate that fiction, the government has constructed an elaborate policy. It may be called a cheap energy policy, but its cost is not cheap. It will cost Canada very dearly. This policy will not achieve energy self-sufficiency and thus oil self-sufficiency, and there is virtually no one outside of the Liberal government and its apologists who believes that it will.

What will be the cost to Canada of the failure of this government to face reality and to bring in a policy that will achieve self-sufficiency? What will be the cost to Canada of oil shortages and perhaps rationing a few years down the road? What will be the cost to Canada of jobs exported and economic growth foregone; the cost in terms of our international balance of payments; the cost in terms of our budgetary deficit at the federal level; the cost in terms of our political vulnerability to foreign suppliers; the cost in terms of our national pride and national unity?

Whatever the short-term political advantages of this dishonest and ill-advised policy, it is causing permanent and serious damage to Canada, and that is a matter which should be foremost in the minds of honourable senators and of all thinking Canadians.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies entitled: "Retirement Without Tears," tabled in the Senate on the 15th April, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order has been stood retreatedly for several weeks. I have been holding it open for Senator Croll, and particularly in case of relevant developments in some other fields. I would ask that the order stand until Tuesday, January 13, 1981, by which time we shall probably have returned from our Christmas recess.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 4, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of State Act, Chapter S-15, R.S.C., 1970.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which were referred the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 1377.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Lewis be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Lang on the list of senators serving on the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Motion agreed to.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Bosa be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The addition of Senator Bosa will improve the committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Now we will be sure to get good spaghetti in the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, the 9th of December, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR A JOINT ADDRESS—STATEMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA AND LEADER OF QUEBEC LIBERAL PARTY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday before the Press Club of Ottawa the Leader of the Quebec Liberal Party had something to say about the federal government's proposals on the Constitution. He very clearly opposes the proposal as it is now before the Joint Committee on the Constitution. Since it is quite obvious that all of Quebec's political parties are opposed to the present proposals, I was wondering if the Leader of the Government could tell us whether the federal government is willing to examine the objections made by Mr. Ryan, which resemble in great part those made by the present Quebec government and the other party in the National Assembly, namely, the Union Nationale, and change its stand.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I know Mr. Ryan's views will be given every consideration.

Senator Flynn: I am not asking about examination by the joint committee. I am asking about an examination by the government itself, because it could shorten the work of the joint committee if the government were to agree with the compromise suggested by Mr. Ryan. Possibly some senators from the Province of Quebec might even support Mr. Ryan's position.

Senator Perrault: From the outset, government spokesmen have stated emphatically on several occasions that we are prepared to consider proposals for amendments to the constitutional proposals presently under study. I reiterate that government position. It is a position of flexibility. There is a government determination to make certain that the constitutional proposals are sound, and, if they can be improved, they will be improved.

Senator Flynn: I am glad to hear the Leader of the Government make that statement, but because of the stand taken by the Prime Minister in Montreal last Sunday, in which he appeared unwilling to accept modifications along the lines suggested by Mr. Ryan, I must ask the Leader of the Government if he is telling us that the Prime Minister has changed his attitude since last Sunday.

Senator Perrault: The Prime Minister has a very open mind on this subject. I can only suggest to honourable senators that they must await the events of the next few days to determine the degree of flexibility that this government may be prepared to demonstrate.

Senator Flynn: The next few days? Did I hear the honourable senator say we must await the events of the next few days?

Senator Perrault: Well, the universe will unfold.

Senator Roblin: But not necessarily the way it should.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a supplementary. Is the Leader of the Government telling us that in the next few days the government will announce that changes will be made to the proposals now being considered by the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons?

[English]

Senator Perrault: I am in no position to announce that any changes will be made, but on the basis of the expressed view of the Prime Minister that he and the government he leads are prepared to consider certain changes and amendments if these are advanced on a well-reasoned, logical and legal basis, there are reasonable expectations that there could be changes in the constitutional proposals before the committee's report is received by us for ultimate and final disposition.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: In view of the position taken yesterday by the leader of the Quebec Liberal Party, Mr. Ryan, against certain aspects of the proposals now under consideration by the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, will the Right Honourable Prime Minister of Canada change the stand he took last Sunday in Montreal to the effect that all those who are opposed to these proposals in Quebec support the separatist movement led by the Quebec government? Is the Right Honourable Prime Minister willing to change his stand since Mr. Ryan has decided to oppose the constitutional resolution of the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau, as he stated yesterday before the Press Club?

● (1410)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the remarks allegedly made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister have been taken out of context—taken out of context as badly as the so-called "hysteria" speech made in Regina. In its complete context it was a very eloquent appeal to the people of the entire nation to support soundly based constitutional reform proposals. The Prime Minister is well able to speak for himself in respect to constitutional matters.

It would be presumptuous of me to suggest to this chamber what members of the committee may feel about certain suggestions proposed by the leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec. Members of that committee will evaluate the proposals made by Mr. Ryan and by other provincial leaders, provincial premiers and others, and when they prepare their report we will have an opportunity to discuss and debate their proposals and suggestions in due time which, as the result of the agreement achieved yesterday, will be sometime after February 6.

Senator Flynn: I was suggesting to the Leader of the Government that it would save a lot of the joint committee's time if the Prime Minister himself and the government were to state right away their reaction to Mr. Ryan's position and proposals.

Senator Perrault: I am certain that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister will study Senator Flynn's suggestions.

Senator Flynn: I am sure he will not study my suggestions. I have expressed them before, and I have seen no reaction up until now. I am speaking of Mr. Ryan's proposals and position.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—EFFECT OF DEFERRAL OF COLD LAKE AND ALSANDS PROJECTS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question on the government's energy policy. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would prefer to wait until the Minister of State for Economic Development is present.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator could proceed to ask the question, and, if I have a reply, I will certainly make an energetic effort to provide it.

Senator Doody: My question deals with what appears to be the increasing cost to the country of the government's energy policy. The latest development is the Alsands announcement which, like the Imperial Oil announcement before it, states that the pricing schedule offered by the government in its energy package is insufficient to ensure continuation of the project.

Alsands has given the government, as I understand it, a six-month breathing space in which governments are expected to try to come together with a policy acceptable to the company. I understand it will cost the country about $165 million for that investment. Will the government re-examine the provisions in the budget with which the companies, and Alsands in particular, have taken issue, in the interests of the ongoing energy needs of the country?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I do not have an immediate detailed reply of the quality which the question deserves.

May I say, however, that certain opposition questioners quote only from those companies that have expressed some degree of dissatisfaction with the energy program. It is encouraging to note the renewed confidence in the shares of certain oil companies in Canada in the immediate period following the announcement of the national energy program, and other statements by various oil companies in Canada in which they said they see a great deal of good in this program.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable minister for his response. I have a supplementary which the minister may take as notice.

Just by way of an aside, I take it, then, that the minister would like me to bring in from time to time complimentary comments that oil companies might make. I would not want to inflate egos any more than they are already.

Would the minister confirm that the government's estimates of self-sufficiency by 1990 will be met in view of the Cold Lake and Alsands deferral? My understanding is that self-sufficiency is predicted on the assumption that 250,000 to 300,000 barrels a day would be produced from these developments by that time. Would the delay of six months, and perhaps a further six months, make a grave difference in the prospects for oil self-sufficiency and have a great impact on the requirements of all parts of the country over the next 10 to 20 years?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice. It may be useful to observe that this government eventually sees the price of Canadian oil approaching 85 per cent of the world price. The previous government had set its target at 75 per cent of the world price, and yet the present government is accused of being unrealistic in its energy projections and its program to achieve energy self-sufficiency.

● (1415)

As far as speeches which have been made by industry spokesmen are concerned, I think the statement made the other day by Mr. Bob Blair, who is rather a leading person in the energy industry, should be given a good deal of weight by honourable senators. He sees great advantages flowing from this National Energy Program, yet there seems to be an almost unremitting effort on the part of the official opposition to ignore favourable responses and to create a scenario of doom, gloom and disaster, and I would hope that the official opposition might be as optimistic about the future of this country, as are supporters of the government.

Senator Doody: I would like to assure the honourable minister that I am well aware of Bob Blair and his optimism, and I am also well acquainted with the government's policies. What I am trying to get clear here are the government policies in this particular stituation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SENEGAL—POSTPONEMENT OF CONFERENCE OF FRANCOPHONE NATIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, might I direct a question to the government leader in the Senate concerning the somewhat surprising statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the postponement of the Francophonie Conference in Senegal? It was alleged that France was to blame for this postponement. This criticism of France will not, of course, help in the international scene, and I wonder if the minister will agree with me that since Senegal was the host country, the suggestion that France and not Senegal made the decision is somewhat insulting to Senegal as well. Could the minister advise us as to the reasons why the conference was postponed, and what is the Canadian government's reaction to the situation?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie may be aware that there have been reports of possible governmental changes in Senegal in recent days. There are reports that the president may consider resigning. The situation is unclear. I believe that this situation, at least in part, is a factor.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, I am only bringing information to the house that was made available to me a short time ago.

Senator Macquarrie: Perhaps we should ask the indulgence of the minister to come again with a more thorough report, because there were some definite allegations by the Secretary of State for External Affairs which had no bearing at all on the state of the internal government of Senegal.

COMMUNICATIONS

BROADCASTING—CONTROL OF PAY TELEVISION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am informed that representatives of the ten provincial governments at a meeting last week in his home province of British Columbia unanimously concluded that the provinces should have jurisdiction over pay television.

Has this agreement among the provinces been communicated to the federal government, and, if so, what is the federal position in respect of it?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the subject of control over pay television was on the agenda of the last federal-provincial meetings in Ottawa. As honourable senators will recall, in the general area of communications the federal government offered to the provinces a greater degree of control over communications within provincial boundaries. It was part of a list of proposals submitted by the federal government to encourage a similar positive response on the part of provincial governments. That positive response, especially with the national government's proposal to entrench human rights, was not forthcoming. But I am certain that the deliberations of the provincial premiers in Victoria and the resolutions and many conclusions which may have been arrived at at the meeting will be studied very carefully by the national government.

Senator Smith: Am I to understand from the response of the leader that the government has not, so far as he is aware, taken a clear position on this present decision of the provinces regarding pay television?

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will be pleased to bring to the chamber a fuller response at a later sitting.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—EFFECT ON THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was not sure if I heard the Leader of the Government correctly when he was replying previously to Senator Doody. Did he say that the position of the government is to have the oil price at 85 per cent—

Senator Perrault: Eventually.

Senator Flynn: —whereas the former government had, as a target, only 75 per cent?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Flynn: How does the leader reconcile that with the position taken by the Liberal Party during the election campaign?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall be pleased to respond to that. It is the schedule of the increases and the auxiliary programs to accompany that price increase which are markedly different between the two parties, surely. The heavy impact of the Conservative program on the ordinary Canadian, particularly the drastic increase in gasoline prices and the substantial increase in natural gas prices, would have been disastrous, in our view, at this particular time of economic slowdown—

Senator Flynn: Not now.

Senator Perrault: —and it was the judgment of this party and this government that these Draconian increases would have hurt the ordinary Canadian very badly, and would have injured the ability of Canadian industry to compete. But eventually we do see the necessity to move closer to world prices, as was suggested by the Conservative Party.

It is a difference, surely, in philosophy between the two parties, and a different degree of concern about the immediate problems facing the Canadian people.

Senator Flynn: I would say that the only difference was that during the election campaign you wanted to give the impression that you would have a price lower than the one proposed by the former government. Now that you are in office with a majority, you do not care. You have lied to the Canadian people, and you have—

Senator Robichaud: Question. Ask the question.

Senator Flynn: I was not addressing Senator Robichaud. I know that he would not be able to reply, and he does not care to because he is always in agreement with whatever the government says or does. He is just a trained seal; we always know in advance what he is going to say.

I am asking the Leader of the Government what the difference is between the price of petroleum today and that proposed by the former government.

Senator Perrault: The prices are lower than those proposed by the previous government, I am pleased to say. Prices of natural gas are lower than those proposed by the previous government.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: Let me say, honourable senators, that I can understand the sensitivity of the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: I'll bet!

Senator Perrault: —because he was one of the architects of that disastrous Conservative program that would have penalized the ordinary Canadian to such a large extent.

The fact is that all the other programs which are going to march ahead to enable Canadians to conserve energy, to convert from oil to natural gas and other alternative fuels, taken in their entirety, will mean that the Canadian consumer will be infinitely better off under this program than he would have been under the Conservative program, despite the fact that at the same time we see that we must move far closer to a realistic pricing policy than did the previous government.

Senator Flynn: "Eventually". You have four years to do that. You fooled the public.

Senator Roblin: He didn't fool them. They are catching on to him.

Senator Perrault: May I complete my answer to this question because I now have some information before me? Dollars per gallon for gasoline: Under the Conservative budget, in 1981, gasoline price, $1.56 per gallon; under this program, $1.36. In 1982, $1.75 the Tory price and $1.53 under the National Energy Program. In 1983 the Conservatives would have pushed the price to $2.32 per gallon, and the Liberal price would be $1.71. In 1984 it would be $2.63 per gallon under the Clark-Flynn proposal, and $1.95 under the National Energy Program, and so on.

There is no doubt whatsoever that the Canadian people, in their wisdom, made the correct decision at the last election.

Senator Flynn: How can the Leader of the Government reconcile those figures with his statement that the government is aiming at 85 per cent of the U.S. price, when we were aiming at only 75 per cent?

• (1425)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in the ultimate the price would go to 85 per cent of the world price, but in terms of energy conservation, and other programs, to enable the average Canadian to save money, the Canadian consumer will be substantially better off with this program.

HOME HEATING—CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Can he tell the Senate how soon the provisions respecting grants of up to $800 will come into effect, and how long they will be in effect for those who wish to convert to other sources of energy? People at the moment have to go by the newspapers, of course, and the propaganda put out by the Liberal Party. They want to be able to claim their grants and use the money to convert to energy sources other than oil.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information before me relating to conservation in the province of Nova Scotia.

The national energy program will give increased support for the upgrading of home insulation under the home insulation program established in 1977. Approximately $61 million has been provided to about 156,000 households in Nova Scotia. Nova Scotians have benefited, Senator Muir, to that very large extent.

A $30 million industrial conservation program for the Atlantic provinces will fund up to 50 per cent of the cost of energy efficiency improvements in industry. This will reduce industry's vulnerability to energy price increases, and enhance its competitiveness in national and international markets.

With regard to the time frame of the program to provide the $800 grants, I must take that question as notice. There is a wealth of interesting information in the document that I have before me, but I do not have the precise time frame of the proposed grants. The taxable grants will cover 50 per cent of conversion costs up to a maximum grant of $800. Some 202,000 homes in Nova Scotia are currently oil heated. The program target is conversion of at least 171,000 homes by 1990.

I imagine that the payout of the grants will largely be determined by the ability and the skill of the outstanding craftsmen in Nova Scotia who will be engaged in doing the conversion work.

Senator Muir: I thank the honourable leader for that answer. I am sure that in view of what he said the people of Nova Scotia will be on their knees saying thank you to the all-wise, all-knowing seer of the Senate. That is with regard to the first part of his answer.

With regard to the second part of the answer just provided by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to the effect that he will take my question as notice, I hope he will bring back a very encouraging report that this program will go into effect shortly, since it is very difficult to find out anything from any government office with regard to the up-to-$800 grants that will be provided.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would like to remind Senator Muir, as well, about the grants of $400 per vehicle that will be available to commercial fleet operators in his province in order to assist them to convert the fuel systems of their motor vehicles from gasoline to propane. Virtually a shower of abundance is about to be bestowed on the honourable senator's province.

HOME HEATING—APPLICATION OF CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question arising from the reply of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to the Honourable Senator Muir, in which he referred to the conversion of a number of homes in Nova Scotia. I remind the Leader of the Government that the Ayatollah Lalonde stated that this conversion grants program will not apply to electricity that is generated by oil burning plants. Has this policy been altered for the third time since the budget was announced?

● (1430)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice. The answer may be forthcoming in due time, but I have not yet been able to locate it among the documents before me.

ATLANTIC REGION—HOME HEATING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: While the honourable senator is taking that question as notice, may I remind him that approximately two weeks ago he promised to supply this chamber with information on the length of time it takes to convert an oil-burning generating plant to coal? While he is getting the other information, may I request that again?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I believe that answer was provided when the honourable senator was not in his place in the chamber. Perhaps he should refer to previous Question Periods for this information, if his research staff have not yet brought my reply to his attention.

FINANCE

INTEREST—INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Can he confirm that the Bank of Canada interest rate increased today by 81 points, from a rate of 13.95 per cent to a rate of 14.76 per cent?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Yes, I have been advised that it has been increased.

Senator Smith: Can he also confirm that this rate is 76 points higher than the highest reached under the administration of the Right Honourable Joe Clark, which highest rate was 14 per cent?

Senator Perrault: I must say that I have not assiduously compared the interest rates as between this particular government and the previous government.

Senator Flynn: That's obvious.

Senator Smith: I noticed that the honourable gentleman is very assiduous in trying to compare, when he finds it to his advantage, as just indicated by the range of misinformation and figures which he read to us a little while ago. It intrigues me that he could not have been as assiduous in making comparisons which do not serve his purpose so well but which relate to the truth.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—STATEMENT BY CHIEF ECONOMIST, TORONTO-DOMINION BANK

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, may I also ask the Leader of the Government to confirm that the Chief Economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank very recently projected that the total of unemployed persons in Canada will go above the one million figure as a result of the depressing effect on economic recovery which these very high, and higher-than-in-recent-history, rates will have.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it continues to intrigue many of us in this chamber how the official opposition seem to revel in every truncated report of impending doom and gloom they are able to haul into this chamber.

Senator Flynn: Everything is going so well.

Senator Roblin: Inflation, the interest rate, unemployment, and so forth.

Senator Perrault: Their interest is so narrow that anything which suggests that there is a bright future for this country is filed in the waste basket and the other tattered fragments of bad news are brought into this chamber, and they seem to positively take glee in bringing that information to the chamber.

The situation facing this country—

Senator Flynn: Is very bright.

Senator Perrault: —is not the brightest this country has faced in the past. Indeed, the whole world is going through a difficult economic period.

Honourable senators, surely we should be giving the Canadian people encouragement at this particular time of the year rather than attempting to depress them.

Senator Flynn: You are quite a joker.

Senator Smith: I suppose it would not be unfair to say that both the official opposition and any other group who might be interested in these matters can well rely on the honourable gentleman and his associates to magnify and exaggerate the slightest bit of sunshine they may be able to find in the way in which they have conducted the affairs of this country in the last little while. Surely, he should not mind our bringing to his attention the things which he and his associates ignore, and which they would be glad to hide under the bushes forever.

I suggest to him that he cannot give any reason why the multitudinous sins of omission and commission of himself and his associates should be overlooked. After all, this is a democratic country where these honourable gentlemen have to answer for their sins, and the opposition has every right, and the very duty, to point out those sins to the country at large, and it is a weakling, indeed, who would try to take refuge in the empty rhetoric we have just heard from the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we try to be objective at all times.

Senator Flynn: You try and try, but without success.

THE BUDGET—REDUCTION OF OIL EXPORT TAX—BENEFITS TO SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to certain questions—not too long delayed, but delayed, in any event.

On October 29, the Honourable Sidney L. Buckwold asked a question with respect to the actual dollar amount which will accrue to Saskatchewan and Alberta as a result of the 50 per cent reduction in the export tax on oil. He proceeded to specifically ask how much of the rebate the Province of Saskatchewan would receive from the federal government in 1981.

Senator Balfour asked a supplementary question requesting certain information, including estimates with respect to the level of exports of crude oil, calculated in barrels from the Province of Saskatchewan for the years 1980-83.

As honourable senators are aware, provisions under the National Energy Program provide that Saskatchewan and Alberta will receive 50 per cent of the export charge revenue from crude oil exports, which is of substantial advantage to those provinces. Current forecasts place heavy crude oil exports in the range of about 90 million barrels a day in 1981. The total revenues from these exports, from the two provinces, could be approximately $740 million, of which about $300 million could accrue to Saskatchewan, with $70 million going to Alberta.

This is a feature of the National Energy Program which has not been dealt with extensively by the official opposition in this house.

Revenues, however, would be expected to decrease during subsequent years as the domestic price increases to a level closer to the world price. In addition, any reduction of export volumes due to increased consumption in Canada would, of course, also decrease revenues. It is not possible at this stage to be more definitive about export volumes and dollar figures beyond the year 1981, other than to say some decline would be expected as these heavy oils are taken into greater use in Canada.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

GOVERNMENT POLICY—PETRO-CANADA INTERNATIONAL

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 18, the Honourable Orville H. Phillips asked a question regarding Petro-Canada International. He asked if that entity would be participating abroad on an equity or on a loan basis in the development of energy sources. He also asked what method Petro-Canada International will use to raise the necessary funds.

The National Energy Program contained a major new initiative to aid developing nations in new energy projects. Petro-Canada International will be established to explore for sources of petroleum only in developing areas where multinational oil companies are often unwilling to invest. Petro-Canada International will also seek joint venture activities with other state-owned oil companies and discussions have already taken place with such companies in Mexico and Venezuela in connection with a major joint effort to assist petroleum development in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Some $250 million has been allocated for this company, including some $50 million for equipment acquisition and start-up costs.

Money for the account of Petro-Canada International will be in the form of grants in the budget of the Department of Energy, Mines and Ressources, and will be made available under terms and conditions yet to be defined. Proposed expenditures will be subject to approval by the Governor in Council.

NEWFOUNDLAND

PROVINCIAL ECONOMY—CONTROL OVER NATURAL RESOURCES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on November 24, 1980, concerning transmission of Newfoundland power through Quebec and the possible involvement of the Quebec government in discussions between officials of the federal government and the Newfoundland government.

Honourable senators, in view of the interest that the Quebec government has in this matter, it is the duty of the federal government to ensure that all parties, including Quebec, take part in these important discussions.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—TRANSMISSION OF ELECTRICAL ENERGY THROUGH QUEBEC

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 25 last I tabled a copy of a letter from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Premier of Newfoundland, respecting the transmission of Newfoundland electrical energy through Quebec, which prompted questions from Senator Doody and Senator Roblin.

The letter mentioned meetings between federal and provincial officials, and Senator Doody asked if steps had been taken towards arranging such meetings. I am pleased to inform Senator Doody that steps have already been taken to get those meetings under way. It is now a matter of fixing a date that is satisfactory to both parties.

Senator Roblin asked whether it is the policy of the federal government to await the disposition of the lawsuit that is now before the courts with respect to Newfoundland's claims concerning the exportation of electricity through Quebec before it can accept the proof that it requires in order to act.

Honourable senators, it is not the policy of the federal government to await the disposition of the lawsuit before it can accept the proof that it requires.

IRISH MOSS

QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, in the realm of delayed answers, I do not want to appear ungrateful or negative, and certainly I am not impatient about the question I asked about five weeks ago, but I wonder if at some time soon the leader could get me an answer to my question of last May.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Is that about Irish moss?

Senator Macquarrie: Yes, Irish moss.

Senator Perrault: The question is gathering moss. That is all I can suggest, but I understand that the preparation of a reply is near completion.

Senator Macquarrie: I was wondering who, in fact, was gathering the moss, but I will let that go.

THE ECONOMY

THE BUDGET—REDUCTION OF OIL EXPORT TAX—BENEFITS TO SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, with respect to the delayed answer to the question I asked about the refund of 50 per cent of the export charge revenue to the Province of Saskatchewan, I am delighted, first of all, with the response of the Leader of the Government, but I just want to get the figures straight. I did not quite follow them. Is it correct to say that the Province of Saskatchewan in 1981 will receive a refund of $300 million as a result of the new federal policy on energy? Would I be correct in saying that to the people of Saskatchewan? I know they will be delighted to get that news.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am pleased to read again from the statement which I have been given by the minister responsible for the program:

> Total revenues from these exports from the two provinces could be approximately $740 million, of which about $300 million could accrue to Saskatchewan—

Senator Buckwold: Just so I get it straight, would the "total revenues" be the 50 per cent, or the total revenue which the federal government is collecting? I do not want to go and brag to the people of Saskatchewan about our government unless I have the facts right.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You have no occasion to do that.

Senator Perrault:

> Current forecasts place heavy crude oil exports in the range of about 90 million barrels per day in 1981.

Senator Buckwold: That must be for a year?

Senator Perrault: I meant to say "90 thousand barrels", senator—or something like 33 million barrels a year.

> Total revenues from these exports from the two provinces could be approximately $740 million, of which $300 million would accrue to Saskatchewan with $70 million going to Alberta.

That would be $300 million a year for the great province of Saskatchewan.

Senator Buckwold: I think that is really good news, and I would suggest to the Leader of the Government that the advertising campaign of the Government of Canada regarding energy in the province of Saskatchewan, at least, should be directed to the fact that people are going to benefit to the extent of almost $1 million a day.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I hope there is no advertising campaign.

Senator Flynn: Even if it is not entirely true, they will say it.

Senator Perrault: May I add that this is a proposal which had not been proposed by the previous government, and it is particularly good news for the people of the western provinces.

Senator Flynn: True or false.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved the second reading of Bill S-17, to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, in April of this year I moved the second reading of Bill S-2, which had to do with the ratification of tax conventions between Canada and 11 countries. The bill was subsequently passed and now rests in committee in the other place where it has not been dealt with because, as I understand it, some members of the other place are fearful of the inclusion of Liberia, which they suggest may be a tax haven. Now, I make the same motion with respect to tax agreements—or tax conventions, as they are called in this document—between Canada and Australia and Canada and New Zealand. In both cases they update agreements that already exist between Canada and these two countries.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax. In addition, the bill provides that the Governor in Council may, subject to a resolution of Parliament, give effect by order in council to any supplementary convention.

At the time of tax reform, Canada had tax treaties in force with 16 countries, including Australia and New Zealand. The treaty with Australia was signed in 1957, and the one with New Zealand was signed in 1948. There are now 24 such treaties, and it is expected that many other countries will be added to that list.

You will note, if you compare these figures with those that I referred to in April, that they are the same, because the 11 countries that we hoped to deal with in April have not yet been dealt with.

As in the case of similar tax treaty legislation approved by Parliament in the past, this bill contains a part which deals with supplementary conventions. That is Part III of the bill, which is designed to ensure that the tax treaties can be kept up to date when there are changes in the tax systems of Canada and the other countries. The mechanisms provided for under this bill are similar to those agreed to previously.

The two tax treaties under review follow the general pattern of the treaties concluded with other countries after tax reform. They also follow, to a large extent, the format and language of the Model Double Taxation Convention, prepared by the Committee of Fiscal Affairs of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development—OECD.

The treaties generally provide that dividends can be taxed in the country of source at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. A general rate of 15 per cent is also provided for in the case of interest originating in one country and paid to a resident of the other country. With respect to royalties, the treaty with Australia provides for a general rate of 10 per cent, and the one with New Zealand provides for a rate of 15 per cent.

The only limitations provided for under the old agreements were 15 per cent in the case of dividends with Australia, and an exemption for copyright royalties with both Australia and New Zealand.

The provisions of the treaties relating to capital gains preserve the right of the source country to tax gains arising on the sale of real property, business assets and shares in real estate companies.

Contrary to other tax treaties concluded by Canada, the treaties with Australia and New Zealand do not contain an article on non-discrimination. It is those countries' firm policy not to include such an article in their tax treaties and, as a matter of fact, the existing agreements already reflect their position.

With respect to teachers—I dealt with this in the spring—no special concession for teachers from abroad is included in the tax treaties. The reciprocal exemption now granted teachers, under both the Australian and New Zealand agreements, will consequently be terminated, as have similar agreements with other countries in the more recent conventions that we have arrived at.

Under the existing agreements, pensions and annuities are taxable only in the country where the recipient resides. Under the new conventions, Canada has preserved its right to tax pensions paid to residents of the other countries. In the case of New Zealand, there is, however, a special provision whereby that right will be exercised only if the pension paid in a year exceeds $10,000. The country in which the recipient of the pension resides retains its full taxing powers.

Double taxation of foreign source income of Canadian residents is alleviated by way of a foreign tax credit. In addition, an exemption is granted for certain dividends received from a foreign affiliate of a Canadian company. In order to promote the flow of capital and investment, the tax treaties also ensure that proper relief will be granted in the other countries in respect of taxes paid in Canada.

On balance, the terms of the tax treaties provide an equitable solution to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and these two countries.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill to the favourable consideration of this house.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the document entitled: "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms or errors and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970", which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I am very relieved to have finally picked the appropriate spot in the proceedings of this house when I should speak to this report. I have a few words to say with respect to it, but most honourable senators are more familiar with what goes on in this connection than I am.

We are concerned with, in effect, a number of proposed amendments to a wide variety of statutes which are put forward, not in the form of a bill but in the form of a proposed bill, and which were submitted for consideration to a committee of the other place, and subsequently submitted for consideration to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. They were submitted on the basis that if any one member of either of those committees raised a substantial objection, or any objection that he or she considered substantial, the proposed amendment would accordingly be deleted. If, as and when there are some surviving sections that are approved by both committees, it is my understanding that a bill will be brought forward which will probably rejoice in the name of the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, 1980.

Senator Donahoe: It took our committee three or four hours of minute and exacting examination of these provisions to come to the conclusion that we could report this document back and recommend its acceptance by the Senate. We did delete two sections, and there were also two sections deleted by virtue of the action of the committee in the other place. However, there were four sections added dealing with four other acts—The Adjustment of Accounts Act, the Canada

Elections Act, the Copyright Act and the Lord's Day Act. There were amendments to each of those acts which were submitted to us, and which we approve and recommend for acceptance by this house, but which will, in due course, have to be returned for consideration by the committee in the other place, because they have not yet been considered by that committee.

I am sure no one wants me to go into any great detail respecting any of these amendments, either the added ones or those included in the original proposal. However, there is one that interested me, namely, the amendment to the Copyright Act. It is a provision that would make it easier for copyrighted works to be copied for distribution to the blind and the handicapped without interfering with the rights of the copyright holder. It may be done with the consent of the copyright holder, but, that consent having been given, the copyright holder does not thereby in any way forfeit his protection against other persons wishing to copy his works, which he would forfeit if the law is not amended as it is proposed in this action.

Honourable senators, those are my comments, and I ask the Senate to adopt the report.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: The honourable senator made reference to the fact that disapproval by a single member of either house of a proposal would be sufficient to have it deleted from the proposals before the two committees. What is the justification for and philosophy behind the idea that one member could prevail in such a situation?

Senator Donahoe: It is a little difficult for me to say what the justification is, because it is reported to me as being a practice that has grown up in this house over some period of time. The purpose of the procedure is to gather together in one place, and to deal with subsequently in one bill, a number of amendments that would otherwise cause a multiplicity of bills to be put forward. The type of amendment that is accepted for inclusion under this procedure bill is one that has the effect of removing an archaism or of clarifying a typographical or other patent error in the statute itself.

It is intended that these should not be ones that effect substantive change in the law. If one member of a committee feels that those who selected the amendment for consideration are attempting to bootleg in an amendment which, in effect, makes a substantive change, then it is felt this is not a proper kind of amendment to be included, but is rather the type of amendment that should be moved as an amendment on its own. Accordingly, it does not belong here and therefore consideration of its inclusion should be dropped, and those attempting to promote it can proceed in the ordinary way.

Senator Benidickson: I should have either known that or appreciated that that would be the reason.

Senator Flynn: These are non-controversial matters.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: I have heard that question and the answer. As a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs I asked the very same question that Senator Benidickson has asked. I asked it in the corridors, and the answer I received was that this legislation would come in the form of a private member's bill, which requires unanimity. That is why, if any member of either house objects to any portion of the entire bill that will be submitted, the whole thing can fall apart. The fact is, because it is going to be a private member's bill, that it requires unanimity.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in speaking in support of Senator Donahoe's motion, I want, on behalf of members on this side of the house, to thank him and his committee for the careful work they have done. There is, perhaps, an analogy to a private bill, but I think Senator Donahoe's explanation is the more accurate one. The kind of amendment dealt with here is, for example, whether a comma has been omitted or whether there has been a typographical error—matters that are clearly just housekeeping.

Senator Flynn: Non-controversial matters.

Senator Frith: Exactly. As Senator Flynn points out, even in the title they are called non-controversial. They are pure housekeeping matters. So, if anyone says, "I am sorry, I don't think that is a housekeeping matter," the proposal is removed and the committee proceeds with unanimously accepted housekeeping, non-controversial items.

Nonetheless, the document still requires a lot of painstaking work on the part of the committee. Therefore, I do not want this explanation to indicate anything but our gratitude to the committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Donahoe, acting during the absence of Senator Goldenberg, who is a member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, for its swift and efficient treatment of this important, even though non-controversial, document.

Senator Donahoe: I should like to make one observation in response to what the Deputy Leader of the Government has said. In fact, during the consideration of this document, two sections were deleted by each of the two committees, so we did follow that practice in this case. In those instances representation was made that something beyond ordinary housekeeping was implied.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-SIXTH ANNUAL SESSION, BRUSSELS, BELGIUM—INQUIRY

On the Inquiry of Senator Bonnell:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-sixth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Brussels, Belgium, from 14th to 23rd November, 1980, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the inquiry standing in the name of Senator Bonnell is for December 10. I wish to speak to this inquiry but I will not be here on that date. I discussed the matter with Senator Bonnell, and he agreed that the inquiry could be brought forward to December 9, at which time I could speak to it. His speech will then follow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 9, 1980, at 8 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE ON THE ESTIMATES LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1981

December 4, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981, were referred has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, April 29, 1980, examined the said Estimates, and reports as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of April 29, 1980, "to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981".

WITNESSES

The Committee made a general examination of the Estimates as tabled, and heard evidence from the Honourable D. J. Johnston, President of the Treasury Board and from the following officials of Treasury Board: Mr. J. L. Manion, Secretary; Mr. L. J. O'Toole, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch.

In addition, the Committee met with the following witnesses:

Department of Finance	Dr. I. A. Stewart, Deputy Minister
Bank of Canada	Mr. G. K. Bouey, Governor
Department of Transport	Mr. J. Charron, Assistant Deputy Minister, Coordination

	Mr. J. P. Blanchard, Deputy Minister, Commerce and Development
	Mr. F. J. Arsenault, General Manager, Community Improvement Corporation
Department of Finance	Mr. Gérard Veilleux, Assistant Deputy Minister
	Mr. J. H. Lynn, General Director, Federal-Provincial Relations Division
Department of Regional Economic Expansion	The Honourable P. De Bané, Minister
Conference Board of Canada	Dr. James Nininger, President
	Dr. Peter Gusen, Director, Provincial Economic Forecasting
	Dr. Thomas Maxwell, Vice-President and Chief Economist
Ministry of State for Economic Development	The Honourable H. A. Olson, Minister

OVERVIEW

The Main Estimates for 1980-81 amount to $59,013 million. Of this amount $57,861 million are for budgetary items and $1,152 million are for non-budgetary items that is loans, investments and advances. Statutory requirements amount to $34,075 million and non-statutory amount to $24,938 million. Of the total budgetary Estimates, $24,310 million represents funds for which Parliament is asked to provide new authority.

However, Honourable Senators should be aware of the following comments by the Honourable D. Johnston, the President of the Treasury Board:

> At the time of tabling I indicated that these estimates were prepared on the basis of the economic and policy assumptions of the previous government and had not been modified to reflect the policies under development by this government. Given the time required for the technical revision of estimates of this complexity, the government could not have completed the formulation of its own policies and programs without an undesirable delay in the tabling of the estimates.
> The government has refined its spending plans for 1980-81 since the Main Estimates were tabled. In the October 28 budget, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, set out the new expenditure plan that incorporates these policy and program changes as well as more up-to-date economic assumptions. Some of these changes were reflected in Supplementary Estimates (B) which I tabled on November 5th, and others will be included in future Supplementary Estimates.

PRESENTATION OF THE ESTIMATES

The President of the Treasury Board has informed this Committee that the Treasury Board Secretariat is in the process of developing a new format for the presentation of the Main Estimates. These recommendations spring from the Committee's view that the Estimates must present not just an enumeration of the government's spending intentions but should place them in a meaningful context. The presentation should facilitate the general public's and parliamentarians' understandings of the overall impacts of the government's plans in the context of the medium term needs and conditions of the nation.

In our ongoing examination of "Government Policy and Regional Disparities", we have come to appreciate in particular the diverse nature of Canadian society and the Canadian economy. Therefore we feel that any revised presentation of the Estimates should include brief, summary analyses indicating the relative regional impacts of federal government spending initiatives. We do not here suggest that this type of summary evaluation could be perfect or totally comprehensive; we recognize that such is technically impossible. Nor do we seek what has popularily come to be known as a 'balance sheet of Confederation'. The sum total of the benefits of Confederation cannot be summarized in the strict accounting terms of government expenditures. We do however hope that by displaying in a compact, comprehensible form the government's spending plans on a regional basis, we, our fellow parliamentarians and the public at large might be more sensitive to and aware of the government's programs in terms of the implications for regional and national economic conditions and prospects.

In a parallel line, we recomend that any revised presentation of the Estimates include an expanded evaluation of the Estimates according to function. In particular, we would like included a summary display of government expenditures aggregated according to which major sector of the economy—e.g. manufacturing, agriculture, tourism—is affected by the expenditure. Once again we recognize that such an exercise can not be performed to the complete satisfaction of everyone, and that at best the results will be reasonable approximations. Nevertheless, we feel that such information is vital to our understanding and assessment of the direction and implications of government expenditure policies.

THE MEDIUM TERM ECONOMIC ENVIRONMENT

In our examination of the Main Estimates, we have attempted to understand the economic within which the government's policies, represented by these Estimates, will function. While we have no pretence of being crystal ball gazers, we would like to review Canada's medium term prospects, and the factors we have been told will prove most significant.

THE OUTLOOK

The past decade has been a disillusioning one for most Canadians. The rose coloured bubble of the fifties and sixties, which featured strong productivity and real output growth, and, in retrospect, moderate inflationary pressures, burst in the early years of this decade and left us with a residue of uncertainty and distrust. Based on the comments of our witnesses, we see little that is likely to rinse away this residue. The Economic Council, for example, could muster just 'two cheers' for the eighties. The Deputy Minister of Finance, Dr. I. Stewart commented on the 1980's prospects as follows.

> By our historical standards, average real growth between 3% and 3.5% is low, but by the decade of the eighties standards is the kind of real growth that we are going to see worldwide. Nonetheless it is not sufficient real growth to make major incursions on the rate of labour force utilization, and therefore is associated with the prolongation of rather severe unemployment rates. (2:10)

Despite this apparent pessimism, we remain convinced that the conclusion this Committee reached in 1971 is valid today:

> There is no simple solution to the problem of economic management, but government does possess powerful policy tools for stabilizing the growth of the economy, and important improvements can be made in the use of these tools.

In order to utilize the policy tools effectively, a clear recognition and understanding of the goals and the factors operating in our economy is essential. We would like in this report to review some of these factors.

ENERGY

The energy situation which continues to haunt the world economy has been a constant factor mentioned by every witness appearing before us. We recognize that by now the subject is familiar to all, and therefore we will not proceed to discuss the matter at length. We would however like to note the enormous impacts that energy price increases will have on the Canadian economy, the inflationary pressures, the weakened growth potential as existing machinery is made obsolete, the hardships imposed on low wage earners and those on fixed incomes, and the redistributions of incomes from energy consuming to energy producing sectors and regions. While the Canadian economy and Canadians must adapt to the realities of the new energy world of the eighties, we should not lose sight of our opportunity as a relatively energy rich nation to utilize our comparative energy advantage in order to facilitate our general economic development. And above all, we must accept the enormous demands placed on all of us to ensure the energy security of future generations.

INFLATION

The energy impacts and pressures are ubiquitous; they influence all facets of our future, and in some respects dominate completely. But we must not be blinded by this energy veil. Other problems also contribute to the challenge of our future. Inflation remains one of the biggest concerns for our economy and our economic policies over the next decade. We agree with the Governor of the Bank of Canada that the rate of inflation cannot be reduced rapidly without serious economic disruption except over a period of years. But we are now concerned by the risk that not only will the rate of inflation not be reduced, but rather that it may in fact increase, and of itself cause major economic disruptions. The Canadian economy will be vulnerable to a number of inflationary sources over the course of the coming decade. In particular, international prices are expected to continue to rise so that import sources will continue to exert upward influences, and domestically, we will have to absorb the impacts of higher energy prices. If we allow these higher energy and international prices to become incorporated into a higher Canadian inflation rate, we will all be losers.

We have noted our general agreement with the views of the Governor of the Bank of Canada with respect to the difficulty of dealing with the inflation problem. We would also like to express our general agreement with the Bank's overall policy position. In 1971, this Committee expressed the following recommendation with regard to monetary policy:

> The Bank of Canada cannot operate monetary policies on the basis suggested by some monetarists. It must be concerned with such important matters as interest and exchange rate levels, liquidity and the financing of federal government debt. However, it should give more relative emphasis to steadying the growth of the money supply and it should guard against a tendency to be overly reactive to short term indicators.

While we continue to endorse the thrust of this recommendation, and hence we accept in general terms the Bank of Canada's current gradualist approach to the control of the money supply, we are concerned by the apparent intractability of inflation. We would therefore urge the Governor of the Bank of Canada to consider lower future bounds for the rate of growth of the money supply. Given the likelihood of unavoidable price increases in certain segments of the economy such as the energy sector, there is a real danger that further lowering of the bounds will cause a major reduction in output with its consequences for employment. However, in light of the present rates of price and wage increases; the virulence of expectations of continuing inflation and the concommitant speculation that is raging in certain areas of the economy, it is essential that stronger action be taken to reduce the growth of the money supply.

GOVERNMENT DEFICITS

The current monetary policy of the Bank of Canada is in our view an important element in the effort to control inflation. This policy is, however, not without implications for other aspects of the economic policy. In particular, as the Bank of Canada continues to restrict the rate of growth of the money supply, the impacts on financial markets of the federal government's continued deficits become more important, and possibly deleterious to Canadian growth. Government deficit financing adds greater pressures on interest rates and Canadian capital markets; productive investments may be crowded out, and the pace of economic growth slowed. Moreover, the continuing deficits increase the government's debt position, and thus lead to increases in the already substantial costs of servicing this debt. For the information of honourable senators, we would like to note that in the Main Estimates 1980-81, these debt service charges are estimated to be $10.275 billion dollars, 19.5% above the charges for 1979-80, and some 17.8% of total 1980-81, tabled Estimates. These large debt charges, in this period of a fiscal restraint, may be crowding out needed government expenditures in other areas, as well as contributing to the difficulty of reducing the existing deficit. We note in this regard the October 28 budget forecast of the Minister of Finance which projects continuing increases in the public debt charges such that by fiscal year 1983-84, these charges amount to more than twice the projected federal deficit.

POTENTIAL GROWTH

Dr. Ian Stewart claimed that, due to developments over the past decade, economists have been forced to revalue downwards their estimates of potential labour force growth, the potential growth of the stocks of machinery, equipment, and facilities, and overall Canadian productivity growth. Therefore, Canada's estimated potential economic growth for the 1980's has been reduced. We believe that this is a most serious and unwelcome development. But we also believe that by looking at the root causes of the problem, changes for the better may be possible.

(1) LABOUR FORCE

We realize that the slower growth of the population will impose certain restraints on the rate of our potential growth. However, we are concerned that our economic potential is reduced by the rate of growth of the labour force while simultaneously relatively high rates of unemployment are tolerated, and called 'natural'. We believe that the government should begin immediately to discuss and develop policies which will serve to reduce this 'natural rate of unemployment', with due and explicit consideration given to any social ramifications of such policies. In this regard it is important to reduce the "natural rate of unemployment" by structural changes such as training, mobility and unemployment insurance eligibility regulations and not by demand policies which will not reduce the "natural rate of unemployment" and only serve to increase inflation. Moreover, the government should closely monitor situations whereby growth in healthy industries may be blocked by the retention of employees in industries which, without substantial government intervention, would be declining in size. We would suggest as well, that, if applicable, immigration levels might be increased when, despite the above efforts to reduce the natural rate of unemployment, Canadians are not available at reasonable Canadian wage levels to fill new positions.

(2) INVESTMENT

We have already expressed our concern that the federal fiscal deficit might be crowding out some productive investment. We have other concerns as well about the state of investment markets. In particular, we are concerned that the demands placed on Canadian financial markets by the massive energy projects, about which we have heard so much, will make the financing of investments in other areas of the economy very expensive, and difficult. These investments are essential if Canada is to grow, if our productivity is to increase, and if we are to become and remain more internationally competitive. No easy solution to this problem suggests itself. Clearly we can make some progress by reducing the government deficit, but we can also consider the need to schedule very carefully our investments in certain major energy projects so as not to force non-energy investments to one side. We should be mindful that many industries will require substantial investments in new machinery, equipment, and technology simply to adapt to the new higher energy price world. The capital needed to make these adjustments must be assured.

(3) PRODUCTIVITY

Productivity performance has, in the past decade in Canada, not been in keeping with international nor our own historic norms. There are many valid reasons for the performance, reasons which are not reflections of inadequacies on the part of the Canadian people, industry, or government, including such factors as weak international growth and the growth of the demand for services which traditionally are plagued by low measured rates of productivity. But other factors, inefficient regulations, inadequate levels of investment in new equipment and technology, insufficient development of manpower skills, and slow responses to changing world market conditions must also bear part of the blame. We recognize that, even to the economic experts, much of the story of the past productivity performance remains somewhat of a mystery. But we also recognize that productivity growth is essential for increased real incomes in Canada and to our continuance as a leading international economy. The productivity performance projected in the recent budget for the next five years cannot be allowed to extend into the latter half of the decade. We strongly recommend that the government begin immediately a major undertaking to discover and implement long term measures necessary to improve our potential real economic growth through improved national productivity.

CONCLUSION

To summarize, the next decade will present both challenges and opportunities to the Canadian economy. We recognize the massive challenges to our economy and our country of the new energy realities, and we see all too clearly the risk of increased and debilitating rates of inflation. But we see as well the great potential of which this country is possessed, and we believe that given our best efforts and policies, this potential can be achieved. The effort to reach our national potential must be based on the achievement of the potential of all of the regions of Canada, a goal which has eluded us since Confederation. It is the intention of this Committee to continue its examination of the problems of "Government Policy and Regional Disparities", and to seek ways to achieve regional fulfillment in a national context. We welcome the continued interest and participation of all members of the Senate.

In closing this report, we would like to express our greatest appreciation to all of the witnesses who have met with us over the course of our hearings.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

PRIVATE BILL

GENERAL SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—BILL TO AMEND AND REPEAL AN ACT TO INCORPORATE—FIRST READING

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne presented Bill S-18, to amend and repeal an act to incorporate General Security Insurance Company of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Denis, that this bill be read a second time now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it would probably be better if the second reading of this bill were set down as the first item on today's Orders of the Day.

Senator Lamontagne: This evening?

Senator Flynn: Yes, later today, but as the first order.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

> That the name of the Honourable Senator Benidickson be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Laird on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps I should explain the reason for that motion, not so much to justify it as to give honourable senators news of our colleague, Senator Laird, who has been ill this fall. I believe honourable senators have received a note suggesting where they might write to him and send their best wishes.

I have been speaking to his son who tells me he is in hospital, and it is hoped he will be able to join us after Christmas.

Senator Laird is a former chairman of the committee we are now concerned with and, of course, Senator Benidickson is a former long-standing member of the committee. It is for that reason we thought that Senator Benidickson, who has also been ill but is now with us again, should serve the place of Senator Laird.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT'S SHAREHOLDING

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I originally intended to ask a question of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, but I see he is not with us at the moment. Consequently, I will ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question about the Canada Development Corporation. The original plan under the Canada Development Corporation was that the government's shareholding, which I think now amounts to 49 per cent, was, over the course of time, to be reduced to 10 per cent. Is this still the policy of the government, and, if so, when does he expect to give effect to it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall have to take that question as notice. If a decision has been reached as to when some of the shareholding will be offered privately to the public, I will try to bring that information back to the chamber quickly.

Senator Roblin: While my honourable friend is looking into that matter, could he also inform the Senate whether the undertaking, which I believe was given by the Prime Minister to the Canada Development Corporation, that the government would not interfere in the corporation's affairs, still holds good?

Senator Olson: I can take that part of the question as notice too, but I would think that, yes, that is still the obligation of this government.

Senator Roblin: I am anxious to receive the information because I have seen a number of press reports that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is studying possible ways and means of changing the operation of the CDC so that it may play a role in the manufacturing sector similar to that played by Petro-Canada in the energy sector. It seems to me that if that policy change is being contemplated, the chances of the undertaking holding good on the two points I previously mentioned are probably in question.

I really want to find out what the government's intention is on this matter because I notice that, according to press reports, Mr. Hampson, the head of the CDC, is quoted as saying that he has heard nothing from the minister in question with respect to new plans for that corporation. Would the minister take all that into account when replying to my question?

Senator Olson: I will take that all into account. However, if my honourable friend is seeking an assurance that we are not contemplating anything, the position is, and always has been, that when some changes are to take place, announcements will be made.

● (2015)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I appreciate the point my friend is making. I am really not asking for any speculation, but for a statement on the government's policy with respect to its shareholding in the company, and with respect to the Prime Minister's undertaking and other matters. As my honourable friend is quite aware, the stock in this company is also held by the general public. We have all these newspaper reports about the future of the Canadian Development Corporation, and it seems to me that the government should come clean and let us know what it intends to do.

Senator Smith: It probably doesn't know itself. You are asking a lot.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate that, but I think my honourable friend opposite may have trouble answering in the near future with respect to this matter.

THE CONSTITUTION

DATE OF PATRIATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government about the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. Recent statements have been made by the Prime Minister to the effect that he still holds to July 1, 1981, as the date by which all matters before the committee, including the patriation of the Constitution, will be finalized. I ask the leader if this is indeed the government's intention, and, if so, does the Prime Minister intend to adhere to it whether or not the cases now before the courts are reported by that time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government is still hopeful that the original time-frame targetted by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister can be met. If there is any change, parliamentarians will be advised in due course.

Senator Roblin: That is really not the thrust of my question, as I think my honourable friend appreciates very well. The thrust of my question is: Does the government intend to adhere to that date, regardless of whether or not the applications before the courts are dealt with by that time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the balance of the question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—MASSING OF RUSSIAN TROOPS ON BORDERS—THREAT TO WORLD PEACE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. The Canadian people are very concerned about the situation in Poland. The Polish people have opposed passive resistance to the government by creating independent labour unions, but we now learn that the Russians are massing troups along the borders and are getting ready to invade the country.

I would like to know what diplomatic action Canada has taken to communicate the opinion of Canadians to the Soviet Union and what discussions are going on in NATO at the present time concerning this sensitive situation. Are we going to stand by and let the Soviet Union invade Poland as it invaded Czechoslovakia? Are we going to watch the Polish people be slaughtered and do nothing? Are we going to take serious diplomatic action to let the Soviet Union know that an invasion of Poland would be considered as an act of aggression which could bring about retaliation from the member countries of NATO? Or are we once again going to stand passively by and witness a repetition of what happened before in Czechoslovakia?

● (2020)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question asked by Senator Asselin is an important one, and the implications for the entire world of a possible conflict involving the Polish people would be very serious, indeed possibly catastrophic, for all of us.

A number of statements have been made by spokesmen for this nation, including the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, stated in the House of Commons on December 4, 1980, the following:

> Madam Speaker, we are in close touch with our summit partners concerning this problem . . . The problems of Poland are for the Poles to solve and not for any other country. We have stated publicly on many occasions in the last number of weeks and months—we stated this clearly to the Soviet government—that the problems of independent countries of the world are to be solved by those countries and not by the Soviet Union.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister stated in the House of Commons also on December 4, 1980, the following:

> We would not like to see a repeat of the situation at the time of the Afghanistan invasion by the Soviet Union when most Western nations acted on their own to condemn that invasion and to indicate that they were not only opposed to the invasion but that détente was severely threatened, that they would take various measures to protest that invasion. The Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition was then Prime Minister and I do not have to remind him that we succeeded less in showing our condemnation of the Soviet Union than showing the extent to which the Western nations were divided, whether it was over the Olympics, the grain boycott, or the interruption of visits and of détente with the Soviet Union.

He went on to say:

> In this very serious time for the peace of the world we in Canada do not care to show again that kind of division which existed . . . We are hoping that the Western nations will be able to react in a more united way to this very serious threat.

He went on to say:

> —I have been in personal meetings with at least three of the leaders of the Western nations and that I have been in contact by personal correspondence with the others.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: On a supplementary. I certainly appreciate the remarks just made by the government leader in the Senate concerning this situation. However I am under the impression that Canada has not taken and does not take seriously the action taken by the Soviets in massing their troops along the border. In a press conference, the Right Honourable Prime Minister has apparently said that this was a hypothetical situation. We do not know whether or not there will be an invasion. He said the same thing about Afghanistan. But when the Conservatives were in power, we took economic sanctions against Russia. We cut back wheat shipments to that country. What has the present government done? It has merely, in the last while, increased wheat shipments to Russia. Therefore the economic sanctions we took were completely neutralized. Are we just going to sit back and wait for another Afghanistan type of situation to develop? Has the Canadian government at least advised the Soviet Union that if it invades Poland there would at least be a break in diplomatic relations between the two countries? Would economic sanctions be taken against the Soviet Union? How can the actions taken by the Canadian Parliament remain credible in the eyes of the Soviets if, following our sanctions, your government simply resumes wheat sales to the Soviet Union? Can it be taken seriously?

[English]

Senator Perrault: First of all, I wish to assure Senator Asselin that the supporters of the government are just as concerned with the situation in Poland as are members of his party. Indeed, all Canadians, regardless of political affiliation, are concerned about it. Secondly, this very day the Minister of Defence and Canadian defence officials and others are attending a meeting of NATO defence ministers in Brussels.

I shall undertake to obtain as complete a statement as is possible to make on the Polish situation and the outcome of today's talks. That information is not yet available but it shall be brought to the Senate just as soon as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT

COMPILATION OF STATISTICS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Without going through all the statistics which I am sure he read today concerning employment and unemployment, I would draw his attention to the fact that it appears that while seasonally adjusted unemployment dropped, so did the size of the labour force. This indicates to me that it is very likely that many Canadians, discouraged from looking for work, have simply stopped making their desires known to the people who gather the statistics.

I am wondering if in view of the various discussions which have taken place in recent months about the methods of gathering the statistics, the government has in mind any firm policy with reference to changing the method of assembling and correlating these statistics so as to reflect truly the number of people who are out of work.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, nobody can be satisfied with the unemployment situation which exists in this country today. No one is satisfied with the economic situation which exists throughout the world today. It is a difficult time, a time of trial for the entire world.

As far as measuring the exact number of people unemployed is concerned, there are different methods here and abroad. Some European countries, for example, measure unemployment in terms of those above the age of 21 who register as seeking work at the local employment office. That is somewhat different from Canada's labour force survey which uses random survey methods and on this basis attempts to determine all those above the age of 15 who would like to have work and who are not presently employed.

A number of other changes in the labour force have also taken place in recent years. There are many multiple-job households. Not only is the head of the family, male or female, in the work force, but so are sons and daughters. It may be that both the husband and wife are working. It is not an easy task to measure the extent of unemployment and the economic impact of that unemployment on the family unit.

I think it can be said, however, that on a continuing basis the Department of Labour and Statistics Canada attempt to devise methods and techniques to measure unemployment more accurately. In this regard, I would be pleased to bring a supplementary statement to the Senate.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I thank the leader for his assurances that he will bring in a more detailed answer to the Senate in the near future. I would say, however, that it seems to me from my recollection of reading the facts about this matter over many years that the government had that time to decide upon a policy or a means of more accurately gathering the information, and perhaps the leader, when he is gathering the information for his further answer, would attempt to pay particular attention to whether or not such a policy has been developed.

THE ECONOMY

FOOD PRICES—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wish to draw the attention of the Leader of the Government to what appear to be remarks of the Prime Minister of this country very recently in a press conference to the general effect that if Canadians find it difficult to set enough on their tables to suit themselves and to give them adequate nourishment, they might very well re-order their priorities as to how to spend their money. In this respect I would like to ask the Leader of the Government what policy the government has now in place to assist people to make this very difficult choice.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the matter of statistics was the subject of the honourable senator's previous question.

[Senator Smith.]

The method of assessing unemployment is continually being updated, assisted to a very large extent by the increasing application of computer science to the task of measuring unemployment. But there are still apparent discrepancies which exist from time to time. When one compares, for example, the number listed at the local unemployment insurance office with the labour force survey of the estimated number of unemployed, there are often differences one way or the other.

• (2030)

With respect to the remarks attributed to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, I know the Honourable Senator Smith, with his extensive experience as leader of a provincial party, has never in his life been reported out of context. Of course, I am being facetious. I don't know of anyone in public life who at times has not suffered the problem and frustration of being quoted out of context. I suppose it is an occupational hazard.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister did not state without qualifications that, if low-income people are suffering from inflation, they should learn to shop more sharply.

Senator Smith: I am sorry, I did not hear you.

Senator Perrault: I stated that to suggest that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister's only response to the question: "How are the poor people going to get by in this country?" was, "Well, they should learn to buy cheaper food to put on the dinner table," and so on, is really quite unfair to the Prime Minister, honourable senators. I think that all those in public life would agree.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no!

Senator Perrault: I suggest to you that that quotation is in the same category as that misleading remark attributed to the Prime Minister: "Why should I sell your wheat?" That remark, too, was taken out of context. It is in the same category as that statement the other day attributed to the Prime Minister that "western Canadians are being hysterical"—another remark taken out of context and misused by the opposition. And I suggest that the remark quoted by the honourable senator in this chamber is equally out of context.

Senator Smith: It amazes me that the Leader of the Government is so concerned about so many matters which have, according to his view of things, been taken out of context, but which the whole country believes were said and were meant to be said and were meant to mean what they seemed to mean.

As for this particular remark, I respond quickly to the honourable gentleman's comment about being taken out of context by saying that, like himself, I have often suffered in the past, and still suffer, from having my remarks taken out of context; but I have never circulated a transcript of my own speech containing the words complained about, and then say that I had been taken out of context. But that is what has happened in this case. That is what the honourable gentleman happens to have done.

I may have been misled since coming to this chamber some years ago, but I have supposed that when Prime Ministers of Canada, including the present Prime Minister, have caused to be circulated transcripts of speeches or transcripts of press conferences, they have done so expecting people to take them as being truthful and accurate. That is what I did.

If the honourable leader is saying to me that we cannot rely on what is circulated by the government or by the Prime Minister, then let him say so. Until he is prepared to say otherwise, I expect to treat these transcripts as being worthy of belief and worthy of comment.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if there is any concern about what the Prime Minister said during his press conference, I challenge the honourable senator to place in the written record of today's proceedings every word of the Prime Minister at that press conference so that the Canadian people, starting with senators, can determine exactly what he said.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: May I further suggest to those members of the opposition who trade in quotes out of context—those, for example, who say to westerners, "You see! The Prime Minister says that you are hysterical"—that they should allow the exact words of the Prime Minister to be inscribed in the Debates of the Senate so that the people of Canada can judge who is being responsible and who is being irresponsible in Parliament today. This business of pouring gasoline on the fires of misunderstanding—

Senator Flynn: Hah!

Senator Perrault: —is not to the credit of the opposition; it is not to the credit of this great and historic Conservative Party to have spokesmen indulging in that kind of verbal pyromania.

● (2035)

Senator Smith: Well, if the honourable gentleman ever expected himself to be taken seriously, he has removed any chance of that by his last words. The honourable gentleman, having been in opposition for a goodly part of his parliamentary life, knows that it is the duty of the opposition to bring these things to light.

Senator Perrault: Responsibly.

Senator Smith: Had he ever been accused of being irresponsible in bringing the sins of omission or commission of the government to which he was opposed to light, he would have risen to righteous anger and blown the house down. He would have huffed and puffed and blown the house down.

Senator Flynn: He still does.

Senator Smith: The honourable gentleman, when he hears something that he does not like, says that it is taken out of context. Well, one can cry "Wolf!" too often, and the honourable gentleman has cried "Out of context" too often tonight to allow us to take him seriously the next time he says it. I do not think we have taken him seriously at any time he has said it in the past.

I ask the honourable gentleman why it is that he has not answered my question, instead of launching into this—

Senator Perrault: What was your question again?

Senator Smith: Had the honourable gentleman paid attention to it, he would not now have to ask. My question was a straightforward one. What policy does the government have to assist people in making this choice which the Prime Minister has indicated is the right way by which they should go about dealing with inflation—namely, how are they to re-arrange their priorities in spending their money so that they can put food on the table.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am proud to be associated with a government which has initiated perhaps the best consumer information program in the entire world. If the honourable senator is having difficulty with his own household budget, I shall personally make myself responsible to equip him with certain booklets on how to budget, all produced by a Liberal government interested in consumer welfare.

Senator Flynn: Huff and puff.

Senator Smith: I am afraid all this government has produced is booklets. Booklets make a pretty poor diet. Did the honourable gentleman every try to satisfy his hunger by eating paper?

Hon. Jack Marshall: A supplementary honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: A supplementary! Haven't you had enough?

Senator Marshall: The Leader of the Government has asked that what the Prime Minister said be put on the record. At page 5446 of Hansard of the other place, in replying to a question from the Honourable Mr. McGrath, the Prime Minister said:

> I take it he himself knows it is a commonsense matter when you have a set budget to spend more or less of it on the aspects which are more necessary to your daily life—

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government how people on fixed and the low incomes, those on welfare, can set any priorities. After they have paid for their fuel, which takes 30 per cent of their income, their light, telephone and rent, they have nothing left for food.

In what order does the government leader suggest these people put these priorities? They are all priorities. These people just cannot live on their incomes. If my honourable friend wants to come over to my office and listen to the telephone calls from these people asking for help, he is welcome to do so.

What answer does the Prime Minister have for these people?

Senator Smith: Eat some more bread.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand the challenges facing those in opposition. I was in opposition for ten years. However, there is a difference between responsible opposition and irresponsible opposition.

Senator Flynn: You should know all about that.

Senator Perrault: The suggestion by some members of the opposition that the Prime Minister's response the other day represents the sum total of this government's approach to the real and pressing problems facing so many Canadians is quite irresponsible. There is no question that many Canadians are living a less than satisfactory existence. That is understood. But, at the same time, as Senator Marshall has himself said, we have in place in Canada perhaps the finest veterans' program in the entire western world. This and previous "Liberal" governments have brought into being some of the world's best "human" programs, such as hospitilization and medical care, and unemployment insurance—not perfect, but as good as those anywhere.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INVESTMENT IN CANADIAN OIL STOCKS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

In view of the stated government policy to increase the share of ownership of the oil industry from the present level to 50 per cent by 1990, can he tell us whether any thought has been given to changing the terms of reference of the Canada Pension Plan to enable its management to invest a portion of the funds in oil company stocks which have the potential of increasing in value. This is a pension plan, I might say, that the actuaries are predicting will run out of funds by the end of the century.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not think any consideration has been given to such a change. I shall take the question as notice, and try to get a detailed answer.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO RAILWAYS FOR MOVEMENT OF GRAIN FOR EXPORT

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

The President of Canadian National (Rail Division) has said that decisions must be made very quickly on adequate compensation to be paid to the railways for the transport of export grain so that both Canadian National and Canadian Pacific can commence investment, which is expected to total $20 billion by 1990. This investment will allow Canada to keep pace with foreign demand for our grains.

● (2040)

Given that Canada's future ability to reliably meet its export demands depends on this investment, that Canadian industry will benefit from this considerable investment, and that the program seems conditional on government decisions, would the minister tell us when a announcement of a new compensation policy can be anticipated?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the answer is: No, I cannot give a date. I have been around long enough—not all that long, but long enough—

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: Long enough.

Senator Olson: —to know that one should not try to predict when that kind of decision will be made, because it is a very large and, indeed, complicated set of circumstances that have to be taken into account. I can tell the honourable senator, however, that a great deal of work is now under way by the CN to increase its capacity to carry tonnage over its line to the west coast ports; and, indeed, a great deal more is already approved, such as the expansion of the necessary rail facilities to Ridley Island, for example. Some of us in this chamber had the privilege of spending a couple of days with a CN crew who showed us what is under way now in increasing significantly that capability to deliver grain to export position.

Senator Bielish: I have a supplementary question. The CN president has said that something has to be done shortly. It is all right for the minister to mention Ridley Island, increasing the capacity of grain cars, and that sort of thing, but what is being done about this? They can no longer operate on that 3 per cent that they are getting for the transport of this grain.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, when specific projects, or a change in the structure of the compensation, are in their final stages and are ready to be announced, they will be announced at that time. I tried to review briefly some of the action that is now under way to increase that capacity, and I am sure my honourable friend knows that there are other considerations that are under active consideration but have not yet reached the stage where an announcement can be made.

ENERGY

OIL—INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—REDUCTION IN DEMAND—DOMESTIC STOCKS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The International Energy Agency meeting in Paris today announced a decision on behalf of its 21 member-countries to cut demand for non-IEA oil by 10 per cent, to be achieved by relying more heavily on existing stocks.

My question is: Is Canada, having previously lost considerable credibility in the international community by agreeing to, but not adhering to, IEA decisions, now going to consider itself bound by this commitment?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall have to take that question as notice, but I reject its preamble.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In an attempt to reduce demand on OPEC oil in particular, and thereby help to keep prices down, does Canada intend to draw down its existing stocks, and, if so, what supply situation will remain, and how much of that supply, in terms of days, will be in tanks in eastern Canada, as distinct from that in the ground in western Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, obviously that is a technical question involving technical data, which I shall have to refer to the Minister of Energy. However, he did reply to a question, not quite in that context but with respect to supplies in the inventory that is now available, and indicated that there appeared to be adequate supplies for the balance of this winter.

OIL—SECURITY OF FOREIGN SUPPLY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Mexico last week cut in half its oil exports to Canada for December from 50,000 barrels to 25,000 barrels per day. The Mexico decision highlights the fact that while Saudi Arabia and Mexico are relatively more secure than either Iran or Iraq, neither country can guarantee a secure supply of oil to Canada. Accordingly, we have to believe that the rhetoric that has emanated from the Prime Minister's visit to the Middle East concerning negotiations of secure supply from Saudi Arabia is only so much window dressing.

My question is: Will the minister acknowledge that no foreign supply can possibly be as secure as a Canadian supply?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, to answer the first part of the preamble—

An Hon. Senator: A simple yes or no will suffice.

Senator Olson: —although it was not contained in the question, the fact is that Mexico has notified Canada, and indeed other purchasers of its crude oil, that it has invoked the force majeure provisions in its export contracts and the December deliveries will be reduced by 50 per cent.

The reasons, of course, are bad weather and technical problems, which have reduced crude oil production and seriously delayed the loading of tankers in the Gulf of Mexico. However, they have expressed the hope to have the backlog cleared up by the end of December so that deliveries in January can proceed as per the contract. I could give a lot more information on how they intend to make up for this shortfall in December before very long.

The other part of the honourable senator's question is that Canadian supplies are perhaps more secure. I would agree with that. That is why this government has given such a high priority to the development of known reserves in Canada, such as the tar sands and heavy oil, and we are committed to that, including offering to agree to a price of $38 per barrel plus escalation for that oil.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the minister for his answer, and I am pleased to hear him say that steps are being taken to provide a complete and secure supply of Canadian oil. But will the minister admit that the great priority that seems to have been assigned to a supply from so-called secure foreign sources is a misdirection of effort, and will he tell us if the government has any plans to adjust its proposed pricing and tax regimes so that the producing provinces of Canada can receive a price closer to that which we are apparently prepared to pay to foreign suppliers?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is attempting to—

Senator Donahoe: —to get information.

Senator Olson: —mix two time frames which are not compatible. One is, of course, that we are looking in the longer term with respect to increasing the supply from Canadian sources. However, in the meantime, the maximum utilization of Canadian supply is now going into the consumer stream, and therefore there are, so far as we know, no additional supplies that can be put into the stream for the balance of this year, or, indeed, in the time frame related to the curtailment of Mexican oil coming into Canada. It remains a fact, however one wants to argue, that for some time we are going to have to import a portion of our crude oil requirements.

OIL—DEVELOPMENT OF UNCONVENTIONAL SOURCES

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Does the minister believe that the long-term policy that has been adopted with respect to the development of the oil sands, the prices that are being offered for the product of that portion of the oil industry, and the measures in which he takes such great pride, are at present giving signs that they are producing the results which he says they are designed to produce?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there is no doubt in my mind that whatever policy is pursued between now and the end of this season, there will be no significant quantities of tar sands oil coming forward in addition to what is already going through the processing plants that are in place. There will not be a significant amount for several years. It is, however, our view that the pricing structure that has been offered for bringing that oil on stream, and into the consumer distribution system, is attractive to the extent that it ought to go forward. If my honourable friend wants to be honest and frank about this, and he knows that is not what is holding up the projects.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

PURCHASE OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEM DEVELOPED IN ONTARIO—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it arises from the announcement by the Government of British Columbia that it would purchase an urban transit system developed by the Ontario government for greater Vancouver.

The minister will no doubt be aware that one of the major factors in that decision by the Government of British Columbia was the prospect that between $50 million and $100 million would be available from the federal government. The basis of that prospect is the statement, or a number of statements, by the minister himself, in his capacity as B.C.'s representative in the federal cabinet.

In order that we may be more certain of our facts, may I ask the minister to indicate precisely how much federal assistance is being made available, and from what source it is forthcoming.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): First of all, honourable senators may be interested to know that Vancouver has been designated officially as the site of a major world transportation exposition in 1986, to be known as Transpo '86. It is expected that up to 160 nations will participate. On display will be the latest in world technology and Canadian technology in the field of transportation. The prospect of a world's transportation fair, officially designated as such by the world governing body in Paris—and that decision was made a few days ago—presents an unparalleled opportunity for Canada and other nations to put on display their latest transportation technology, including aeronautical, automotive, and rail, including light rapid transit vehicles, and so on.

This government is very enthusiastic about the light rapid transit technology which has been developed in Ontario. This is Canadian technology, developed by Canadian engineers and scientists—a credit to Canada. To this point, I understand that the technology has been available only on an experimental basis in Kingston. Until now, it has lacked credibility because to this time there have been no major world sales of that technology. I can report that the government has entered into conversations with the Province of British Columbia and the City of Vancouver regarding the idea of putting into practical operation for the world to see, and to test, this Canadian technology at the Vancouver Transpo '86, with a possibility of vast industrial development benefits not only for the western provinces but for central Canada and possibly the Atlantic provinces.

If an agreement can be achieved, this could be an extremely important national endeavour. As I have said, the government had been discussing with the Province of British Columbia the possibility of federal participation in putting this technology into operation in connection with Transpo '86. British Columbia has responded by suggesting that the project could go beyond a limited showcase project, that ultimately it could become a $600 million rapid transit system for southern British Columbia. The implications, in terms of jobs for Canadian workers and benefits to the economy are really quite significant. That is why the Conservative Government of Ontario, headed by Premier William Davis, has expressed its support for this project, and why Ontario has offered to provide certain guarantees for the technology.

It looks as though this project has the possibility of being yet another example of what Canada is all about; in other words, a project which would involve co-operation from all parts of Canada for the benefit of all Canadians. Ultimately, there could be the possibility of light rapid transit vehicle assembly plants in several parts of Canada, and industrial benefits of many kinds for all of Canada's regions.

[Senator Murray.]

Honourable senators, while the exact "price tag" of all of this has yet to be determined, the estimated cost of federal involvement in the "showcase" phase or first phase of this development could be in the area of between $30 million and $50 million. Beyond that, honourable senators, is the fact that between now and the year 2000—

Senator Flynn: What about the year 3000?

Senator Perrault: —there could be $20 billion spent by the nations of the world on light rapid transit. This vast market need could be met in significant measure by the new Canadian light rapid transit technology.

Senator Flynn: Just imagine what it will be in 50 years.

Senator Murray: If the minister thinks I have forgotten what the question was, he is mistaken.

Senator Perrault: You asked how much would be spent, and I told you.

Senator Murray: It may well be, as the minister said, that this project is a good example of what Canada is all about. But his answer, I suggest, is a good example of what the minister is all about.

Senator Perrault: If you are against the project, just say so.

Senator Murray: I am very much in favour of the project, and I am delighted to know that the Government of Canada is so enthusiastic, as the minister put it, about the light, rapid, comfortable, transit technology.

The Government of British Columbia is quite enthusiastic about the minister's apparent undertaking to provide between $50 million and $100 million for the project. What I want to know, and what the Government of British Columbia is entitled to know, as well as the members of the Senate and the people of Canada, is, how much money is being committed by the Government of Canada, and from what source is it coming?

To assist the minister, this time, in giving a more precise answer to my question, perhaps I might recall to his mind something that is attributed to him by Southam News Services, as follows:

> "When I contacted mayor-elect Harcourt," said Senator Ray Perrault, a member of the Trudeau cabinet, "I said, you know, we have a $4 billion Western Development Fund. We also have a $550 million energy allocation fund for B.C.".
> "And in view of the fact that rapid transit will be a major energy conserver, I said, it seems to me that under either of these programs there might be some federal involvement."

Senator Perrault: Right.

Senator Murray: What I want to know is whether the minister is going to emphasize the word "might", or if, indeed, there is some commitment on the part of the federal government, under the aegis of British Columbia's representative in the cabinet, to assist in this project, what precisely the commitment is, and from what source it is coming.

Senator Perrault: As usual the government is proceeding responsibly. Tomorrow, in Kingston, Ontario, the mayor of the city of Vancouver, Mayor Harcourt, will take a test ride in this new Ontario developed vehicle.

Senator Flynn: Will you be there?

Senator Perrault: Other officials are going to be present for the demonstration, and I hope to be present for the demonstration as well.

Senator Marshall: You'd better be back for question period!

Senator Perrault: After studying the available data, and after looking at the specifications of the system, we then hope to enter into negotiations with the Province of British Columbia. The final price tag has not yet been determined. It would be irresponsible of me to say definitely that it is going to cost $30 million or $50 million, but the general estimated amount of money is in the area of $30 to $50 million.

Senator Murray: From Ottawa.

Senator Perrault: From Ottawa.

Senator Murray: This does raise a question as to the source of those funds. The minister, in the statement attributed to him by Southam News Services, mentioned the Western Development Fund. This raises a more general question still on this matter, since the Minister of Transport has said that moneys from the Western Development Fund might eventually be used, for example, to replace the Crow rate subsidies. Other ministers have been making other commitments from that same fund. I would therefore like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or, perhaps, the Minister of State for Economic Development, to provide us with a list of all the promises of Western Development Fund money which have been made by the government, and at the same time to indicate when the government will be providing details as to the exact year in which the remaining $2 billion of the fund will be allocated. At the same time, would he also indicate when the government will be providing details as to what year the remaining $2 billion of the fund will be allocated, because, while $4 billion is being talked about, the budget assigned only $2 billion over the next two years and made no provision, as the minister is aware, for the additional $2 billion.

● (2100)

Senator Perrault: A demonstration project of this kind involves industrial development. It involves the possibility of international trade; it relates to scientific development, energy conservation and to western development. If the project proceeds, of course, there will be a great amount of eastern development as well as western development.

In due time it will be announced under what heading the money, if the ultimate decision is to grant the funds, will be made available. However, the immediate task is to make certain the technology is sound. There is every evidence that the technology is first-rate. The Province of British Columbia has made an announcement that it intends to proceed with this major full-scale LRT development in the lower mainland. I would hope that the official opposition would rejoice with us in what could be a very positive achievement for all of Canada.

Senator Murray: I will rejoice when I see the $100 million going to British Columbia for the project.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

THE BUDGET—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development in his capacity as chairman of the Economic Development Committee. At a recent meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, the Minister of Finance was asked by me if there was not a danger that a department such as DREE might find itself strapped for funds because of the relatively small amount in the economic development package, since from that has come this new commitment to the Western Development Fund. The minister seemed to indicate that the Western Development Fund was in addition to the economic development package, at least I believe that is what he said. I listened very carefully and I subsequently checked the transcript but, as honourable senators are no doubt aware, there is sometimes certain ambiguity in the minister's statements.

Would the Minister of State for Economic Development clarify that situation for me? Is the economic development envelope inclusive of that commitment for the Western Development Fund or is a separate amount allocated to that?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The Western Development Fund is not part of the money committed to the Economic Development Fund; it is in addition to it.

Senator Doody: Would the honourable minister indicate what part of the budget document contains that breakdown? Obviously, he does not have to bring that information to us immediately, but he could let me know in the near future. Is it a particular envelope, or is it a separate amount listed somewhere else?

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It deals with the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act which is due to expire in 1981. This is the umbrella arrangement under which the federal government and the provinces work out their shared-cost extended program which finance such things as health care, hospital insurance and post-secondary education. It is a very complex and important part of the financial arrangements of all the provinces and, indeed, of the federal government.

There was an ongoing committee of officials which met regularly to update itself on the situation regarding that arrangement, but I do not think that committee has been meeting regularly for the past year, and perhaps for longer than that.

Does the government intend to put forward a position paper on the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act in terms of the cost-sharing programs, or what arrangements are being made? Is a meeting of technical officials scheduled shortly to discuss this important matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not know whether a meeting is scheduled shortly; however, I will ask the Minister of Finance. I will also refer the other part of the question to him as to whether he will be putting forward a proposal for amending the formula.

Senator Doody: Some of the provincial governments are becoming concerned that as the deadline approaches there might be time pressures involved and the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act might terminate before a new set of arrangements is put in place. That is the reason for the urgency of the question.

Senator Olson: That concern, of course, could be dissipated to some extent if they reach an agreement quickly rather than protracting the matter over several months.

Senator Doody: It took over two years the last time.

Senator Olson: It has two years before it does terminate. I think the honourable senator is asking me when a decision is going to be made, and I am not sure I can predict that or if there would be much accuracy to my answer if I even tried.

INDUSTRY

MANUFACTURING SECTOR—SUGGESTED NEW CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question concerning the consideration that is now being given by the Departments of Finance and Industry, Trade and Commerce to setting up a new state-owned company in the manufacturing sector. This suggestion has been attributed in today's newspaper to a spokesman for the minister's colleague, the Honourable Herb Gray. I should like to know at what stage these considerations are and when we can expect definitive announcements on this matter.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): When such an announcement is ready to be made, it will obviously be made and I will bring it to this chamber. Honourable senators opposite sometimes become a little annoyed when they ask this type of question and I am unable to respond, but really all I am being asked to do is speculate on some rumours that someone has picked up somewhere.

Senator Murray: May I ask the minister whether the government has any intention of setting up a new state-owned company in the manufacturing sector?

Senator Olson: That question will be taken as notice and referred to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

[Senator Doody.]

THE ECONOMY

UNPRODUCTIVE SUBSIDIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Roblin on October 23 concerning unproductive subsidies.

(The answer follows:)

As I have stated before, it is this government's goal to create a favourable investment climate. We are committed to ensuring that funding in the form of assistance to the private sector is invested in such a way that would provide maximum benefits to the Canadian economy.

With this goal in mind, it becomes clear that we do not attempt to delineate separate categories of "unproductive" versus "productive" subsidies. We must try to ensure that when we are faced with the difficult choices of competing applications for assistance, that we be guided by the principle that we allocate our funds in the most productive manner. Our funds are not unlimited and we must make choices. I believe that I referred to this earlier as part of the art of governing.

We cannot, nor should we, attempt to enunciate a rigid set of criteria which would cover every conceivable case. Quite simply, we must evaluate each case carefully on its own merits, in light of the relevant factors.

Given this, it is obvious that the government in making these choices should concern itself with some basic priorities. These I outlined in my recent speech to the Canadian Export Association and I would be pleased to provide additional copies of that speech, should the honourable senator so desire.

ENERGY

HOME HEATING—CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on December 4 by Senator Muir concerning the application of conversion grants under the government's National Energy Program.

(The answer follows:)

The federal government's objective is to encourage conversion to alternative energy sources to reduce our dependence on imported oil. For this reason, the government developed a series of incentives and introduced conversion grants to encourage Canadians to consider the high efficiency equipment already available and the improvements in equipment efficiency that are anticipated over the next year or two.

The program of conversion grants is expected to be in effect for the decade. Negotiations are still taking place with the various provinces but the program should be in full operation by the beginning of the next fiscal year.

I would, however, remind Canadians that if they have started to have work done on converting from oil, that they save their receipts in order that they can benefit when the program is set in place.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

THE BUDGET—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on December 2 by Senator Phillips.

(The answer follows:)

The honourable senator sought information concerning increased funding for the Economic Development Envelope provided in the Budget and specifically the proportion of this which will be allocated to research and development.

I am assuming that the honourable senator is referring to the 22 per cent increase in Fiscal Year 1981-82 indicated by my colleague, the Minister of Finance. The detailed disposition of this increase is under review at this time. I will endeavour to inform the honourable senator as soon as the decisions in question have been made. In the interim, I would refer the honourable senator to the remarks made by my colleague, the Minister of State for Science and Technology, in the other place on October 31, 1980 in which the Minister outlined advances which have already been made in this area.

ENERGY

COME-BY-CHANCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—OIL REFINERY—ACQUISITION BY PETRO-CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on December 2 by Senator Smith concerning the Come-By-Chance oil refinery and the possible purchase by Petro-Canada.

(The answer follows:)

I am unable at this time to give the honourable senator a detailed answer to his question. I am informed that Petro-Canada is presently giving careful study to its option to purchase the Come-By-Chance oil refinery. While this matter is under review and until such time as a final decision has been taken I cannot comment on what future involvement Petro-Canada may or may not have with the Come-By-Chance refinery.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on November 20 by Senator Smith concerning the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact.

I am informed that both Chrysler Canada Ltd. and American Motors (Canada) Ltd. have submitted the figures for production to sales ratio to the Department of National Revenue for the 1980 model year. These figures must be audited. Should either of the companies fail to meet with the agreement, the results are passed to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for analysis and action. Since the audit has not yet been completed I am unable to answer the specific question raised by the honourable senator.

I would add, however, that it is the responsibility of the Minister of National Revenue to notify the companies of their responsibilities in relation to any duties owing if they have failed to meet their obligations. The question of further action rests, should it be necessary, with the Ministers of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Finance and National Revenue. Honourable senators can be assured that any action would be with the benefit of Canada in mind.

PUBLIC WORKS

TERMINATION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES PROGRAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to the question raised on November 20 by Senator Marshall concerning the termination of the Community Services Contribution Program—CSCP.

A number of factors contributed to the decision to terminate the program. First, there was the question of whether it was appropriate for the federal government to continue funding for the provision of services that both traditionally and from a jurisdictional point of view have been the responsibility of the provinces and municipalities. It is not a matter of whether the program was good, but rather who should pay for such a program.

Second, there is the issue of accountability. The government responsible for raising the resources through taxation should be the government responsible for the expenditure of such revenues.

Third, the effectiveness of the program was analyzed from the point of view of job generation and compared with other programs that demonstrate a better return for money spent.

Moreover, as the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has aleady explained, the present climate of physical restraint contributed to this decision. In meeting the objective of providing more effective government, the continuation of existing programs has been studied with a view to providing funds for new programs, or those of a higher priority. The decision to terminate the Community Services Contribution Program now results in more funds being available for addressing higher priorities in the fiscal year 1982-1983.

The task remains to determine precisely the federal housing priorities for the 1980s. It is expected that at the National Housing Conference planned for early 1981, and in discussions with provincial ministers and other interested groups, a number of ideas will be put forward. These will assist in developing federal housing priorities and programs, and lead to the best distribution of funds between them.

With regard to projects approved by the provinces up to December 31, 1980, under the existing CSCP federal-provincial agreements, the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation will ensure that they will have every opportunity to receive the committed funds.

NEWFOUNDLAND

REVITALIZATION OF RAILWAY SYSTEM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Marshall asked this question on November 25, 1980: "Could the Leader of the Government extract from the Minister of Transport what his reaction is to the provincial government's stand? Will consultations be held, and, if so, how soon?"

Honourable senators, the report of the provincial government was delivered to federal officials on Friday, November 21, 1980. The report will require examination before any formal response can be made. Federal officials will react quickly on this matter.

The Minister of Transport advises that he met with Premier Peckford in October, 1980, and established a Federal-Provincial Committee of senior officials to co-ordinate the multimodal planning of the Newfoundland transportation system. The committee had its first meeting in St. John's on November 25, 1980, and preliminary discussions took place with respect to the report and the role of the railway. Further meetings will take place in the near future.

TRANSPORT

ACCESS TO AND FROM REMOTE AREAS—POLICY

Question No. 29 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

What is the present status of the government's transportation policy on access to and from remote areas?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

The government is not contemplating, at present, the development of a comprehensive policy on access to and from remote areas. There are, however, a variety of individual programs in place which answer specific needs. Examples are:

the Northern (Arctic) Air Facilities Program;

Water Transport Assistance Programs;

Western/Northlands highway construction programs; and Atlantic Provinces Transportation Program.

Programs such as these, taken together, constitute the federal government's response to the needs of remote areas for adequate transportation.

NEWFOUNDLAND

OLD AGE SECURITY BENEFITS—STATISTICS

Question No. 31 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. How many Newfoundland citizens are receiving Old Age Security benefits?

2. How many receive (a) the basic rate only, (b) the basic rate plus Guaranteed Income Supplement, and (c) Spouses Allowance?

Reply by the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

1. As of September 30, 1980, there were 46,129 Newfoundland citizens receiving Old Age Security benefits.

2. (a) (b) and (c). There were 8,203 citizens receiving the basic rate only, 34,610 receiving the basic rate plus Guaranteed Income Supplement, and 3,316 receiving the Spouse's Allowance.

PRIVATE BILLS

GENERAL SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—BILL TO AMEND AND REPEAL AN ACT TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne moved the second reading of Bill S-18, to amend and repeal an act to incorporate the General Security Insurance Company of Canada.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, before Senator Lamontagne speaks, I must say that I am a little confused about this bill. The General Security Insurance Company of Canada is governed, apparently, by another company called The Canadian and British Insurance Company. They are going to amalgamate with a caisse populaire company, and I wonder if Senator Lamontagne in his presentation is prepared to tell us what the position of the members of the caisse populaire company will be in the new company which is being incorporated.

I presume that the old company, whose charter is being repealed, is a publicly-owned company with shareholders, and that La Société d'assurance des Caisses Populaires has members who are also shareholders. What is going to be the outcome of this amalgamation? Is Senator Lamontagne prepared to tell us this, and explain it to us in his presentation on second reading?

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I believe it would be appropriate for me to make a statement in moving second reading of this bill. However, I am not certain that I can reply to the technical question which I have just been asked. In any case, I intend to move that, if this bill passes second reading in the Senate, it be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce where I believe all interested parties, including federal officials, will be able to reply to every technical question concerning this bill.

Still I would like to tell Senator Perrault that I am grateful for the peaceful climate he has brought about in this chamber, and of course, I also want to thank—

Senator Flynn: We can say that this is an auspicious beginning!

Senator Lamontagne: I also want to thank honourable senators for the cooperation they have given me as I am replacing Senator Langlois who could not be here this evening.

Senator Flynn: Have you moved second reading?

Senator Lamontagne: I did so earlier.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Honourable Senator Lamontagne, seconded by Senator Denis, has moved that this bill be read for the second time.

Senator Lamontagne: I thought I had done that earlier. I believed that the question had been put.

Senator Flynn: I think that Senator Riley asked his question before you could do so.

Senator Lamontagne: As I was saying, honourable senators, I wish to thank the members of this assembly for their cooperation this evening because the procedure that I am suggesting we follow is rather unusual. However, it is justified because of the urgency of proceeding in this matter.

Let me simply say for the moment that the General Security Insurance Company of Canada should amalgamate with La Société d'assurance des Caisses Populaires as of December 31, 1980. For this to happen, the National Assembly of Quebec must pass legislation before the end of the present session, which is scheduled for December 19. According to the information I have received, an arrangement has been made in the other place for this bill to receive first reading on Thursday afternoon after four o'clock and for the second and third reading stages to occur the next day, Friday, December 12, which would mean that this bill, after being passed by the Senate and the House of Commons, could then be "exported", so to speak, to the National Assembly of Quebec.

To meet that timetable and go through all the stages it entails, the Senate should proceed, this very evening if at all possible, as I shall be away tomorrow, with the second reading of the bill so that it can be referred to our Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for study and passage, I trust, then with third reading on Thursday afternoon. I therefore ask for the co-operation of honourable senators, and for leave to proceed as I have just suggested.

I am at the entire disposal of honourable senators should they want a long explanation, or a shorter one, of this bill. In brief, essentially, the bill before the Senate is required as a result of the proposed amalgamation of a Quebec company which operates under Quebec provincial laws, with another insurance company that is governed by the laws of Canada.

This bill, then, is necessary because no existing federal act allows an insurance company, operating under federal jurisdiction, to amalgamate with another insurance company governed by provincial laws.

So, the purpose of this bill is simply to authorize the insurance company, incorporated under federal law, to amalgamate with a company incorporated under Quebec provincial law.

I could continue indefinitely to try and justify this bill. To my mind, it is most justified because it would allow a better regrouping of two Canadian insurance companies. I am convinced these explanations are rather useless since the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will be getting all the needed technical information when it meets Thursday afternoon.

I therefore move that this bill be passed on second reading.

Senator Leblanc: I feel that it is more a matter of approving a change from the federal to the provincial status of the company concerned, than that of approving the eventual amalgamation with the Caisses populaires.

Senator Lamontagne: Yes.

Senator Leblanc: Considering that the case seems rather urgent, I will ask my questions immediately so that the authorities or those who will appear before the committee will know what questions to expect.

First, are the shareholders of the present company, General Security Insurance Company of Canada incorporated under a federal charter, aware of the transfer of the federal charter for a provincial charter and have they given their approval?

Second, will the protection granted to the policyholders under the federal charter be also transferred to the provincial charter without any alteration? Will the final balance sheet of the federal company be fully integrated in the opening balance sheet of the provincial company? Has the Department of National Revenue approved that transaction as being a valid one not subject to capital profits tax or any other levy?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I am not in a position, of course, to answer those technical questions. I am pleased that you have asked them now so that, as you said, the petitioners will be in a position to answer them.

I am convinced they will have adequate answers when the committee will be sitting. Moreover, I am also authorized to say that the federal Department of Insurance fully endorses that transaction. Mr. Humphreys, the superintendent, or his immediate assistant, will no doubt be available to appear before the committee and vouch for what I have just said.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I appreciate the position of Senator Lamontagne with respect to second reading of Bill S-18, but what he has given us is a general outline of the purpose and intent of the bill. I wonder if he could tell us who the shareholders of the General Security Insurance Company of Canada are?

I am not trying to delay the passage of this bill but, just for the record, I should like to know who the directors and principal shareholders of General Security Insurance Company of Canada are. The bill says that it is governed by another company, but I should like to know who controls that company.

When the Senate is considering a bill such as this, it not only has to consider the implications of the amalgamation, but what effect it will have on the shareholders of the caisses populaires, as Senator Leblanc asked.

I wonder if he could give us any information on this, because not all of us are members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—most of us are not. When a bill such as this is introduced, I think there should be more information given to the Senate as a whole regarding the composition of these companies. We know that the caisses populaires are an incorporated group of members, all of whom own the company without any equity being in the hands of any small group or something like that.

I am wondering about this other company, the General Security Insurance Company of Canada. Is the sponsor able to give us any information on that company? Perhaps he does not have it with him. If that is so, I am willing to accept it, but I think he should have been supplied with this information before he moved second reading of the bill.

I appreciate the fact that Senator Langlois is not present this evening, but before the bill goes to committee, could the sponsor give us more information on the composition of the two companies?

[Translation]

Senator Lamontagne: Unfortunately, Senator Riley, I cannot give more information. However, I think that your questions are in the same vein as those asked by Senator Leblanc. They are of a technical nature. They concern the relationship between the two companies.

I am convinced that the members of the committee to which this bill will be referred will ask precisely the same questions.

Senator Riley knows as well as I do that even though he does not sit on the committee he can go to the sittings and ask whatever questions he wants. Also, I think we have to have confidence in the efficiency and the technical expertise of the committee members who will be asking the petitioners the same questions. The committee will then report to the Senate, which, on third reading, will be in a much better position to appreciate not only the chief purpose of this bill but also its more detailed and technical aspects.

[English]

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, again I pose a question. It is all very well to say—

[Translation]

Senator Lamontagne: Need I remind Senator Riley that on second reading we actually support the bill in principle. The questions he has just asked do not really concern the principle of the bill but its more detailed implications. It is really only on third reading, after consideration by the standing committee, that we will really be able to answer those questions.

• (2130)

[English]

Senator Riley: I would point out to Senator Lamontagne that it is all very well for him to say that the witnesses will be prepared to answer all technical questions in committee. But he forgets the fact that the Senate is being asked this evening to vote this bill into committee, to give this bill second reading and refer it to committee blindly, as far as I am concerned, because we do not know who the directors of General Security Insurance Company of Canada are.

I would also point out to him that on the explanation of a bill, and before we accept it in principle, we usually have more detailed information than he has been able to supply this evening. We are being asked again, or we will be asked again—and I am repeating this—to refer this bill to committee blindly.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I am very sorry to disagree with Senator Riley, because what we are being asked to do tonight is accept the principle of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to enable two companies to come together and form one company. That is all. We are being asked to do that because under our federal legislation no company registered under a federal law can do that. That is all we are asking and the principle of the bill at this moment is only to enable the process to develop.

Then, of course, I completely agree with the honourable senator that there are all kinds of technical questions and implications related to that principle, and the proper place to raise those questions and discuss them and perhaps solve any problems that may arise is in committee. If the committee, through its chairman, cannot resolve those technical questions and deal with their implications before the third reading of the bill, then I think Senator Riley would be perfectly justified in raising his objections at that time.

I submit that at this time we are dealing only with a relatively simple principle, and I believe we should wait until we get the report of the committee to discuss the technical details related to the application of that principle.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I wish to make only one reservation. I am not against this bill's going to committee, but I think it is only fair to point out that when I have sponsored bills on second reading before the Senate—and I have sponsored a number of them—I have always insisted on providing much more information than was supplied to us tonight, and I think it is only fair to honourable senators before they are asked to vote a bill into committee that they have more information than they have been given tonight. I shall agree to this bill's going to committee, but I think that as a matter of practice the sponsor of a bill on second reading should be prepared to give more information to the Senate before asking the Senate to refer that bill to committee.

Senator Lamontagne: I quite agree with Senator Riley, and as I explained briefly at the beginning of my intervention,

Senator Langlois had consented to sponsor this bill and I learned only at about 2 o'clock this afternoon that I would have to sponsor it, and that was shortly before I had to attend a meeting of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. So I am sorry that I cannot answer those technical questions at this time.

Senator Riley: I understand that. I was making an observation.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Lamontagne moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move, seconded by Honourable Senator Frith, that rule 95 be suspended with respect to Bill S-18, to amend and repeal an act to incorporate General Insurance Company of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just to be sure that we all know, and that the record shows it, rule 95 provides that a private bill originating in the Senate cannot be considered by a committee until after one week from the date of its referral. That is why we are asking for the suspension of that rule in the context described by Senator Lamontagne and the exigencies of getting this bill passed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 19, the debate on second reading of Bill S-15, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while Bill S-15 as presented by Senator Godfrey should not require extensive debate, because it is certainly non-contentious, its purposes, to me at least, give some food for thought as to the exemplary objectives of the Royal Canadian Legion and their contribution to Canada, which I will deal with a bit later.

And I say exemplary, honourable senators, because the bill in the main is directed towards allowing sons and daughters of members of the Legion not only to become members, but to qualify as voting members and to hold office. In this manner, the Legion is ensuring that those veterans who remain will be cared for in line with the Legion's objectives, even though the long-dedicated veteran who is the leader at present might not be with us.

I feel it is worthwhile to give some background to the bill itself, even though it was adequately addressed, generally, by Senator Godfrey.

In 1978 a bill to amend the act of incorporation of the Legion was submitted to Parliament which was intended to give the Legion, by by-law, the power to enlarge the basis of its membership and specifically to include sons and daughters, and to clear up the status of a number of special groups previously admitted to membership, known as ordinary, associate or honorary members.

The amendment ran into some opposition in the committee stage in this chamber, and because of the impending dissolution of Parliament, "limiting" amendments were accepted which enabled sons and daughters to be admitted, because as some senators stated, there was no evidence that the Dominion Command Convention had approved the amendment in the form requested. I am sure my colleague, Senator Macdonald will remember that because he was the one who questioned it in committee.

But this is now a fact because at the Edmonton Convention in 1978 the broad form of the amendment requested was approved, and at the recent Penticton Convention last year it was felt appropriate to proceed with another application to Parliament to amend the statute and, as the bill dictates, to allow for wider "conditions of eligibility for membership in the Legion, making it possible for persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion to become members," as referred to in the bill under amendment (a) in clause 1.

In this regard I feel that a few words of elaboration might be appropriate to explain the various classes of Legion membership. The present ordinary membership of the Legion, in broad terms, consists generally of persons who served in Her Majesty's forces—the navy, army and air force—but also includes in addition various categories of those who served in any of the auxilliary forces.

I draw attention also to another category of membership known as associate members. These include members who have not served in a theatre of war but have served, for example, in NATO or NORAD, and members of the Newfoundland Forestry Unit, and, now, the sons and daughters of veterans. But none of those categories has the right to vote.

In 1970 provision was made to allow for inclusion as members other categories of those who support the objectives of the Legion, particularly in smaller communities. Such categories included teachers, policemen, firemen and those willing to assist in the operation of local branches. Again, these associate members have no right to vote; nor can they hold office in any of the 1,700 to 1,800 branches now in existence across the country. They are the honorary members.

Honourable senators, I have just lightly brushed over the entitlement to membership in the Legion, and, if I may, I will address just a few words to the other amendments in the bill. First, I should like to refer to the provision of authority for the making of by-laws regarding the amalgamation of branches and the disposition of their property, which is found under clause 2, which amends subsection 6(1) to provide for amalgamation.

In that regard, honourable senators, it is obvious that as our veteran population decreases by some 21,000 members per year the effects upon smaller branches in a comparative loss of members requires a provision to allow for such an amalgamation. At present there is no authority in the act for the amalgamation of branches, and, in view of events now taking place, it is clear that this authority is necessary and should carry with it the consequential authority to provide, by by-law, for the disposition of the property of the amalgamating branches.

Clause 3 of the bill would repeal section 8 of the act in order to provide the authority for the making of by-laws regarding the election of officers of the Legion, and, in that respect, while the sons and daughters are classified as associate members, the amendment would provide that those sons and daughters might become associate members with the right to vote. That is a matter that can be clarified when the bill is referred to committee.

Clause 4, the only other clause in the bill, provides for increased protection for the marks, insignia, regalia and other emblems and symbols used by the Legion. Under clause 4 section 15 of the act would be repealed, and an appropriate substitution would be inserted with respect to trademarks.

In the proceedings of the Penticton Convention of the Legion it was noted that certain suppliers had made contracts with Legion branches for the supply of Legion badges, insignia and other regalia in contravention of the section in the act which states that "no person except the Legion or a person authorized in writing by the Legion shall manufacture or sell such material." The Trademark Council have advised Dominion Command that if a Legion branch enters into a contract for the supply of such material, its action may be taken as authorization by the Legion within the terms of the act. Since an amendment is required, request is made to the Trademark Council to amend section 15 with the view of preventing unauthorized use of Legion badges and to protect the Legion.

Honourable senators, I realize that debate on Bill S-15 would normally be restricted to the four amendments that I have described briefly, but surely it would be worthwhile to dwell for a few moments on the history of the Canadian Legion, an organization which has contributed so much to our country over the years since its formation in 1925. Unfortunately, that contribution seems to diminish in importance as the years go by. I say it is unfortunate because, in my opinion,

The bill, honourable senators, shows the foresight of the present leaders of the Royal Canadian Legion in trying to ensure that there is a continuity of the objectives that were set forth in 1925. It is hoped that that continuity will be achieved, if not through the veterans themselves, through their sons and daughters and supporters who have inherited from their parents the responsibility of fulfilling the commitment they set for themselves. That commitment as related in paragraph 12 of their many aims and objectives specifies that they will "pass on to their families and descendants the traditions for which they stand."

But an even more fitting quotation, honourable senators, is to be found in the national publication of the Great War Veterans Association, which was the forerunner to the Legion. In 1924 it made this prophecy:

> Until the last veteran goes to his final resting place in the bosom of mother earth, there will be problems arising from war service. But the major work of the GWVA in future will be nation-building.

Those words, which were uttered some 56 years ago, are still true and significant today as our leaders of government strive to change the makeup of our country through constitutional reform. Perhaps those who profess to know what is best for this country's future, honourable senators, should spend some time in reading the declaration of the principles of the GWVA as they were written in 1923. That declaration stated in part:

> The foundation principle upon which our association rests is national service, and we unreservedly commit ourselves to a standard of service for Canada and the British Empire in the work of national development as full, as self-sacrificing and as free from personal motives as that rendered by our forces overseas. We pledge ourselves to the common service of our country, acknowledging no pre-eminence in our association except devotion in building up our national life.

I think we should also put on record some of their fundamental thoughts on the subject of unity, as our soldier leaders back in those years strove to unite veterans into a national body. "In the eager effort for unity, it should not be forgotten," they said, "that the establishment of a united organization is not the end towards which we are striving, but merely the means to an end."

To be effective in organization, the veterans of Canada must have a clear-cut purpose, which may be defined as "service to the nation through three distinct channels." The first of those channels would be to take care of the war disabled, the dependent and the needy. The second would be to keep constantly alive the public memory of the sacrifice of Canadians in the cause of world peace, thus providing a deterrent for future conflicts. And the third would be to promote unity of thought and of effort among the peoples who make up the nation, with the consequent development of a greater national consciousness.

If that great task can be carried on by a committed organization imbued with the same spirit that carried the Canadian forces to victory on the battlefield, future generations will rise up to acclaim the men who magnified their war service by rendering an infinitely greater service in the days of peace.

I quote now some appropriate final words from the history of the Legion which were given in an Armistice Day message:

In the name of those who have passed on, I appeal to you to forget the petty differences that have divided our ranks, to destroy the viper of suspicion and distrust which has raged unchecked among us, to catch anew the vision which carried you to the heights of heroism and self-effacement on the battlefields, to be true to your comrades and yourselves, to regard the memories of this anniversary as a symbol of a new and greater service—to unite.

I should like once again for the benefit of our constitutional experts to refer to the principles of the Legion:

The Legion shall be democratic, nonsectarian, and shall not be affiliated to or connected directly or indirectly with any political party or organization. It shall stand for loyalty, the reigning sovereign, Canada and the Empire, for maintenance of the foundation principles of the British Constitution, for the development of a national and united spirit and for ordered Government of Canada, and while striving for peace, goodwill and friendship among all nations, . . . it shall stand for strong and united comradeship among all those who served in Her Majesty's forces throughout the Empire, so that neither their rights nor their interests shall be forgotten, and so that their welfare and that of the dependants of the disabled and the fallen may be safeguarded.

Honourable senators, those words of principle, of unity, of objectives were not written by constitutional experts, nor by politicians, nor by automated minds. Those words came out of the hearts of Canadian leaders—leaders who witnessed and experienced the death and disablement of their comrades, with whom they faced fear and suffering, with whom they fought against an enemy that threatened the country they were willing to protect, and those of their families who would live on in grief and sorrow.

They established principles and objectives which were for one and all as Canadians. There were no different principles for classes or races, or religions; there were no different principles for French or English, or various ethnic groups. They were principles and objectives for Canadians—Canadians who fought, died and suffered side by side. Death, suffering and sacrifice created a bond that had no interprovincial boundaries, no denominational differences, but were the same for all, whether white, black, or any other colour.

The Canadian Legion, which might respectfully be called a nation within a nation, has succeeded in its goals and objectives for the hundreds and thousands of Canadians it represents. It has presevered through a unity and a strength of common purpose and has, with the help of various other veterans' organizations, been able to influence our government in establishing what is perhaps the best veterans' legislation in the world for the care of the disabled and the burnt-out veteran, the widow and the orphan, to provide for hospital care, for the establishment of housing for veterans, and to maintain the graves of those who fell.

Unfortunately, Bill S-15 restricts mention of the other veterans' organizations, such as the War Amputees, the National Prisoners of War Association, the Hong Kong Veterans' Association, and the many others which dedicate themselves to serving specific groups of veterans and which have done equal service to Canada's veterans.

After over 62 years since World War I, the Royal Canadian Legion, despite its success, remains dedicated to its responsibility to some 750,000 veterans of Canada still remaining, as well as to their dependants.

It is significant to note, honourable senators, that while we hear so much about the failure of Canada, after 53 years, to agree on an amending formula for the Constitution, the members of the Canadian Legion, after almost the same number of years, gather in Dominion convention, with over 2,000 delegates representing every nook and cranny of our nation, each with the same vote, regardless of the size or population, to ensure that Canada fulfils its commitment to that segment of our nation that answered the call to protect peace in our country. And they do so in a spirit of comradeship, sometimes controversial, sometimes in heated debate, but always with a common goal, always to the same end, as dictated in its principles—to stand for loyalty to the reigning sovereign, Canada, and the empire; for the maintenance of the foundation principles of the British Constitution; for the development of a national and united spirit; for ordered government in Canada; for peace, goodwill and friendship, not only among all nations, but within our nation, Canada; to recognize our duty to the weak, the sick, the disabled and the needy; to defend statutory, acquired and legitimate rights, and the responsibility of administering such rights by the federal or other governments of Canada; to foster loyalty among the public and education in the principles, duty and unstinted public service.

Perhaps the Government of Canada, rather than continuing the petty bickering, which is surely dividing our country, should stop and remember why this country is so valuable, and in doing so take a look at the history of the veteran of Canada through the Canadian Legion to get the answer—that segment of Canada which united us, and continues to unite us, through a common sense of devotion, dedication, and duty to our great nation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in moving the adjournment of the debate I point out that I am not sure that a senator on this side will wish to speak before the sponsor of the bill again speaks. I understand that Senator Macdonald does wish to speak on the bill before the close of the debate on the motion for second reading. If it turns out tomorrow that no one on this side wishes to speak, it is my intention to yield to Senator Macdonald.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator

Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, discussions are now taking place between the chief electoral officer and others regarding the subject matter of Bill S-11 and related matters, and I would like to see those discussions proceed and perhaps result in some consensus before intervening in this debate. For that reason, I would ask that this order stand until January 13, 1981.

Order stands.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have discussed this item with Senator McGrand with a view to having it stand until January 13. I have already spoken to Senator Macdonald about this. We could always bring it forward if necessary, but it is being held on the Order Paper in anticipation of some developments that might give rise to further interventions.

That being the case, I think it would be appropriate that it be put over to January 13.

Order stands.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator Lamontagne:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on 26th November, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is Senator Lamontagne's intention to proceed with this inquiry on Thursday of this week. It will be recalled from a previous discussion that it is our hope to have Senator Lamontagne speak to this inquiry on an occasion when the Senate members of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution will be able to be present to hear his speech. With that in mind, we intend to discuss with the whips and house leaders the possibility of having Senator Lamontagne's intervention on this inquiry made before Question Period on Thursday. This will enable those honourable senators who serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution to hear Senator Lamontagne's speech, and still attend that committee's meeting on Thursday.

Inquiry stands.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-SIXTH ANNUAL SESSION, BRUSSELS, BELGIUM—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Inquiry of Senator Bonnell:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-Sixth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held in Brussels, Belgium, from 14th to 23rd November, 1980, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I am indeed grateful to Senator Bonnell for allowing me to speak ahead of him on this topic.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the Moscow Olympic Games, Soviet repressive measures against human rights activists, the U.S. hostages in Iran and the Madrid Review Conference of the Helsinki Final Act were the concerns of the 15 parliamentary delegations in attendance at the Twenty-sixth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Brussels, Belgium, from November 14 to 23 this year.

Canada's delegation of 13 members of the House of Commons and 6 members of the Senate played a prominent role in the deliberations of the Assembly. Our delegation was headed by Mr. Leonard Hopkins, and Mr. Lloyd Francis, the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, also participated. The Senate was represented by the following senators: Lorne Bonnell, Earl Hastings, Henry Hicks, Paul Lafond, Lowell Murray and me. There were two rapporteurs of committees: Mr. Ian Watson of the Scientific and Technical Committee, and myself of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People. The delegation was served by Mr. Stephen Knowles, as Secretary, and Mr. Roger Hill, from the Parliamentary Centre, as adviser.

The Belgians gave full support to the Assembly and proved to be gracious hosts. King Beaudoin I attended the official opening. Mr. J. Michel, President of the Chamber of Representatives, and Senator E. Leemans, President of the Senate, held a reception for all the delegates and their wives. Welcoming addresses at the official opening were delivered by them and also by Mr. Wilfried Martens, the Prime Minister of Belgium.

The Canadian Ambassador to NATO, Mr. John Halstead, and the Canadian Ambassador to Belgium, Mr. d'Iberville Fortier, gave receptions for the Canadian delegation and their wives. A large closing reception was offered by Mr. Jack Brooks of the U.S.A., the Acting President of the North Atlantic Assembly, who, on the final day, was unanimously elected President for the following year.

A great historical event, important to the security of NATO, was witnessed at the Twenty-sixth North Atlantic Assembly Meeting. A Japanese delegation of eight men and women, representing the Diet of Japan, sat as observers throughout the two-day plenary sessions. It received a tremendous ovation when the leader expressed warmest greetings from the democracy of Japan and stated that this far eastern country offered its co-operation in the interests of peace.

Leaders of the Western World realize the importance of Japan, which in a relatively short period of time, has become the world's second economic power, now abreast of the United States in most industrial fields and ahead in some. Far surpassing the U.S.S.R. in all but heavy industries, it is almost equal in economic clout to France and Germany together. If Japan were to be allowed to re-arm massively, Japanese technological excellence could easily be translated into a powerful navy, air fleet and missile force, and thus serve as a deterrent to aggressive policies of the Soviet Union as well as China.

The rapprochement of Japan with the NATO countries was brought about by the Atlantic Council of the United States, which played a key liaison role in establishing contact between the two groups. Accordingly, a North Atlantic delegation composed of four European and American parliamentarians, with a supporting staff, headed by Paul Thynes, President of the NAA, travelled to Tokyo, where between May 14 and 17, 1980, meetings were held with Japanese governmental leaders, leading members of the Diet, officials of the Foreign Ministry and the Defence Agency and Japanese industrial leaders.

The discussions that took place at the Tokyo meetings are recorded in a brochure entitled "Common Concerns," which was made available at the Brussels meeting. It was decided that closer consultation and co-operation between members of the Japanese Diet and the North Atlantic Assembly were possible and desirable. The broad areas of mutual interest and concern included a wide range of political, economic and military developments. A continuing exchange of views and information was welcomed by both groups. Members of the Japanese Diet were invited to send a parliamentary delegation to continue the dialogue at the Brussels meeting in November.

In view of the growing Soviet threat to Japan, evident in the increased military activities of Soviet forces in the Far East, the possibility of an alliance with NATO was discussed. The Japanese Constitution of November 3, 1946, during the American occupation, provided for self-defence forces to be used exclusively for defence purposes, since the Japanese people renounced war and the threat of force as a means of settling international disputes. These constitutional restrictions also have implications for Japan's ability to join alliances and collective security with the United States. Hence any change in Japanese foreign policy will come only with the approval of the U.S.A.

There was also a delegation of observers from Spain, consisting of two senators and five members of the Chamber of Deputies. Spain has applied for membership in NATO and is now going through a process of transition to become a Western type of parliamentary democracy. Spain will very soon become the sixteenth member of the Alliance, thus strengthening the defence of the Western democracies.

Honourable senators, the program of the Twenty-sixth North Atlantic Assembly Meeting consisted of sittings of the following committees: Economic Committee; Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information; Military Committee; Political Committee; and the Scientific and Technical Committee, most of which have subcommittees and working groups. Each of these committees presented resolutions and recommendations to the Standing Committee, which prepared the final drafts, and then presented them to the plenary sessions for final approval. The plenary sessions consisted of debates on the resolutions, recommendations and reports of the committees, the approval of the elections of the officers of the committees, subcommittees and working groups, closing with the election of officers of the Assembly for the ensuing year.

I do not intend to deal with all the resolutions and recommendations of this NAA meeting. For the benefit of senators who may be interested, with leave, I move that these resolutions and recommendations be appended to the Debates of the Senate for today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of document see appendix, p. 1402)

Senator Yuzyk: I received copies of those resolutions and recommendations from Senator Lafond in both official languages, for which I am grateful. Other honourable senators who were delegates at Brussels may wish to refer to them when they participate in the debate.

I should like to report on the work of the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information, in which I have been active for seven years. The general report, presented by Senator Klaas de Vries, of the Netherlands, comprised six parts: first, Future of the Olympic Games after Moscow; second, Human Rights and the Madrid Conference; third, Political Education and the Atlantic Dimension of Youth Education in the Member Countries; fourth, Evolution of Cultural ties between Europe and North America; fifth, the New World Information Order; and sixth, Terrorism.

After a full discussion of all these topics, several resolutions were formulated in committee and later were adopted by the plenary session. One resolution urges member governments taking part in the Madrid Review Conference to demand the freedom of all those who have been persecuted and imprisoned by the Soviet Union and Soviet bloc countries for adhering to the Helsinki Final Act, and a second resolution condemns Soviet jamming and deliberate interference with international broadcasts as a violation of the Helsinki Agreement.

The resolution on terrorism urges member governments to co-ordinate the fight against subversive terrorist groups by using the consultative and co-operative mechanisms of the alliance and to sign and ratify the Convention Against the Taking of Hostages (New York, 1979) as well as to condemn and eradicate anti-semitism in all its forms. There was also a recommendation to return the Olympic games to the country of their origin, Greece, which is fully supported by the Greek government.

This committee studied the project of a youth assembly, which was prepared by the Working Group on the Successor Generation, chaired by Baroness Bacon of the United Kingdom. It aims at establishing a means of disseminating information via the North Atlantic Assembly to the young people of our countries, encouraging them to realize what is at stake for the common future of the western democracies in the fields of defence, arms sales and control, disarmament, and security in general. Since some aspects of the organization, structure and financing of such a Youth Parliament were not complete, the Working Group on the Successor Generation was requested to present the full plans at the next North Atlantic Assembly meeting to be held in Bonn, Germany.

I reported to the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information in my capacity as rapporteur of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, and member of the Working Group on Preparation for the Madrid Review Conference.

Having been assigned by the President of the North Atlantic Assembly to help bring about better co-operation of European members of the alliance and the United States in the preparatory work of the Madrid Review Conference, I travelled with the working group to Washington. There, on June 2 and 3 we met with congressmen and senators of the United States Commission on Security and Co-operation in Europe, and with top officials of the departments of the Secretary of State and Defence. This visit resulted in a better understanding of differences and a general approach to common action at the Madrid Conference.

Subsequently, I was invited to join the Canadian House of Commons Subcommittee on the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe in preparation for the Madrid Conference, chaired by Mr. Charles Caccia of Toronto, in accordance with the authority delegated to it by the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on June 26, 1980. Over the summer, more than 115 briefs and letters were received from the Canadian public, and the subcommittee held 47 hearings at which 71 witnesses appeared. The report, which was tabled in the House of Commons on November 5, emphasizes the importance of maintaining the CSCE process and setting the date for a further review conference. Canada is urged to act positively at Madrid in a mediatory role.

Having been chosen a delegate-observer, I attended the opening week of the conference in Madrid, scheduled to take place November 11. I witnessed dramatic events. Eight weeks of intensive negotiations of the ambassadors of 35 countries appeared to be doomed to complete failure. The Soviet bloc of seven countries insisted on a short conference of four weeks to deal only with detente, disarmament policy and trade relations, and refused the inclusion of human rights on the agenda. The western bloc of 28 states, including Yugoslavia, proposed a conference similar to the previous Belgrade Conference, to last 10 weeks, at which all three baskets were to be reviewed fully, and the final document was to include a statement on human rights. The Soviets employed stalling tactics, and on November 10, just before midnight, got the unanimous approval to stop the clock.

Negotiations continued for 23 hours, the Soviets hoping to win over at least one western country. Then the United States Ambassador, Griffin Bell, declared the proceedings illegal and walked out, stating that the opening must take place, as agreed to at Belgrade. The Soviets yielded. The conference was officially opened at 11.30 that night and was to continue that week with statements from 35 governments, but the U.S.S.R. still refused to adopt an agenda and procedures. At the end of the week, on Friday, Austria and four neutral and non-aligned countries presented a document comprising the agenda and procedures with a slight modification of what had been proposed by the western countries. The Soviet Union continued its war of nerves, but at the last hour reluctantly gave consent. With a four-week recess after Christmas, the conference is scheduled to close on March 5, 1981, with a final document reflecting the three baskets of the Helsinki Accords. The success of the democratic countries was a signal victory, which can be attributed to their unity, purpose and determination.

On November 15, I proceeded from Madrid to Brussels. I reported and presented documents of the opening week of the Madrid Conference to Mr. Philippe Deshormes, the Secretary General of the North Atlantic Assembly, as well as to Mr. J. M. A. H. Luns, Secretary General of NATO and President of the North Atlantic Council. I also reported to Mr. John Halstead, Canadian Ambassador to NATO, to the Canadian delegation and to the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information.

The latter committee expressed its approval of the work of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People. There were constructive discussions of the meeting of the subcommittee with Pope John Paul II and with officials of the Italian government and parliamentarians last March 11 and 12 in Rome. Favourable comments were made about the recent issues of The Bulletin, a quarterly journal, under the auspices of the subcommittee, reporting on the implementation of the humanitarian provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. Its circulation is steadily expanding, reaching governments and parliamentarians of the NATO allies, universities, radio stations, various organizations and interested persons. It was decided that the next meeting of the subcommittee would be held in Madrid in early March at the closing of the Review Conference in order to assess its results and implications. I was re-elected rapporteur of the subcommittee for the fourth and final term.

Honourable senators, when we reflect on the turbulent situation in the world today, as we watch with alarm the machinations of the aggressive, imperialist, totalitarian power of the Russian Soviet Union, we can derive some consolation from knowing that the democratic countries are united in NATO. We are protected by this great defensive bulwark, which is being strengthened by the co-operation of Spain and Japan. Let us continue to contribute our fair share to keep NATO strong and the world safe for freedom, democracy and justice through the implementation of human rights.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe the understanding between Senator Yuzyk and Senator Bonnell was that this inquiry would now be adjourned in Senator Bonnell's name.

Senator Yuzyk: I am willing to adjourn it on behalf of Senator Bonnell, but Senator Bosa can do so because he and Senator Bonnell are close associates.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I will be pleased to do this, since his name sounds almost like mine.

On motion of Senator Bosa, for Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

RESOLUTION ON
THE CO-ORDINATION OF NATIONAL ECONOMIC POLICY AND ENERGY POLICY

The Assembly,

Recognising the present energy situation as being no more than a delicate balance in a continuing crisis;

Concerned about the present conflict in the Gulf region and its implications on the oil supply of member countries of the North Atlantic Alliance;

Considering that the maintenance of energy supplies at reasonable prices is a common concern of all member countries in order to avoid unbearable strains on their economic and social structures;

Realizing that, although the Alliance's own reserves of oil, coal and natural gas are considerable, they are, nevertheless, limited and cannot cover more than a fraction of its energy needs;

Persuaded that a cut-back on energy consumption to a resolved figure and the development of alternative energy sources are needed if the economies of NATO countries are to survive;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to co-ordinate their national energy policies towards a common Alliance approach along the lines of the International Energy Agency (IEA);
2. to encourage the use of coal by rationalizing coal mining, improving safety and reducing environmental hazards, by developing commercial methods for the liquefaction and gasification of coal, and developing transport facilities;
3. to develop further nuclear energy in an appropriate dimension whilst building up secure nuclear waste disposals and minimizing the risks of proliferation;
4. to implement conservation measures and—where such measures are already in operation—to lessen the wide discrepancy in the scope and comprehensiveness of national conservation programmes;
5. to inform their people of this co-ordinated policy of energy, efficiency of energy use, development of new energy sources and energy conservation;
6. to intensify efforts for co-operation with and economic assistance to the economically less favoured countries of the Alliance;
7. to implement the proposals of the Independent Commission on International Development Issues (Brandt Commission) by increasing assistance to the less developed countries and by enforcing practical measures to solve their most urgent problems.

RESOLUTION ON ECONOMIC AID FOR PORTUGAL

The Assembly,

Confirming the mandate of the 25th Annual Session in Ottawa to set up a Working Group on Portugal "which should define concrete conclusions and measures in order to help Portugal in its overall economic and social development";

Aware of Portugal's important position and role in the Alliance.

Mindful of the considerable economic gap between Portugal and most other countries of the Alliance;

Knowing that a well-functioning economic system is a basic requirement for political stability and the maintenance of defence capability;

Thanking the Working Group on Portugal for the work it has performed and the results it has achieved so far;

Retaining the area of continuing the working group, the role of which will be to foster closer relations between each member country of the Alliance and Portugal and to help promote new proposals for economic aid and investments;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to intensify all efforts for co-operation with and economic aid to Portugal;
2. to elaborate in co-operation with the Portuguese government concrete aid programmes orientated towards Portugal's most urgent requirements;
3. to encourage private industry to intensify relationships with Portugal;
4. to set up bilateral commissions for the planning and realisation of concrete projects.

RECOMMENDATION ON THE OLYMPIC GAMES

The Assembly,

1. Recalling the proposals made by the Government of the Republic of Greece in 1976 and 1980 commending the idea of the return of the Olympic Games to their country of origin;

2. Taking into account the resolution in sport adopted by the Conference of European Ministers responsible for Sport in London in 1978;

3. Considering the necessity of having the Olympic Games organized on a permanent basis;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council do everything in its power, in consultation with the International Olympic Committee, so that urgent consideration be given to the Olympic Games returning to their country of origin.

RESOLUTION ON DELIBERATE INTERFERENCE WITH INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTS

The Assembly,

Recalling that the participating governments at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe made it their aim "to facilitate the freer and wider dissemination of information of all kinds," and that the Final Act of that Conference specifically noted "the extension in the dissemination of information broadcast by radio" and expressed "the hope for the continuation of this process, so as to meet the interests of mutual understanding among peoples";

Recalling the protests made by this Assembly and at the Belgrade Review Conference on CSCE implementation against the continued jamming of Radio Free Europe—Radio Liberty and Deutsche Well broadcasts to the Soviet Union and various East European countries; and

Deploring the resumption on 20 August 1980 by the Soviet Union of jamming of certain broadcasts of the Voice of America, the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), and Deutsche Welle,

Reaffirms its belief that such jamming continues to violate the spirit and the letter of the Helsinki Final Act and should be terminated, and URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance now taking part in the Madrid CSCE Review Conference to make a forceful protest against all such jamming and to insist that it must be terminated if the aims of the Helsinki Final Act are to be met.

RESOLUTION ON TERRORISM

The Assembly,

Noting with concern the increase in acts of international terrorism in the member countries;

Noting the challenge to democratic institutions and to both national and international stability which is presented by such crimes;

Aware of the particular threat to international co-operation posed by increasingly frequent attacks upon diplomatic personnel and premises within and outside Alliance countries;

Deeply disturbed by the resurgence of anti-semitic ideology and by the anti-semitic acts committed by terrorist organizations against synagogues, cultural centres and, even worse, against human beings, including children;

Considering that every nation must take effective steps to combat the threat to the fundamental rights of its citizens posed by "regional" as well as international terrorism;

Recognising that such steps must be taken in a manner which of itself respects western common values, rights, freedoms and duties of the citizens of the Alliance countries;

Noting the importance and impact of agreements already signed by member governments, with particular attention to measures against air piracy;

Reaffirming the Alliance's commitment to close co-operation to combat the scourge of terrorism;

URGES member governments and parliaments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. To use the consultative and co-operative mechanisms of the Alliance to their full extent to facilitate among member governments the exchange of information on terrorist related groups to enhance co-operation in legislative and judicial matters, and to co-ordinate the fight against terrorist crimes which he recently affected European countries as well as some American States.
2. To seek further co-operative means by which joint steps may be taken against subversive groups which may be behind acts of terrorism or provide financial, material, or training support to terrorists.
3. To become parties to the Convention Against the Taking of Hostages (New York, 1979) and to encourage other nations to sign and ratify this important convention in order that it enter into force at the earliest possible date.
4. To consider joint measures which might be proposed in the Council of Europe or by NATO to enhance Transatlantic reflection and co-operation to combat terrorism.
5. To condemn anti-semitism in all its forms, promulgating where necessary laws enabling this form of intolerance and incitement to hatred to be eradicated.

RECOMMENDATION ON CHEMICAL WARFARE (CW)

The Assembly,

Noting the recent action by the United States Congress in authorising $3.5 million for the commencement of a facility to produce new binary chemical weapons;

Noting that to date there has been no formal consultation among the NATO Allies concerning the development and deployment of new offensive chemical warfare weapons within the Alliance;

Recognising the existence of the Geneva protocol in which the United States and the Soviet Union have agreed not to be the first to use chemical weapons, and the on-going bilateral negotiations to prohibit the development, production and stockpiling of any lethal chemical weapons;

Recognising the thorough preparation of Soviet armed forces in defensive and protective chemical warfare measures;

Stressing the substantial political and military constraints that would inhibit the use of chemical warfare weapons;

Concerned at the prospect of an escalation in offensive chemical warfare weapons;

Convinced that proposals to deploy new offensive chemical weapons in Europe would provoke a strong public reaction among European public opinion; to consult urgently on the role of offensive chemical warfare weapons in NATO strategy.

URGES the North Atlantic Council:

RESOLUTION ON RELATIONS BETWEEN THE PARTNERS OF THE ALLIANCE, THE REINFORCEMENT OF WESTERN DEFENCE AND THE CONTINUATION OF ARMS CONTROL POLICY

The Assembly,

Recognising the fact that peace and liberty for the partners of the North Atlantic Alliance have been secured by this defence alliance for more than 30 years;

INVITES the governments of the Member States:

1. to engage in intensive discussions and consultations on the world-wide threat against NATO States by the Soviet policy, their continued rearmament and expansion in the Third World, in order to arrive at a common response safeguarding peace and liberty in the world;
2. to strengthen the Alliance by implementing the LTDP which was agreed upon in 1978 in Washington and make available the funds necessary in this respect (3% annual increase of defence spending in real terms till 1985);
3. To energetically pursue implementation of the NATO decision of December 1979 on TNF and to continue efforts for the limitation of nuclear and conventional arms through SALT and MBFR, and other negotiations.

RESOLUTION ON THE SITUATION IN THE GULF

The Assembly,

Deploring the loss of life and the suffering on both sides in the war between Iran and Iraq;

Deeply concerned about the war, about its effects on the economies, stability, and well-being of both countries, and about the possibility that the war might spread;

Aware that the impact of that war and of other regional instabilities has already been profound in terms of the economic effects on oil-producing and oil-consuming countries;

Believing that in the interest of the stability of the region and the maintenance of non-alignment for countries which have independently chosen this political course conditions have to be created which will allow a ceasing of hostilities and a settlement of the conflict as soon as possible;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to express, with due respect for NATO's boundaries, the common interest of all members of the Alliance in the stability of the Gulf region;
2. to agree on a military programme and political strategy within the NATO area which will help to create the necessary flexibility for some member countries to deal effectively with conflicts in other areas where the treaty cannot be applied;
3. to create from among the Allied powers a more effective system of crisis management with a view to their accepting special tasks in different conflict areas.

RESOLUTION ON ARMS CONTROL

The Assembly,

Noting the strong support of the SALT II Treaty by European governments and parliaments as demonstrated by the repeated declarations of Western leaders and officials;

Emphasising that this support derives not from a perception of American weakness, but from a genuine belief that a further SALT agreement may significantly strengthen the framework for the management of American-Soviet strategic relations and may constitute an important step toward the goal of achieving more strategic stability by substantial reductions and constraints in the nuclear arsenals of both sides through the future SALT III negotiations;

Emphasising that in Europe public opinion continues to place a high premium on arms control as a crucial instrument for ensuring Alliance security and stability;

Concerned about the destabilising effects of any attempt to gain nuclear superiority; and convinced that peace and security for all depend upon the maintenance of the strategic nuclear balance;

Recognising the importance for Western security and for stability in Europe of the December 1979 decision of Allied governments —to modernize NATO's long-range theatre nuclear forces —to achieve at the same time a more stable nuclear balance at lower levels of weapons on both sides through arms control negotiations and —to examine NATO's TNF requirements in the light of concrete results reached through negotiations;

Convinced that any limitations on US and Soviet long-range theatre nuclear systems must be negotiated bilaterally: that progress in these negotiations will depend on progress in the SALT process and that Allied consultation and support for the US negotiating effort is crucial;

Welcoming the preliminary discussions between the United States and the Soviet Union concerning the commencement of negotiations on long-range theatre nuclear forces; to express their support of the SALT process and its importance as a stabilizing element in East-West relations; to maintain the fullest consultation and co-operation with the United States in pursuing the commencement of negotiations on LRTNF and to work for a successful outcome of the Geneva exchanges.

URGES member countries of the North Atlantic Alliance:

RESOLUTION ON CSCE AND EAST-WEST RELATIONS

The Assembly,

Welcoming the consensus at the Madrid CSCE-Follow-up meeting on an agenda for this important East-West dialogue;

Affirming that the CSCE process should be continued on a stable basis and with new incentives for East-West co-operation;

Emphasizing the need for a sober evaluation of the progress in all participating states in applying the principles and objectives of the Final Act of Helsinki as well as the necessity for a further development of these principles and objectives in concrete terms;

Reiterating that the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan is incompatible with the obligations of the Final Act and the basic principles of international law and that normal East-West co-operation cannot be achieved without the withdrawal of the Soviet troops from Afghanistan;

Reaffirming the respect of basic human rights as a vital element of East-West relations

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to co-operate closely during the Madrid Follow-up meeting with a view to advancing human rights in the CSCE context;
2. to support the project of a European Conference on security and disarmament and help to work out a clear mandate for holding such a conference in the CSCE framework as part of a balanced outcome of the Madrid meeting;
3. to consider and prepare for other conference projects in the CSCE framework, especially in the field of energy;
4. to consult and exchange information on economic co-operation with the East;
5. to demand the liberty of all those who suffer persecution because of their fight for the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act.

RESOLUTION ON THE CRISIS IN TURKEY

The Assembly,

Concerned about the crisis in Turkey, the military intervention, the suspension of the parliamentary democratic system and the ending until further notice of the activities of political parties;

Taking into account the expressed public commitments by the military leadership and the government to restore democracy at the earliest opportunity;

Taking into account the preamble of the North Atlantic Treaty, which commits the signatories "to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilisation of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law";

Recognising that rapid progress towards the restoration of democracy and the solution of the economic and social crisis is a matter of grave concern for Turkey's citizens and the members of the Alliance;

URGES the member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

to express the strong interest they have in a rapid return to democratic institutions in Turkey and in Turkey's successful resolution of its crises;

URGES the National Security Council of Turkey and the government:

to implement rapidly their pledge to restore democracy by taking positive steps toward this goal.

RESOLUTION ON AFGHANISTAN

The Assembly,

Reaffirming its assessment of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan as an unwarranted and unacceptable violation of Afghanistan's sovereignty, territorial integrity, and non-alignment;

Considering the nearly year-long Soviet occupation and attempt at forcible subjugation of the Afghan people to be a gross breach of the right of all Afghans to self-determination;

Alarmed at the invasion's corrosive effects on regional stability and on the security of individual nations in the immediate region, notably that of Iran and Pakistan;

Concerned that the Soviet Union has pursued its course of aggressive action without taking into account the damage done to détente and to East-West relations generally;

Deploring the invasion and continued occupation of Afghanistan as a damaging violation of the letter and the spirit of the CSCE Final Act;

URGES member governments and parliaments of the North Atlantic Alliance;

1. To continue to express to the Soviet Union, by public and private channels of communication, their condemnation of the Soviet invasion and occupation of Afghanistan;
2. To persevere in their concerted response to this continued aggression;
3. To remain steadfast in their commitment to work for a political settlement that includes the prompt and total withdrawal of the Soviet forces and a guarantee of Afghan self-determination and territorial integrity;
4. To continue to give sympathetic attention to the positions of the neutral and non-aligned countries on Afghanistan;

CALLS on the Soviet Union:

to resolve this problem in accordance with the United Nations General Assembly resolution of 14 January 1980, by " . . . the immediate, unconditional and total withdrawal of foreign troops from Afghanistan in order to enable its people to determine their own form of government and choose their economic, political and social systems free from outside intervention, subversion, coercion or constraint of any kind."

RESOLUTION ON AMERICAN HOSTAGES IN IRAN

The Assembly,

Noting with grave concern the growing number of violent and criminal acts directed against the premises and personnel of diplomatic missions, particularly the taking of hostages;

Noting with profound regret that 52 Americans have recently completed a full year as hostages in Iran;

Considering that the maintenance of relations among states presupposes respect for the inviolability of the personnel and premises of diplomatic missions;

Affirming its commitment to the principles of international law set out in the Vienna Conventions of 1961 and 1963 on diplomatic and consular relations;

Alarmed at the implications for international peace and security and for orderly diplomatic intercourse of the continued detention of the American hostages in Iran in flagrant violation of those principles;

URGES member governments of the Alliance:

1. To condemn in the strongest terms the continued detention of the American hostages in Iran in violation of the most fundamental rules of international law;
2. To denounce the continuted and flagrant disregard by Iran of these established rules of international law, of resolutions of the United Nations Security Council which require the immediate release of the American hostages, and the judgement of the International Court of Justice on this question;
3. To co-operate to the fullest extent to obtain the earliest possible release of the American hostages.

ORDER ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS IN EUROPE

The Assembly instructs its President to devise a mode of co-operation between the Political Committee and the Military Committee for joint study of the problems of nuclear weapons in Europe and the future of arms control negotiations between East and West in this field.

RECOMMENDATION ON SUPPORT FOR THE NATO
"SCIENCE FOR STABILITY" PROGRAMME

The Assembly,

Recalling their recommendation 68 passed at the 24th Annual Session in Lisbon in November 1978 which called on the NATO Science Committee to assist the scientifically and technologically less developed countries of the Alliance;

Appreciating the urgent efforts made since then by the NATO Science Committee in preparing such a programme of assistance;

Noting the endorsement by the NATO Council meeting in Ankara in June 1980 of the establishment of a special five-year programme, "Science for Stability", to strengthen the scientific and technological capabilities of Greece, Portugal and Turkey by means of cooperation with scientific institutions in other countries of the Alliance;

Expressing satisfaction that projects in the programme have entered the planning stage;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council ensure that adequate support and funds are earmarked for this urgent programme which will assist in the essential economic development of these three countries.

RECOMMENDATION ON STRENGTHENING APPLIED SCIENCES AND ENGINEERING IN THE NATO SCIENCE PROGRAMME

The Assembly,

Acknowledging the major contribution of the NATO Science Programme, over the past 22 years, to interactions between scientists and engineers from all nations but most particularly from Alliance member countries;

Recognising the uniqueness of NATO's international Science Programme which, on a limited budget, has, from the outset, promoted the development of crucial scientific and technological capabilities of significant long-term importance;

Convinced of the current need to be more innovative by developing activities to strengthen, in particular, engineering and applied sciences;

Disturbed by budgetary aspects of the NATO Science Programme which has operated on a decreasing level of financial support, in real terms, over the past 10 years;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. give urgent attention to restoring NATO science expenditure in real terms so as to adequately support the invaluable efforts of the NATO Science Committee;
2. encourage the NATO Science Committee to be more innovative in their Programme so as (a) to significantly expand their activities in applied sciences and engineering and (b) to further enlarge interactions in future projects between industry, governments, universities and research and development institutions.

RESOLUTION ON THE NEED FOR COOPERATION BETWEEN ALLIANCE
COUNTRIES IN ENERGY CONSERVATION

The Assembly,

Stressing the fact that world energy resources are limited in supply and that the price of the primary energy is increasing rapidly;

Aware of the effects continual energy price rises are having not only on the economies of Alliance countries but more particularly on those of the less developed countries;

Concerned that according to the World Bank the aggregate current account deficit of oil importing developing countries has increased from $7,000 million in 1973 to over $70,000 million in 1980 and that their total outstanding debts have increased six times during the past decade to reach $376,000 million;

Underlining the fact that these deficits are largely the result of oil price rises from $1.30 per barrel in 1970 to $32 per barrel in 1980;

Emphasising that energy conservation measures, which could reduce world energy consumption by as much as 30 per cent by the end of the century, are an effective way of reducing energy demand and stretching the world's scarce fuel resources;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to intensify their national efforts to conserve energy;
2. to cooperate with Alliance countries in exchanging information conserning projects and technologies which effect real energy savings in the industrial, transportation and residential/commercial sectors.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 10, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE FREDERICK W. ROWE

CONGRATULATIONS ON PUBLICATION OF "A HISTORY OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR"

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, may I bring to the attention of this chamber the fact that we have been signally honoured, as was Newfoundland, that great province, by the achievement of one of our fellow senators, the Honourable Frederick W. Rowe, who has just had his fifth and by far his best book published by that well-known publishing firm, McGraw-Hill Ryerson Limited of Toronto. This is a fascinating book entitled: A History of Newfoundland and Labrador. It is the first full-scale book on this subject in this century. I read the book for at least four hours last night, and I was fascinated by it.

Three chapters of Senator Rowe's beautifully bound history have been devoted to the period from 1850 to Confederation with Canada, and in particular to the relations between Newfoundland and Ottawa since 1949. This is particularly appropriate at this time, because the history of federal-provincial relations has almost reached fever pitch. The people of Newfoundland and all readers will be delighted with these chapters.

Senator Rowe held eight portfolios—just think of that, eight portfolios—in the Newfoundland government over a period of 22 years. Imagine anyone spending all that time with Joey Smallwood. He has spent nine years in this honourable chamber. He is in a better position than anyone living to write authoritatively on Newfoundland, which has such a splendid history and which distinguished itself magnificently in the two World Wars. Senator Rowe can speak with greater authority than anyone else on federal-provincial matters as they affect his native province.

In conclusion, might I say that Senator Rowe has added his name as one of the most distinguished senators in this chamber, and I predict that long after we are all gone he will be remembered for his exceptional achievement—A History of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I would like to concur with the eloquent remarks of Senator Walker in saying that Senator Rowe has brought distinction to the Senate with the publication of his fifth book. I think it is a synthesis of all the work he has done in the past which, reaching back over thirty years, goes to learned, erudite articles in the encyclopedias, and so on. It is an important work because that rugged Island has a magnificent history of proud independent people who sailed across the seas and settled in the outports and faced the harsh realities of life there with determination and a sense of independence.

It is an exciting book, a saga of a great people, and in reading it I think not only Canadians will appreciate more deeply the value of the contribution of Newfoundlanders but also the Newfoundlanders themselves. As Senator Walker said, this is the first definitive work on the history of Newfoundland and Labrador since, I think, 1875.

Senator Rowe, as Senator Walker said, is in a unique position; he has been at the vortex of the educational system and the legislative system in Newfoundland. His roots are deep, deep in both the soil and the sea of that proud Island. They go back to the early 1600s, and before that in the motherland. I happen to have had the privilege of living in Devon where we had a home in Teignmouth, where the Rowes were a distinguished family. You can reach back a lot longer than that. There was an Owen Rowe who ended his life imprisoned in the Tower of London, but perhaps I should not mention this because he might not have been related to our distinguished Senator Rowe. But I can also refer to Nicholas Rowe, who wrote the first biography of Shakespeare and was a poet laureate of England.

• (1410)

Senator Rowe is imbued not only with scholastic excellence but with a unique background in the educational and legislative fields. I congratulate him and, with Senator Walker, commend his book not only because it will make a significant contribution to the understanding of Canadians and is a work the Islanders can be proud of, but also because it makes a major contribution to Canadian history.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I am sure I need not say that I am more than pleased and honoured by the kind remarks that have been made by Senator Walker and Senator Thompson.

Senator Walker and I learned to work together a good many years ago, when he was a distinguished member of the Diefenbaker cabinet and I was in a more humble position in Newfoundland. At that time, in his exalted portfolio he was a good friend of Newfoundlanders. He was always interested in our needs and was sympathetic to those needs. The kind and generous comments he has made here today are, I think, a further indication of his interest in our province.

As for Senator Thompson, he and I have been friends ever since the first few days I came here. I know his interest in cultural matters and I am more than pleased that he has seen fit, too, to say a few words in connection with my recent work, a work which I wrote not only for Newfoundlanders but for all Canadians, in the hope that it would do something to acquaint Canadians more fully with the unique culture and background history, economic, religious, educational and cultural, of what is at one and the same time the newest part and the oldest part of Canada. Thank you very much.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

NORTHERN PIPELINE

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, presented the following report:

Wednesday, December 10, 1980

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline presents its second report as follows:

Your committee recommends that it be authorized to examine and report upon all aspects of the transmission and distribution of natural gas in Quebec and the Maritime provinces.

Respectfully submitted,

Earl A. Hastings,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hastings: I move that the report be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a purely technical question to the chairman of the committee. Can he give us any information on when the printed proceedings of the committee for the last two or three meetings will be available? I realize the difficulties that are involved and I am not being critical. I would just like to know if the chairman can give us any help in that respect.

● (1415)

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, the last two issues will be in the mail this afternoon or tomorrow morning.

Motion agreed to.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, December 9, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill S-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, October 7, 1980, examined the said bill and reports the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 9, clause 4.2: Add, immediately after line 22, the following:

"(3) For the purposes of this section, information relating to transactions involving transfers of technology shall be deemed not to include any scientific or technical description of any product or process."

2. Page 16: Add, immediately after line 10, the following:

"14. This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation."

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. Barrow
Deputy Chairman

He said: Honourable senators, the second amendment is self-explanatory. In connection with the first amendment, there were objections raised by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Chemical Producers Association to the particular section that this amends, and, after consultation with the minister and those three bodies, this particular amendment was agreed upon, and it was satisfactory to your committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this bill was before us on another occasion and has been studied by the committee. Senator Stanbury was the sponsor of the bill, and I see that he is in the chamber, although I had been led to understand that he would not be there this afternoon. I hoped to have had third reading of the bill either later today or tomorrow, since it has already received careful examination here. Members will recall that it relieves a large number of corporations of the need to report, and so its speedy adoption would be welcomed by a large number of Canadians. I therefore suggest that the report be taken into consideration either later today or at the next sitting.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to suggest that we do not proceed with consideration of the report today, because the report obviously indicates some amendments to the original bill that we had. Those of us who are not members of the committee, or who are members but who were unable to be present at the committee meeting, would like to have a look at the amendments before we proceed with them further. Therefore I suggest that we proceed in the normal course.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I suggest that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration tomorrow, and then third reading can be given.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

PATRIATION—GOVERNMENT REACTION TO RESULT OF GALLUP POLL

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. The Prime Minister has always taken the support of the people as his main argument to act unilaterally with his proposed Address to Westminster in order to bring about basic changes in the Canadian Constitution, saying that he need not be concerned with intellectuals or provincial opposition. Therefore, in view of the Gallup poll published yesterday or today indicating that he no longer commands public support, I wondered whether the Prime Minister is going to change his attitude and follow a more conciliatory approach by cutting his proposal down to something which is essential and which is likely to be endorsed by both the people and the provinces?

● (1420)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in reply may I quote from two distinguished Canadians? The first is the present Leader of the Conservative Party who said, "The only polls that really count are the polls on election day," and, of course, he discovered the essential validity of that theory.

The second is a quotation from the former Leader of the Conservative Party, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, sadly deceased, who said, "Polls are primarily of interest and value to the canine species."

Senator Flynn: Surely you are not suggesting that this is the case with the poll on the Prime Minister's resolution?

Senator Perrault: I suggest there is limited value and significance in polls. A great deal depends on the wording of the questions to be surveyed—

Senator Flynn: You should not mention the Prime Minister and dogs in the same breath.

Senator Perrault: —and the method of assessing public opinion. Polls are of interest, but not of lasting and permanent significance.

Senator Flynn: In any event, my question was not for the purpose of eliciting those amusing quotations by the Leader of the Government, who is always irrelevant in his answers. I was asking if the Prime Minister, since he was using the support of the people as his main argument, now that he does not have that support, is going to change his attitude and cease to provoke confrontation?

Senator Perrault: I hope the Honourable Leader of the Opposition is not suggesting that the government's activities, actions and policies should be dictated on the basis of the latest poll. That policy would constitute a complete abdication of leadership, a complete absence of the kind of national government that this country wants and has right now.

Let me suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that Canadians overwhelmingly say that they want entrenched human rights—the right of free speech, the right to vote on election day, the freedom of the press, and all of the other basic freedoms. The so-called unilateral action is necessary because of 53 years of utter deadlock and frustration.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government does not seem impressed that according to that poll, 58 per cent are opposed to the unilateral action of the government. If you say that a government should not act in accordance with the general will of the people, or on the basis of Gallup polls, I fail to see why the Prime Minister was using the argument of popular support to defend his unilateral action.

Senator Perrault: Well, perhaps the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: Perhaps, yes.

Senator Perrault: —can let us know whether the brief and unhappy life of the previous government was dictated solely by polls. If polls inspired most of their actions, obviously the wrong method was chosen.

Senator Flynn: If you don't want to answer, why don't you occasionally just say so. Especially would that be well advised when you have nothing to say but that which is irrelevant.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I recognize the abhorrence and apprehensions of the Leader of the Government with regard to the use of polls. Do those feelings extend to the use of referenda?

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. It seems that the provinces are about to call on the federal government to meet with them before the debate on the constitutional document comes to an end. For the sake of strengthening Canadian unity on the patriation issue, would the federal government agree to meet with them within the next month or in February to work out with them a patriation formula which hopefully would meet with the approval of all parties concerned? Would the federal government take a conciliatory stand if such a request were made by the provinces, as they intend to do?

• (1425)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, no person cherishes more the idea of federal-provincial meetings to work out agreements than does the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. He has initiated many First Ministers' Conferences and other ministers' conferences since he first assumed his responsibilities in 1968.

The government certainly welcomes initiatives on the part of the provinces. Some premiers have suggested that there be a cooling-off period, and there may be value in further meetings. The government does not reject that idea, but it does, I think with justification, ask what new initiatives may be expected and what are the areas of progress where it may be possible to achieve agreement where we have been unable to achieve agreement in the past. The concept of further consultation is certainly not ruled out. However, I suggest that more information is required from the provinces with respect to proposed agenda items and the areas where progress could be expected.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: If I understand the answer just given by the government leader, the government would be prepared to hear out the provinces or meet with them. That is incongruent with the answer given by the Prime Minister last Friday at his press conference, because when reporters asked him whether he would meet with the provinces to discuss the constitutional proposal before sending it to Westminster, he said no. Has the government changed attitude since the provinces are asking for another meeting to come to some agreement on the amending formula?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice. The question will be referred to the Office of the Prime Minister. However, may I say I had a very productive and long meeting with Premier Bennett last Friday in Victoria.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: We discussed at length a number of initiatives relating to the Constitution, the energy situation, and other matters. We would all prefer to have federal-provincial agreement and I believe that it would be far more desirable to have Canada go to London as a united nation rather than as a nation fraught with disagreement.

Senator Flynn: Very good.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to follow up that interesting expression of opinion by the Leader of the Government and respond to his question as to what on earth the provinces and the federal government could meet about. It would be very useful if he would recommend to his leader that he meet with the provinces to deal with the single topic of the amending formula because, as my honourable friend knows, last August and September there was agreement among 10 provinces on the general substance with respect to the Vancouver formula. This was so reported in the leaked document that was for ministers' eyes only—that is one good source of information on that point. Three premiers have appeared before us and we have received information from others indicating that that formula might very well be the basis for an agreement with respect to how we should amend our Constitution.

The advantages of going to London with an agreement on patriation and an amending formula need only be suggested to be obvious to all members of this house. If I may repeat a suggestion I made when we debated this topic some time ago, in the interests of harmony I would urge my honourable friend to persuade the Prime Minister not to reject out of hand, as he appears to have done, the possibility of meeting before any further proceedings take place on this one topic of the amending formula. I believe such a meeting would be productive, and it would deliver this country—

Senator Marshall: Save the nation!

Senator Roblin: —from the agony of the disagreement in which we find ourselves today. My honourable friend suggested that a cooling-off period might be considered by the federal government.

Senator Perrault: Premier Bennettt suggested that.

Senator Roblin: I take it my honourable friend approves of the suggestion. If he does, I think he should transmit the suggestion to the Prime Minister, because if there is anything this country needs today in its constitutional situation it is a cooling-off period. We need to be cooled off until we have time to reflect on some of these matters—if I may express a personal opinion—and to hear the opinion of the courts. If there is any possiblity of calling the premiers together to discuss the amending formula, that could certainly lead to a cooling-off period, which would be good for this country. I recommend that course of action to my friend.

• (1430)

Senator Perrault: Of course the views of honourable senators will be brought to the attention of the Right Honourable Prime Minister. I did mention the phrase "cooling-off period." It was suggested by Premier Bennettt a few weeks ago. Yet if one examines the oratory of recent weeks, it does not appear, I think, to any fair-minded observer that "cooling off" is required on the part of the federal government. Most of the public attacks have been made by certain provincial premiers—

Senator Donahoe: They are pretty cold about it.

Senator Perrault: —and other spokesmen who in some cases have employed very extreme language. As far as the Constitution dialogue is concerned, I think there is great value in avoiding and abandoning all excessive language, whatever the source, and attempting to achieve essential agreement and accord.

Senator Balfour: Paranoia.

Senator Perrault: But those who hold out great hope for a resumption of meetings involving federal and provincial ministers and governments must certainly be sobered by the statement made by that distinguished Conservative, Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick. The other day in Ottawa he said, in effect, "In my view a resumption of these meetings would lead only to a further delay." Those are not heartening words for anyone concerned about the future possibilities of the consultative process, and this is why I repeat what I said earlier: The government would like to have further details from the premiers who wish to resume talks to determine from them exactly those areas and ways in which they believe that progress can be made and agreement achieved.

We talk about the amending formula. Of concern to the national government is this fact: In June of 1971 all of the provincial governments, without exception, agreed to the Victoria formula. While Quebec changed its view a few days after the meeting had concluded, nevertheless, at one point all of the premiers supported the Victoria formula in 1971. Today that formula is being pilloried by a number of provincial spokesmen who allege that it is a device developed by the national government in order to subjugate provincial interest.

I think federal representatives have a right to ask the Canadian people what happened in that intervening nine years. In 1971 a formula that was totally satisfactory to all of the provinces is inexplicably alleged to be, in 1980, an "evil instrument" of the federal government. Yet this national government does not insist that the Victoria formula be imposed in some fashion. It has talked in terms of a modified Victoria formula. It has talked about the possibility of developing over a two-year period an alternative amending formula that meets the needs of the provinces and the federal government. In my view there is still a great deal of negotiating room, and if there are indications of provincial flexibility, I feel that the national government would look very favourably upon the idea of resuming talks in some form.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps you could add the last phrase only.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am encouraged by the closing remarks of my honourable friend that there is flexibility and room for negotiation. That is good to hear, and it needs to be stressed. When my friend complains about what some premiers are saying, I suggest to him—although I have no desire to defend what they are saying, because it is none of my business—that what they did was in reaction to what my friend's administration was proposing. How does he expect the government to get away scot-free without a reaction when the very principles on which a federal system is founded—namely, co-operation and mutual endeavour between two parties—are ignored in favour of unilateral action, despite whatever provocation my honourable friend may think he is under to justify unilateralism? How does he expect any other reaction? He complains that the provinces have changed their minds about the Victoria formula since 1971. It is true that they have, but the federal government has changed its mind. The deal that was presented in this summer of 1980 was not the same one that was presented and discussed previously. It was much less favourable from provincial points of view than the one previously announced. I acknowledge the right of the federal government to change their minds, but they should also acknowledge the right of other people to change their minds.

• (1435)

Let us not get deflected from the main point that I think this house should be trying to establish, which is that, regardless of all these problems and regardless of one's view about them, it is not constructive at this moment to continue to drag them up and down this red carpet. What we ought to do is stick to the one simple thing, that there is a proposal by the provinces to meet again on the amending formula. Mr. Hatfield agreed that he preferred the Victoria formula, but he will take the Vancouver one. As I understood what he said—and I was there listening to him and questioning him, and I hope I got it right—he did not say that it would not be useful to meet on the amending formula. His problems with delay had to do with all the other things, and there may be some substance in that.

I suggest that we forget about the point making that we may have here and stick to the one subject, that of getting a meeting of the provinces and the federal government to discuss patriation and the amending formula. I think we can be successful, and that is what we ought to concentrate on.

Senator Molgat: What is the question?

Senator Flynn: Read Hansard tomorrow. Possibly you may understand.

Senator Molgat: The honourable senator has just made two speeches with not a single question in either.

Senator Flynn: Following the speech of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Smith: Senator Roblin's were very helpful speeches.

Senator Molgat: Remember, we want the rules followed.

Senator Flynn: I know your stand on the rules. You can keep it.

Senator Molgat: That's fine.

Senator Roblin: I don't like to change the present train of thought, but if we have disposed of the questions on this subject, as I guess we have, we now await the response of the Leader of the Government to the question as to whether or not he will make any proposal to his leader.

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government a question about our future activities between now and the next little while. Can he tell us when this house will adjourn for the Christmas season and when we will take up our business again afterwards? Can he also indicate which bills he expects we will be asked to deal with, if any, before the Christmas adjournment so that we can make some sensible arrangements for handling them?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer the first question today, but I expect to be able to do so tomorrow. This might not be useful, but I expect that we will be sitting next week, and I suspect that we might be coming back in January. There are discussions taking place now on the subject. I just do not have the answer to that question yet, but I do hope to have it tomorrow.

We have Bill S-10, to amend the Corporation and Labour Unions Returns Act, and Bill C-47, the supply bill, will be coming over.

They are sitting on Bill C-47 in the other place until midnight tonight, and it should be here for our attention tomorrow. As honourable senators will remember, our way of dealing with supply bills in the past has been, and will be on this occasion, to have them studied in advance by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I expect we will have something on that tomorrow. It is hoped that that bill can receive royal assent by next week if the pre-study by the committee is accepted by the Senate.

Those are the only two bills I have been told about so far. Of course, there are also the private bills that are before us. I estimate we will be required to sit until next Thursday, but I hope to have more certain information tomorrow.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—MASSING OF RUSSIAN TROOPS ON BORDERS—PRIME MINISTER'S MESSAGE TO PRESIDENT BREZHNEV

Hon. Martial Asselin: Yesterday I put a question to the Leader of the Government. Yesterday the Prime Minister said in the other place that he has sent a message to President Brezhnev regarding the situation in Poland. I do not know what kind of message he has sent President Brezhnev, but I think the Canadian people are entitled to know what kind of message has been sent, and whether the message contains any protestations against the possible invasion of Poland.

Will the minister be in a position to table a copy of this message in the Senate?

● (1440)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the text of the message sent by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to Mr. Brezhnev has not as yet been released. However, I inquired about this again today. The essence of the message is similar to the words I quoted to honourable senators last evening.

Honourable senators will recall that the Prime Minister has said that "We would not like to see a repeat of the situation at the time of the Afghanistan invasion by the Soviet Union". The Prime Minister has said that this is a very serious time for the peace of the world. He has expressed the hope that "Western nations will be able to react in a more united way to this very serious threat".

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Asselin: Do you have a copy of that?

Senator Perrault: My reply to your question is found at page 1383 of Senate Hansard. However, the exact text of the message has not yet been released. When and if it is released, it will be made available to the honourable members of the Senate.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I ask the Leader of the Government to assure the Senate that the Government of Canada takes a more serious view of any Soviet military action with regard to Poland than it did in 1968 when, as Soviet tanks were rolling into Czechoslovakia, a minister of the Trudeau government was heard to say that it was a regrettable event.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, again we have an example of a rather deplorable political gamesmanship that goes on from time to time in the opposition benches.

Senator Murray: Look it up.

Senator Perrault: Some unnamed minister is supposed to have said—

Senator Murray: Mitchell Sharp.

Senator Perrault: —on some date not given.

Senator Murray: August 1968.

Senator Perrault: Come on! The honourable senator is not being serious. May I suggest to the honourable senator that he bring to this chamber the complete statements made by the Honourable Mitchell Sharp on the subject of this invasion so that—Senator Murray: With pleasure.

Senator Perrault: —the entire Senate knows the exact position of the former Minister of State for External Affairs at that particular time.

Canada has never hung back when freedom has been challenged in this world. Indeed, Canada has been in the forefront of nations condemning violations of human rights wherever they have taken place.

THE ECONOMY

FOOD PRICES—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, it intrigues me a little to know that the Leader of the Government, to whom I wish to address a question, is still so enamoured of having long dissertations read in the Senate that he repeats today to my colleague the challenge he made to me yesterday, and to which I wish to draw his attention and about which I wish to ask him a question.

The Leader of the Government will recall the words that passed between us during Question Period yesterday, which are found on pages 1384 and 1385 of Senate Hansard.

I am almost tempted, so that he will not allege that I am making reference out of context, to read the whole of those two pages to him, but I assume that all his colleagues and mine might not consider that I ought to waste that much time on his irrelevancy.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Senator Smith: I would, however, refer him to that.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That's a waste of time.

Senator Flynn: You can say that again.

Senator Smith: He says it is a waste of time. I suppose it is always a waste of time for the honourable gentleman to discuss what may be legitimate criticisms of the actions or lack of actions of his government, and I can understand his impatience. He has demonstrated day after day that he resents being asked questions on government policies, and from time to time stands there and tells us, "You do not need to ask me about this kind of question." If the honourable gentleman wants me to look that up, I can, and I can quote him saying that on at least a dozen occasions.

Senator Olson: You always get answers.

Senator Smith: So, it does not disturb me that he thinks I am wasting time. I am quite prepared to waste quite a bit of it on him, if he really wants me to.

Senator Olson: On a point of order.

Senator Flynn: There is no point of order.

Senator Olson: The allegation is that I do not give answers. One of the first rules of a Question Period is that one is to seek information and not give it. That is in the Rules of the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Are you the Speaker?

Senator Olson: No, I am not the Speaker, but I am one of the members of this house who has agreed to abide by all its rules. Whenever honourable gentlemen opposite ask a question for which there is information available, that information has been either forthcoming immediately or, in most cases, the next day. Most of the time what they do is ask me to speculate on some rumours they have heard to which there is no answer. That is the kind of thing on which he is wasting our time again.

Senator Flynn: You are out of order. Order!

Senator Smith: I am glad to see that the honourable gentleman has demonstrated that I alone do not have a corner on wasting time. Perhaps now I might return to the question I had intended to ask, and by this time, perhaps the Leader of the Government has had an opportunity to read the two pages of yesterday's Hansard to which I referred him.

Senator Perrault: Scintillating reading.

Senator Smith: I thought that which I said was well worth reading, but on page 1385, if I do not risk raising the ire of the honourable gentleman by not starting at page 1384, I notice these words—

Senator Perrault: Keep it in context.

Senator Flynn: That is very difficult to do, if not impossible.

Senator Smith: —of the honourable gentleman:

> SENATOR PERRAULT: Honourable senators, if there is any concern about what the Prime Minister said during his press conference, I challenge the honourable senator to place in the written record of today's proceedings every word of the Prime Minister at that press conference so that the Canadian people, starting with senators, can determine exactly what he said.

I am interested to see that he still has that thought in his mind, and that he addressed it to my colleague.

I have a document which is entitled: "Transcript of the Prime Minister's News Conference . . . December 5, 1980." I understand this was issued by the Prime Minister's Office. As I said yesterday, I therefore take it to be an accurate transcript of what the Prime Minister said at that time and place. It consists of 18 numbered pages.

An Hon. Senator: Read them all.

Senator Smith: I am quite willing to do so, but before I embark on that lengthy project I should like to say that in reading them I find that the first 17 pages deal with such things as matters related to the Constitution, Poland, questions relating to the views of Mr. Ryan, the Leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec, about the Constitution, and so forth. Nowhere do I find anything relating to economic matters until I turn to page 18. Perhaps the Leader of the Government might wish me to start before page 18, but I assert, of course, that I have no reluctance to start at the beginning. I am perfectly capable of reading 18 pages. However, at page 18 it states:

> TERRY WILLS (Montreal Gazette):—

I take that to be the name of the reporter who asked the following question:

> —Mr. Prime Minister, a question on the economy and inflation. A study prepared by the Department of finance on the prospects for the Canadian economy was released at the same time as the budget. It predicted that food prices next year would rise more sharply than food prices did this year. In the October Consumer Price Index, food for home consumption was going up at 13.8 per cent. So, that would put it at 14, 15 per cent plus the rate of rise next year. When you and Mr. MacEachen say that Canadians have to tighten their belts, do you mean that literally—that they will have to accept less on their table?

The answer follows, and I assume this purports to be the answer given by the Prime Minister:

> A. No, they don't have to accept less on their table. They may switch their priorities and spend a bit more on food than on other things.

If the honourable gentleman would relate those remarks to the words I used in my question found at the bottom of page 1384 of Hansard, I am sure he will find a very close relationship. However, to go on and finish page 18:

• (1450)

Mr. MacEachen has said in his budget, and we have said repeatedly, that inflation is a very severe threat. That is why you are assisting the monetary policy which exists in the United States with very high interest rates and a monetary policy set in Canada freely, as you know, each month by comparing the rates in commercial transactions, which is very high, too, because unfortunately inflation remains a very great danger. Visibly, the monetary authorities in the United States are clamping down on monetary expansion because they want to fight that danger and prevent the type of inflation which you are talking about.

That is the end of page 18, and the end of the transcript.

I refer again to the words of the Prime Minister:

No, they don't have to accept less on their table. They may switch their priorities and spend a bit more on food than on other things.

Then I refer to the question I asked:

—I wish to draw the attention of the Leader of the Government to what appear to be remarks of the Prime Minister of this country very recently in a press conference to the general effect that if Canadians find it difficult to set enough on their tables to suit themselves and to give them adequate nourishment—

Now, listen to this.

—they might very well re-order their priorities as to how to spend their money.

Listen to the Prime Minister's words:

They may switch their priorities and spend a bit more on food than on other things.

Now, does the honourable gentleman maintain this is a remark that was taken out of context and is not properly related to the remarks of the Prime Minister, or does he wish me to read the other 17 pages of the transcript.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the technical accuracy of the words quoted in this chamber has never been disputed. The honourable senator is held in high respect in this chamber. But to take a brief sentence out of an 18-page transcript, which talked about many, many things—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no.

Senator Perrault: —which talked about many things, does, I feel, appear to many people who serve in Parliament to be rather unfair to the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no.

Senator Smith: Well, I cannot do any more than read what I have read, and if the honourable gentleman still wishes to maintain that my remarks were taken out of context, then I shall be glad to discuss it further with him. At the moment, however, I take his failure to answer as an admission that he cannot dispute the allegations that the question was in proper context and deserved a proper answer.

[Senator Smith.]

Senator Perrault: Yes, indeed, and the Prime Minister amplified those remarks later on in the other place and I am sure that in the weeks to come he will speak about this matter many times, and I hope the honourable senator will follow with avid interest all of those forthcoming speeches.

Senator Smith: I am sure he will speak about it many times, because he will be driven to try to explain it away. If he cannot do so any more efficiently than the Leader of the Government attempted to do today, then he will surely suffer for it.

POST OFFICE

CONTRACTS FOR TRUCKING SERVICES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning small firms, and paying particular attention to small trucking firms that have mail contracts with the Post Office. In view of the continuing increases in fuel and gasoline prices generally during the period of the contract between the federal government and these mail contractors, which affect the costs, indeed, to the point of creating a loss because of the fact that the continuing increases in fuel prices has caused them to operate at a loss, I wonder if the Leader of the Government or the Minister of Economic Development could make representations to the Postmaster General to review these contracts.

These contracts were entered into in good faith but because of the increase in fuel prices hardship is now being created. So I am wondering if the minister would make representations to see if it is possible to give these people a subsidy, or find some other way to relieve the extra burden which is going to put them in the same list as the many thousands of small businesses that are going into bankruptcy.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will refer the representations made by the honourable senator to the Postmaster General.

THE ECONOMY

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA ANNUAL REVIEW—RATE OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF DOMESTIC OIL—NATIONAL ENERGY POLICY

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Economic Council of Canada issued its Seventeenth Annual Review this morning. In it they concur with the government that Canadian oil prices should be 85 per cent of the Chicago price, but in order that the target should be achieved, the Council expressed its view that prices will have to be increased far more rapidly than the government proposes. However, the increases proposed by the government are barely half of those which the Economic Council says will be necessary in order for the government's own target to be reached.

With the compelling weight of this and virtually all other expert advice against its calculations, will the government now reconsider its policy, an action which would simultaneously reduce tensions with the producing provinces?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, as the honourable senator has pointed out in his question, the report was only released today, and obviously we would have to have a look at it to find the basis upon which the arguments about the differences in the speed of escalating oil prices are based. When we have had a chance to look at it for a few days, perhaps there will be a response to those arguments.

Senator Charbonneau: On the same subject, Mr. Ian Smyth, Executive Director of the Canadian Petroleum Association, pronounced last week on three objectives of the national energy policy saying that it has failed on each count. He also predicted that as a result of the budget only 5,800 wells will be drilled in 1981, as compared to 8,400 this year, and the 9,000 for 1981 which had been projected before the budget. That last figure is a direct contradiction of the one offered by Senator Olson on page 937 of Debates of the Senate of October 23. At that time he said that a slack market was forecast for 1981.

Would the minister undertake to explain the serious discrepancy? Is he able to confirm that current estimates of the number of wells to be drilled next year indicate that there will be approximately 4,200 fewer than in pre-budget predictions?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I will take that question under advisement and look into it. But I should point out that a number of small and medium-size Canadian oil companies are not as yet fully aware of all the details of the legislation and, indeed, the regulations. And certainly no final budgets for exploratory commitment for 1981 would have been made until they know what they are. Indeed, we are trying to work this out now, and there is a technical committee of some of the senior officers from many of the oil companies assisting me in Calgary. They try to make suggestions, not in attacking the main thrust of the budget, but as to how it will be applied in a practical way. There are some very good suggestions coming out of that, but I cannot say exactly when all of this will be worked out. Finally, I would like to suggest that it is probably not useful to enter into a debate here as to whether or not Mr. Smyth and I would agree to what the activity may be.

ENERGY

ENERGY SUPPLIES ALLOCATION BOARD—ABILITY TO ACT QUICKLY IN EMERGENCY

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last Friday in response to a question in the other place the Minister of Energy cited the active and effective work of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, and accordingly suggested that if there were to be an international energy emergency Canada would be able to face it. While the prospect of rationing is an unsettling one, I would draw to the minister's attention remarks made yesterday by the chairman of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board to the effect that after an emergency has been proclaimed, it would take six months to institute a rationing program. Would the minister elaborate on what sense of security Canadians should derive from the assurances of the Minister of Energy, given the admitted inability of this board to respond quickly to a crisis situation?

• (1500)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it has been announced a number of times that the government is giving consideration not only to a regional industrial policy but an industrial adjustment policy that is required in some parts of Canada. When the minister responsible for that is ready to make an announcement, he will make it, and I will bring it to the attention of the Senate as soon thereafter as possible.

OIL SELF-SUFFICIENCY—OIL SANDS PRODUCTION

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It is perfectly evident to me, as I am sure it must be perfectly evident to the minister, if he would admit it, that oil self-sufficiency cannot be achieved without the inclusion of the oil sands plants or without the production from them.

Will the minister concede that changes to the budget, including a true base price, rather than one reduced through the imposition of a wellhead tax, and an escalator more reflective of inflation in the industry than the cost-of-living index, would serve to create the kind of climate which would permit construction of these plants, thus contributing to self-sufficiency in the process?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have listened to the representation made by the honourable senator and I take the view he has expressed as his suggestion for effecting Canadian self-sufficiency in oil. I do not agree entirely with what he has said. I do not believe it is impossible to have self-sufficiency without the oil sands, but I do agree with him to the extent that a greater effort in that area is the best prospect for self-sufficiency and, therefore, that that is a potential on which the emphasis ought to be placed.

There has, however, been some encouraging news in the last few days from some other oil deposits that are now being expanded rather rapidly off the east coast. At least, the potential supply is there.

I am afraid I cannot take anything more from the honourable senator's question than that he wanted to express his views, and I guess we can take them as that.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. I thank the minister for the extent to which he has agreed with my statement of what the situation is with respect to the oil sands, but my supplementary question is related to a particular project. It was reported last week that with respect to Suncorp there appears to be some movement by the federal government toward making the kind of changes in its budget about which I spoke in my first question.

I hasten to tell the minister that we on this side endorse that kind of accommodation, but we are asking for an assurance that, should the government, indeed, be intending to show flexibility toward Suncorp, it will be equally forthcoming in respect of the other oil sands plants.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there are discussions under way. I guess the best thing I can say without repeating myself is that when there are firm announcements to be made on that I will bring the information to the house. In other words, I will supply this house with solid information saying, "There appears to be this" or, "There appears to be that."

CANADA OIL AND GAS LEGISLATION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, my questions are also directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It is my understanding that legislation will be introduced this week in the other place to deal with the oil and gas exploration rules. Can the minister tell me if the provinces have been consulted with respect to the impact of those regulations, rules or guidelines, or whatever they might be, in terms of the offshore areas? If so, what was the reaction of the provinces?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is not a matter of rules and regulations. A bill called, I believe, the Canada Gas and Oil Act has been introduced. I do not wish to go over all of the details of that, because I am sure my honourable friend can read it as easily as I can.

Senator Doody: There appears to be some misunderstanding. There is no question about my ability to read. There may be a question about the minister's responsibility in reporting to the house. The question I asked was whether the Government of Canada has discussed with the provinces the contents of that bill, and I wanted to know what the reaction of the provinces has been, particularly those provinces that feel their offshore claims might be jeopardized.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will have to refer that to the minister responsible for introducing the bill, but I can say that for many months there has been a rather lively discussion about that with some of the provinces. I am sure my honourable friend is well aware of those discussions.

Senator Doody: I am aware of many discussions, honourable minister, relative to the offshore jurisdiction claims of the provinces vis-à-vis the Government of Canada. I am not aware of discussions that might have taken place regarding the contents of this bill, which I understand entitles the Government of Canada or its agencies to participate, and demands that the companies involved in offshore production must be at least 50 per cent owned by Canadians.

It seems to me that that is a rather important factor in terms of offshore or under-water exploration, because of the huge amounts of money involved in just sinking the basic exploration holes. Surely this sort of legislation will have a large effect on offshore activity.

That is the sort of information I was asking for in terms of discussion with the provinces that will be most immediately affected.

Senator Olson: I will inquire of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and provide the honourable senator with as much information as I can about any discussions.

Senator Doody: Supplementary to that, will the minister inform me if the industry has been consulted, or if the advice of the industry has been requested, with respect to the impact of this legislation on the industry or its investment and other plans for the Arctic, the north, or the Atlantic area?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, one of the procedures in the other house, and in this one as well, is to refer bills to committees where interested parties may appear, make submissions and, indeed, answer questions of the members of the committees. It is also a practice to amend bills in committee, when the members are impressed with the representations they hear. I am sure that the bill in question will follow the same route.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable minister for his information, but it is really information that most of us already have. I do not pretend to have as much experience in this house or in the other place as the honourable minister, but I am aware of the committee system. What I was asking was whether the industry or the provinces had been advised of these steps and whether their advice had been asked for prior to the introduction of the bill.

Senator Olson: I am sure there was some discussion. Since it has been common knowledge, not only between governments but among the public, since the budget and energy package were introduced in the latter part of October, I am sure the provinces were aware that such a bill would be introduced in this session of Parliament.

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—PRICE NEGOTIATIONS WITH IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on December 3 by Senator Guay concerning the Imperial Oil project at Cold Lake, Alberta.

The government feels that its offer of the international price, namely, $38 a barrel, plus escalation, to Imperial Oil will be adequate to cover the additional expenses of developing the tar sands. It is difficult to determine and I am unable to say how much of a profit the company will make. I am sure the honourable senator understands that there are a number of other factors at play that determine profit. I might also add that the company has not indicated to me what profit it would consider attractive. We all look forward, however, to the development and future benefits of the Cold Lake project.

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT'S SHAREHOLDING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question asked by Senator Roblin yesterday about government shares in the Canada Development Corporation.

I am unable to respond specifically to the honourable senator's question, the reason being that the government is presently reviewing a broad area of its instruments to enhance efficient industrial development in the country. The CDC is included as part of this review. However, the house will be informed of any announcements made in this area.

ENERGY

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—FEDERAL LOAN TO IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on December 3, concerning the agreement with Imperial Oil and its Cold Lake, Alberta, project.

I must inform the honourable senator that I am unable at this time to provide him with a copy of the agreement. Negotiations have not yet been undertaken between representatives of Petro-Canada and Imperial Oil. I would, however, like to refer the honourable senator to Order in Council PC 1980-3142 of November 21, 1980. This is the authority instructing Petro-Canada to undertake to negotiate the terms and conditions of a loan up to $40 million with Imperial Oil. I will endeavour to keep honourable senators informed of the progress of these negotiations.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Murray on November 25 concerning DREE, GDA and subsidiary agreements.

I have reviewed the comments made by my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. First, I would like to state, as did my colleague at committee, that no decision has been taken regarding possible changes to the DREE, GDA and subsidiary agreement approach to regional economic development. Cabinet decides collectively major changes in such policies and programs in the economic sector. Ministers have not been asked to consider possible alternatives to the GDA system. Furthermore, I believe that my colleague also stated that it is elementary that no unilateral program should be administered in isolation or in conflict with areas of provincial jurisdiction.

If honourable senators have additional questions, they may want to invite the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to return to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I understand that my colleague has indicated that he would make himself available if such an invitation were forthcoming.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers. First, I have an update on the Garrison Dam situation. The Deputy Leader of the Opposition is not in his place, so perhaps I should leave this until he returns.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He is attending a meeting of the Constitution Committee.

Senator Perrault: Then perhaps the information should be placed in today's Hansard.

(The answer follows:)

> Contrary to press reports, the U.S. administration has not given general endorsement to the Garrison project. A green light has been given to construction in the West Oakes test area only, south of the continental divide, an area which can be irrigated without interbasin transfers using water from the James River.
> Funds for those parts of the Garrison project which would affect Canada are to be placed in a "reserve fund" to be expended only after the conclusion of consultations with Canada, if at all. This is a welcome development which demonstrates that the U.S. is prepared to honour its commitments to Canada.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXPRESS—CLOSING OF TERMINALS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on November 18, concerning the question of pre-retirement with regard to those CN workers who would be laid off because of the closing of facilities. He asked me to spell out precisely what the pre-retirement arrangement is and what would be received in the form of pension benefits by those workers.

The entitlements of employees eligible for early retirement are detailed at the Job Security Agreement signed June 29, 1976, and at the Special Agreement signed November 14, 1980. As the content of these documents is detailed and complex, I would ask that excerpts containing the pertinent sections of each be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For excerpts, see Appendix "A")

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the special agreement of November 14, 1980, shall remain in effect until December 31, 1981, unless extended by mutual agreement of CN and the union for a period not to exceed six months. During the term of this agreement, the benefit levels and provisions of the Job Security Agreement are suspended for employees adversely affected by technological, operational, and organizational changes of a permanent nature.

Honourable senators, Senator Phillips asked a question on November 18 concerning the areas to which the laid-off employees of Canadian National would be transferred.

It is, as yet, not possible to determine where the employees will choose to relocate. Following receipt of notice from CN that their positions have been terminated for reasons of operational, organizational or technological change, employees may choose to exercise their seniority rights in order to obtain alternative employment within CN. Relocation is a possibility; however, the decision to change an employee's home location is left up to the individual. Hence, at this time it is not possible to predict to which areas laid-off employees are likely to choose to move.

Honourable senators, on November 18, Senator Muir asked the following question concerning employees of Canadian National Railways:

> In the event of relocations, I would ask the government leader to inquire as to what arrangements may be made in respect of the expenses that will be incurred in relocating these workers and their families to other parts of the country. I have particular reference to the homes that these people have in the Atlantic region which they now cannot sell. Will some arrangement be made by Dr. Bandeen and his assistants, who are stacked up in Montreal and Moncton and other centres in Canada, to come up with a brilliant idea that will be of benefit to these workers who have devoted their lives to the Canadian National Railway?

In reply, CN employees required to change home location as a result of technological, operational and organizational changes undertaken by the Express Division are entitled to benefits as detailed at the Job Security Agreement signed June 29, 1976, and at the Special Agreement signed November 14, 1980. As the content of these documents is both detailed and complex, I would ask that further excerpts from these documents be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILL

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Davey, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, intituled: "An Act respecting The Royal Canadian Legion".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I indicated yesterday, I now yield to Senator Macdonald.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length on the history of the Royal Canadian Legion, because Senator Marshall mentioned it last night and went into considerable detail about its illustrious history.

As honourable senators know, the Royal Canadian Legion as it is today, arose out of various veteran's organizations which existed following World War I. There was the Great War Veterans Association, the Tubercular Veterans Association, the Disabled Canadian Veterans Association and others. Also, as Senator Marshall mentioned, in 1926 the name first used was the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. That was incorporated under letters patent and not by an act of Parliament.

I should perhaps mention at this point that one association that did not join the others in forming the Legion was the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans, which exists today, as it has for many years, as a separate body.

It was in 1948 that the Legion was incorporated by the federal Parliament under the name of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, and the various organizations that I have mentioned were involved in the establishment of the new organization. I believe it came about as a result of the efforts of Sir Douglas Haig, who was Commander in Chief of the British Forces in World War I. He was deeply involved in the activities of the British Empire Service League and visited Canada in this connection. So by chapter 84 of the Statutes of 1948, the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League came into being.

● (1520)

In 1959, for obvious reasons, the name was changed to the Canadian Legion, and in 1961 it received its present name of the Royal Canadian Legion.

Now, honourable senators, over the years there have been a good many amendments to the 1948 act, but its essential character, its essential principle, has not been changed. I think it is fair to say that only the amendments concerning the qualifications for membership have been of general interest to the members. Indeed, some of these have been quite controversial. This is understandable, and to understand it one should look at the qualifications set out in the 1948 statute, the present qualifications, and the qualifications proposed in Bill S-15, which we are now considering.

Paragraph (a) of section 4 of the 1948 act sets out the qualifications at that time. That paragraph stated that the purposes and objects of the Legion were:

> (a) to constitute an association of those who have served in His Majesty's navy, army, air force or any auxiliary force, which association shall be democratic—

Over the years membership was opened to various classes of associate membership, and ladies' auxiliaries were organized. The present qualifications for membership read as follows:

(a) to constitute an association of

(i) those persons who have served or are serving in Her Majesty's navy, army or air force or any auxiliary force thereof,

(ii) those persons who have served or are serving in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and

(iii) the sons and daughters of any of those persons referred to in subparagraphs (i) and (ii), which association shall be democratic—

You may recall that it was in the 1978 amendment, which we dealt with here, that sons and daughters were enabled to become members of the Legion. The bill at that time—I believe it was S-10—had practically the same wording as Bill S-15, and it was changed very substantially in committee. This was done, as was stated by the Dominion Command of the Legion, because it was felt that some provision must be made to attract new members to compensate for the loss of membership due to deaths and other causes.

Now we have Bill S-15, which, if passed, will make a further change in eligibility for membership. Let me quote it in full, as I feel it is a very important amendment. Clause 1 of Bill S-15 is as follows:

1. Paragraph 4(a) of chapter 84 of the Statutes of Canada, 1948, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) to constitute an association of those persons who have served or are serving in Her Majesty's armed forces or any auxiliary force thereof—

Up to that point I have no quarrel with it. But then it adds these words:

—and of other persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion, which association shall be democratic—

Honourable senators, this is not a minor amendment; rather it is a major amendment. It is one which changes, or has the potential to change, the whole concept, the whole character and the whole principle on which the Legion has been built. Certainly the words "other persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion" do away with the idea of service in the armed forces, and do away with the common bond which united the members and which made the Legion a unique organization. I do not know what is meant by the words "persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion", but on the face of it I think such words make the rest of the paragraph unnecessary.

It is a major change that is being proposed, one which would make the membership open to anyone who wants to join. I think this is so, because there is no limitation set out in the amendment. It does not state, for example, that only persons who are Canadian citizens, or persons residing in Canada, may join. Again, the reason given for the proposed amendment, which is in fact, as I mentioned, about the same as that proposed in 1978, is the need to keep up the membership, which has or will decline as veterans die or are no longer able to serve due to age or other reasons.

Just how valid a reason this is I do not know. I do believe that if Bill S-15 becomes law in its present form it will cause a lot of ill feeling, a lot of resentment, and I expect it will also cause a decline in membership.

Since this major change is being proposed, I believe it would be a good thing to look back over the years and try to understand the motives that influenced veterans to join the Legion, especially after World War II. I expect that there were various motives, and all were worthy ones. However, I believe it must be acknowledged that there was one particular motive, one common motive, which influenced men of different educational standards, of different social and economic backgrounds, of different standards of living, to come together in the Legion. I believe that strong motive was the sense of obligation that those who came through the war unharmed had towards those who were not so fortunate. They had a sense of obligation towards those who had died and to those who had suffered physical or mental wounds as a result of war service. This, I think, was and is the powerful motivating force which leads veterans today to accept office in their local branches and to give freely of their time, their ability and their knowledge to carry on the day-to-day business of the branch.

I am sure that anyone familiar with the business of any local Legion branch must be impressed by the work it does on behalf of veterans, and also by its involvement in community activities as a secondary activity. Personally, I have long admired, for example, the work of the service officers of branches in connection with pension claims. These members are really dedicated, and there is many a veteran today who owes a debt of gratitude to the service officer. It makes no difference if the veteran is a member or not. The service officer looks after all veterans and their dependants.

Honourable senators, if this bill is passed in its present form, I believe there is a real danger that many members will resent it. Indeed, such resentment may well show itself by loss of membership, or by the loss of that sense of obligation which, as I have mentioned, motivated many Legion members. If older members are lost by this bill's becoming law, and their places are filled by persons who "support the purposes of the Legion," then, honourable senators, I believe the Legion will be weakened and its first and main purpose reduced in value.

If this bill is passed in its present form I believe it will have an adverse effect on the Legion. If the membership is wide open, then I am concerned that the first and primary purpose of the Legion will be downgraded and perhaps lost. I do not know just what the Dominion Command have in mind about the future of the Legion, but it looks to me as if they plan to turn it into a service club, or some kind of a social club, or a combination of the two. Before this bill receives second reading and is referred to a committee, I believe there should be some explanation of what is meant by "any person" in paragraph 4(a). Is there to be no restriction whatever on membership? You will notice nothing is said about members being Canadian citizens or being residents of Canada. And I think we should know, too, what is meant by the words "who support the purposes of the Legion". What kind of support is contemplated? Do they pay their dues, or give a donation, or say a kind word about the Legion? I repeat: What is meant by "support"?

Honourable senators, I was surprised, when looking over the general by-laws of the Royal Canadian Legion as amended in July 1980, to see that the proposed amendment is already inserted in that booklet as one of the objects of the Legion. It is to be found in the introduction.

Honourable senators, I am opposed to the bill in its present form, but I will not oppose second reading or referring it to committee, in the hope that a better bill will emerge from the committee for third reading. While in committee, I think we should have some figures to show the decline in membership since the 1978 amendment, and also figures to show the number of sons and daughters of members who have joined as a result of the 1978 bill.

Honourable senators, I have spoken only on the amendment concerning membership. I have no objection to the other proposed amendments, as they are probably necessary or, at least, desirable, but I do object, and object strenuously, to the principal amendment, which will permit membership in the Royal Canadian Legion to non-Canadians, living in any part of the world, which I believe could happen if this bill is passed in its present form.

I would also like to know when the Dominion Command anticipates that the Legion will no longer have a sufficient number of veterans to carry out its work. I would also like to know if the Dominion Command anticipates the Legion's becoming a social club or service club as soon as the membership is opened to any other person. Not only this, but we do not know if they have it in mind to change the purposes and objects of the Legion. I should also like to have some information on that aspect.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, once the Legion no longer has as its principal purpose the welfare of veterans and their dependants and the preservation of the memory of those who died as a result of war, then it should no longer carry the proud name of the Royal Canadian Legion.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-sixth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Brussels, Belgium, from 14th to 23rd November, 1980, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.—(Honourable Senator Bonnell).

[Senator Macdonald.]

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, from November 16 to 21 of this year I had the privilege of representing the Parliament of Canada at the Twenty-sixth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly held at Brussels, Belgium. The Canadian delegation, headed by Mr. Leonard Hopkins, M.P., was well representative of by both houses of Parliament. At this meeting of the Assembly, six committees were established—the Standing Committee; the Economic Committee; the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information; the Military Committee; the Political Committee; and the Scientific and Technical Committee.

I had the privilege, along with my colleague, Senator Hicks, to represent Canada's interest in the Scientific and Technical Committee. It is my intention today to report mostly on the scientific and technical aspects of the North Atlantic Assembly.

Before I do that, however, I should like to thank Mr. Leonard Hopkins, the member of the House of Commons for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke, for his excellent leadership during the meeting of the Assembly. I should also like to thank Mr. Stephen Knowles, who acted as secretary, for his assistance in organizing the work of the Assembly, and Mr. Roger Hill who acted as adviser to the whole Canadian group. Without their leadership and assistance the work of the Canadian delegation could not have been carried out nearly as efficiently.

Honourable senators, as I stated earlier, I was assigned to the Scientific and Technical Committee and spent most of my time participating in its work. This committee was chaired by Mr. Charlie Rose, a Democrat Congressman from North Carolina. The general rapporteur, Mr. Ian Watson, M.P., from Canada, gave a general discussion on oil and gas resources in the Arctic, and presented a paper on trans-frontier air pollution as well as a paper on nuclear-waste management. These papers were well received by the full committee.

Another paper was presented by Dr. John Davison of the International Institute of Cellular and Molecular Pathology of Brussels. He gave an excellent paper on biological evolution which was followed by a report by Mr. Robert McGrindle of the United Kingdom on genetic manipulation. This was followed by a paper on energy sources and uses within the United Kingdom which was presented by Lord Wynne-Jones.

I could spend half an hour on each of these topics, and I am sure that honourable senators would benefit from the expert knowledge contained in these papers. Since other members of the Senate attended the Assembly meetings, I will leave most of the major topics such as armament and the politics and economics of NATO for their reports. However, I should like to spend some time talking about one particular topic, namely, genetic manipulation.

There have been dramatic developments in recent years in the field of genetic manipulation respecting recombinant deoxyribonucleic acid or DNA research. Among the most noteworthy of these developments has been the success in the bacterial cloning of the anti-viral and anti-cancer protein, interferon; the announcement by Eli Lilly Pharmaceutical Company that it expects to be able to market commercial quantities of human insulin produced by recombinant DNA technology by the end of 1981; the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that new forms of life created by genetic manipulation can be patented; and the decision by the National Institute of Health that 80 per cent of all recombinant DNA work is safe and only requires a very minimum biological and physical containment.

The pace of developments and the application of the recombinant DNA technology is likely to quicken even further in coming years with the advent of new knowledge and technical capabilities. Apart from small venture-capital companies and research departments of large pharmaceutical companies, which are already engaged in recombinant DNA work, it has been announced that commercial companies are being formed in France, Canada and the United States with governmental encouragement. It is impossible to escape the increased commercial and industrial impetus resulting from the application of genetic manipulation techniques.

The jump from laboratory bench to commercial production has happened in a very short time frame and against a background which has become increasingly favourable to recombinant DNA research. Scientists and the informed public have been aware not only that the risks involved appear to be much less than originally thought, but also that applications of the techniques promise vastly-improved knowledge of human cellular functions and increased supplies of essential pharmaceutical and agricultural products.

It was only six years ago that the controversy surrounding recombinant DNA research started with the publication in the July 1974 issue of Science magazine of a letter by Dr. Paul Berg, on behalf of a committee of the National Academy of Science, calling for a moratorium on certain recombinant DNA experiments due to uncertainties of the hazards involved. Since that time, recombinant DNA research has become a widely-argued and discussed subject by scientists and the general public in many countries throughout the world, and it is only recently that a consensus has developed that the dangers may have been exaggerated.

Nuclear energy is the only other subject of scientific interest to arouse so much emotion and to have isolated and formed opinions into pro and con camps. There is no doubt that the cause of DNA research suffered considerably from exaggerated press reports, sensationalist claims and scientific miscalculations. In many people's minds the research conjured up visions of stereotyped human beings produced in batches, Frankenstein-type monsters or new bacteria causing uncontrolled world-wide epidemics.

On the other hand, there are those who point out that each year tens of thousands of people die of starvation and disease, and that recombinant DNA research and the broader field of bio-technology may well be able to save many of those lives through its contribution to the production of hormones, proteins, antibiotics and vaccines. To vastly improve our agricultural production, they tell us that they can now replace some of the chromosomes in corn so that corn will now be able to take the nitrogen from the air rather than have to depend on fertilizers in the ground.

During the past two years there has been remarkable progress in understanding the structure and function of cells of mammals and bacteria. The nucleus of these cells is composed of protein and nucleic acid, mainly DNA, which directs the cellular activity. DNA itself is divided into genes which transmit hereditary information. In 1972 an all-important step forward was made when it was demonstrated that segments of DNA from certain organisms can be inserted into a host bacterium and reproduced. It expresses copies of the original transferred DNA segment.

This increase in genetic knowledge has led to a growth in DNA research, and has allowed scientists to combine genetic material from different and completely unrelated species in order to study how DNA transmits genetic information in living organisms. This interchange of genes between unrelated species does not necessarily occur in nature and it is, therefore, both novel and artificial.

An example was quoted at the 1978 annual meeting of the American College of Surgeons, when it was claimed that Dr. Paul Berg and fellow scientists at Stanford University had successfully transplanted functioning genes from the cell of a rabbit into those of an African green monkey.

Progress with DNA research has been plagued by arguments relating to the risk involved, but, strange to relate, it was the scientists themselves who drew public attention to the potential dangers of DNA research. Recently, however, there has been a growing feeling that earlier concerns of the risk have been exaggerated. Many scientists who called for a moratorium on research in this field have changed their assessment.

Scientists should not, however, be too surprised if the public reacts rather variedly to their current mood of optimism coming so soon after their warnings of just six years ago.

So far, however, there is no indication that hazardous organisms have resulted from any of the experiments that have been conducted, and certain risk assessment exercises should have reassured public confidence. A debate has been taking place in many countries throughout the world as to how DNA research should be regulated, and guidelines have emerged based mainly upon experiences of the United States and United Kingdom. The subject of DNA research is a complicated one for the layman to follow, but unless we, ultimately, as parliamentarians, are prepared to delegate decision-making to scientists and technicians, we must realize the significance of this new research, and make our voices heard on the issues related thereto.

As also with nuclear energy, it will be the politicians who, ultimately, have to decide what limitations, if any, are placed on DNA research to ensure that the public both benefits from the great possibilities it offers and are protected against any dangers that may arise in its implementation. It was continually impressed upon the committee that despite the success of bacteria producing trial quantities of medically useful proteins and hormones, the greatest benefit of DNA research has been, and will continue to be, in fundamental genetic research to enable scientists to understand the structure and function of genes in human, animal and plant cells. DNA research is progressively increasing our stores of genetic knowledge. In the long term it is anticipated that scientists will be able to identity each one of the 50,000 or more genes in every human cell. Each of these genes carries the information to determine, on expression, the structure of a specific protein.

As many human hereditary diseases are caused by the malfunction of a single gene, it is hoped that eventually it will be possible to replace defective genes with healthy ones to overcome diseases, such as sickle-cell anemia and hemophilia.

The possibility of gene replacement therapy was brought one step nearer in April 1980, when a team of researchers from the University of California at Los Angeles introduced genes from the bone marrow cells of mice into cells that subsequently populated the bone marrow of other mice.

One of the Yale scientists, Dr. John Jordan, claimed that this kind of experiment will help in understanding the nature of the human chromosome, and in mapping the genes along the entire length of the 46 human chromosomes—the build-up of a library of human genes.

Although the application of gene replacement therapy remains a long way off, it has been claimed by Dr. Philip Leder of the Nelson Institute of Child Health and Development that a number of inherited diseases will be understood at their basic genetic level within the next two years.

A further application of DNA research technique is to diagnose genetic defects in unborn babies. By prenatal amniotic fluid analysis or amniocentesis, first demonstrated in 1978 and now in widespread use, the mother has the option of abortion if a fetus is, in fact, found to have an inherited genetic defect.

Dr. David Baltimore of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology has predicted that anything that is basically a protein will be makeable by recombinant DNA technology in unlimited quantities in the next 15 years. Already there has been considerable success in bacterial cloning of protein products.

It was announced in September 1978 that human insulin had been produced for the first time using recombinant DNA technology. Insulin is used in the treatment of diabetes, which occurs when a diseased pancreas does not produce enough of the natural hormone insulin to properly metabolize the sugar in the blood. At the present time, the insulin used to treat diabetes is isolated from the pancreas of cows and pigs.

Successful trials were held in the summer of 1980 at Guy's Hospital in London on healthy people using genetically-engineered human insulin produced by Eli Lilly Pharmaceutical Company from techniques discovered by Gennetec Incorporated of California.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Two production facilities for insulin will be built by Eli Lilly at Indianopolis and Liverpool, England, but human insulin produced by the recombinant DNA technique is not likely to be available in commercial quantities for at least a year.

● (1550)

It has recently been announced that Gennetic Incorporated have produced human pro-insulin by bacterial methods. Pro-insulin is the natural precursor of insulin and is converted to insulin in the pancreas gland.

A hormone that stimulates the human immune system was produce by recombinant DNA technique, and this hormone has proved successful in clinical trials for the treatment of brain and lung cancers. It helps restore the body's immunity system, and may therefore also be of value in fighting the serious infections which often occur in immune-surpressed cancer patients.

Another important result of cancer research, called T-Antigen, has been cloned by researchers from Harvard University. Considerable interest and publicity followed the announcement in January 1980 that a research team, led by Professor Charles Weissmann of the University of Zurich, had discovered biologically active leukocyte interferon by genetic engineering techniques from bacteria containing human interferon DNA. Interferons are naturally occuring proteins which can kill viruses and tend to slow down the growth of certain types of cancers.

Research on the effectiveness of interferon has been complicated because, up to the present time, only very small quantities have been available, with a purity of less than 1 per cent. Professor Weissmann has claimed that interferon can be produced on an industrial scale using recombinant DNA techniques within two or three years.

The clotting factor, a protein which protects people from excessive blood loss, which is missing from hemophiliacs, also seems possible of eventual production using recombinant DNA technology.

In April 1980, Abbot Laboratories in Chicago announced a successful bacterial production of human enzyme called Urokinase which dissolves blood clots in the lungs resulting from pulmonary embolisms. Urokinase is the first human enzyme and the largest protein yet to be produced by recombinant DNA techniques which are considered to be more efficient for producing Urokinase than the current method of extracting it from the kidney cells growing in culture. Urokinase could well be used as well to treat arterial and heart disease.

Recombinant DNA techniques provide new opportunities for producing significant quantities of pure viral compounds and also for redesigned viruses for use in live vaccines against infectious disease.

At a meeting in October 1979 on molecular approaches to vaccines at the United States National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases several developments were announced in the production, by recombinant DNA techniques, of bacterial components implicated in diarrheal diseases, and also of genes from influenza and hepatitis viruses.

In September 1980, Professor Kenneth Murray, head of the Molecular Biology Department of Edinburgh University, said that genetic manipulation techniques "could soon produce an effective and safe vaccine against hepatitis B virus," a severe fever disease which attacks the liver and kills many people, particularly in Africa and Asia, and is associated with liver cancer in later life. Professor Murray also claims that rabbits can be made to produce effective anti-bodies against human hepatitis.

Honourable senators, it is my belief, after attending the meeting of the Science and Technical Committee at the North Atlantic Assembly conference in Brussels, that the world is advancing very quickly in molecular engineering and in the manipulation of genes, or genetic manipulation. We, as parliamentarians, should be taking note of what is taking place in the world in the field of science, and our Health, Welfare and Science Committee should be sending a member to all NATO conferences to follow up on the latest scientific knowledge available to us from the Alliance.

The Health, Welfare and Science Committee should also be hearing experts on these subjects in order to learn the hazards of this new technology, and to assess the risk involved in the manipulation of genes in viruses and bacteria, in mammals, and in humans. Perhaps we should be hearing evidence concerning the social political and ethical aspects of this advanced science of genetic manipulation, so that we can inform the general public of the importance of this research for the betterment of all mankind. I believe there is a fine line to be drawn between the scientific freedom and public accountability.

The ability to effect cellular formation has enormous long-term implications for mankind. The very tampering with living organisms, of which DNA research is but one example, will, in the near future, call for public participation in deciding what restrictions, if any, should be placed on this research.

No scientific achievement since the development of nuclear energy has so excited public opinion. The importance and long-term implications of genetic manipulation makes it a field of research which to many does not lend itself to self-regulation by scientists alone.

I hope this brief report on what is taking place in the scientific field will cause honourable senators to understand the urgency of the need to have Canadian parliamentarians participate in these rapid developments, not only within the NATO countries but within the Warsaw Pact countries as well.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981, which was presented on December 4.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved that the report be adopted.

● (1600)

He said: Honourable senators, I rise with some trepidation at this late hour, but more in respect of having to follow on the brilliant dissertation given by Senator Bonnell, which was a great pleasure to listen to.

Honourable senators, I shall deal with the main estimates for the year ending March 31, 1981, which, after being referred on April 29, 1980, were examined by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and which I understand are the subject of Bill C-47, to be introduced in the Senate tomorrow.

As you know, it is the practice of the Senate to refer the estimates to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for examination and to report back prior to the arrival of the supply bill, which is then dealt with in the chamber and not once again referred to the committee. So, much like the Hayden formula, this speeds up the work of the Senate in its consideration of the supply bill.

With respect to the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1981, the committee held 15 hearings involving 28 witnesses, including the Minister of Finance. These hearings did in fact fit in with the committee's major examination on the subject of Government Policy and Regional Disparities. On that subject we will have held 30 meetings by tomorrow. We hope to hold a total of some 50 hearings on that subject and to publish our report this coming summer.

Honourable senators, the main estimates total $59.13 billion, and if you take out of that loans, investments and advances of $1.52 billion, the budgetary estimates are $57.861 billion. This is an increase of 11.5 per cent over the previous year, but I might say that the estimates that were tabled were based on economic assumptions laid out by the previous government. Honourable senators are aware that the present government brought down its budget on October 28, and this budget will, of course, cause changes to the estimates, and those changes will be dealt with in supplementary estimates for the balance of this fiscal year.

At this point, based on supplementary estimates (B), the committee's report on which was adopted by this house last week, the total spending for the government in the year ending March 31, 1981, is some $60.440 billion.

The Finance Committee's report on the main estimates was printed in Hansard of December 4. I should like now to deal with three salient items that I think might be of interest.

The first area of concern is the inflationary environment in which we find ourselves in Canada. A number of years ago the Bank of Canada embarked upon a gradualist policy to reduce the rate of inflation in Canada. It did this by adopting ever-lowering bands containing the rate of growth of the monetary aggregates. Its band target at the present time is to permit a growth in M-1, the basic aggregate, of from 5 to 9 per cent per year. The object of that exercise is to reduce the supply of funds so that there is a reduction in the demand for goods and services, and it is hoped that by virtue of that reduction in demand, there will be a reduction in the rate of increase of wages and prices.

It does not seem to have worked too well. At the present time, the annual rate of increase of the Consumer Price Index is 10.9 per cent. We are all aware of the egregious increases in wages and in prices. Honourable senators may have seen the demands of the Air Canada flight attendants this morning. I did not calculate the percentage, but it looks to be well in excess of 12 per cent per year. More than that, we are aware of a very dangerous speculation that is afoot in this country. If one looks at the art market today, one will see that it bears no relation whatsoever to reality. If one looks at the residential property market in Toronto, and worse in Vancouver and on Vancouver Island, one will see that it has lost all sense. People are taking their money out of productive investments and putting it into speculative investments in the hope that they can beat inflation.

So what do we do with a policy that has not worked? It seems to me that the only thing that can be done is have the Bank of Canada lower the target once again, or perhaps change the aggregate on which it bases its target. But, either way, if it has to do that—and I believe it will have to do that in order to reduce inflationary influences and inflationary expectations that are afoot—we could be facing in Canada a major down-turn. We are already committed to certain price increases that cannot be avoided. We must increase the price of energy. The decrease in the value of the Canadian dollar is going to increase our import prices. There are wage settlements already locked in. If the Bank of Canada holds down the increase in the aggregates on even a lower level than at present, then there will be a transfer of income away from one part of the economy to those parts of the economy where the price increases are inevitable. The result most likely will be a very large loss of output which could result in a down-turn of fairly major proportions.

The second area of concern to your committee is the size of the federal budgetary deficit. It is projected, for the year 1980-81, at $14,150 million. To put that in some kind of context, that would be comparable to a budgetary deficit in the United States of $150 billion. I am not sure what the U.S. deficit is today, but I think it is estimated to be in the range of $30 to $40 billion.

Such a deficit can create economic difficulties for us in three ways, the first is the cost of servicing the public debt. That cost can crowd out other worthwhile expenditures of government. To give you some idea of that cost in this budget, the expenditures for servicing the public debt is $10.275 billion, or 17.7 per cent of the total budgetary expenditures of the government. That is not the entire story. Obviously, as deficits continue the public debt will increase. Also, we are confronted with interest rates that are much higher than they were 5 or 10 years ago. So, as the debt matures, debt that was incurred at 8 or 9 per cent is rolled over at 12 or 13 per cent, and maybe even more.

The second difficulty with budgetary deficits of this size is the possibility of crowding out private investment. The government has to raise money to cover its deficit of $14 billion, and it has to go into the market like anybody else and pay high interest rates. That makes it more difficult and more expensive for the private sector to raise money.

The third area of concern is, of course, that such deficits can make it very difficult for the Bank of Canada to exercise monetary restraint. That has not happened up to now, but if the deficits continue to grow, then there will come a time when it will likely happen.

The question then arises: Obviously we should reduce the deficit but how do we do it? There are two ways of doing it. One is to cut spending, but it is interesting to note that 51.4 per cent of federal government spending is in the form of subsidies and transfer payments to persons and governments. As I said, 17.7 per cent is in the form of public debt charges and 8.7 per cent is spent on national defence. That is a total of 77.8 per cent of the budget over which the government has limited control. I am not saying they cannot cut their expenditures in these areas, but it is difficult. I am not sure what programs or transfer payments or subsidies to the provinces or to persons any member of this chamber would like to cut. I am not sure how much of our defence effort any member of this chamber would like to cut. Certainly the amount that goes to public debt charges will in normal circumstances go up and not down. So I am not very optimistic about being able to cut spending.

The other side of the equation, of course, is that we could raise taxes. Well, I suppose one thing we could do is end the indexing of personal income tax, and we could also end the indexing of the transfer payments to the provinces. That, I admit, is a possibility. It is a tough political decision to make, but it is a decision that could be made. If you talk about increasing other taxes in Canada, when you look at the tax rates we are paying now, I question seriously whether it is politically feasible and, indeed, whether it makes good economic sense.

It seems to me that we have to find some other area to cover that deficit. And there is one area that presents itself now that I do not think we can afford to overlook, and that is the area of petroleum. World petroleum prices have gone to what can only be described as fantastic levels. But those levels are not related to supply and demand; they are related to the actions of a cartel that finds itself in a very preferred position at this time. In addition, there is no country in the world where all of the money that is being spent on petroleum is being returned to those who would explore for new petroleum. What you find is that the bulk of the price paid for petroleum products is going to governments in the form of taxes. So we have a particular situation at this time where it is possible to discuss in a rational way the division of revenue from petroleum and where they should accrue.

At the present time in Canada they accrue very largely—and I am talking now of prior to the October 28 budget—to the provinces. The Province of Alberta prior to the budget got 45 per cent of the revenues, the oil companies got 45 per cent and the federal government got 10 per cent. I believe that we in Canada ought to have a price that encourages conservation, but also encourages the development of Canadian industry. I believe that the oil companies and those who invest in the petroleum industry should have a return that encourages them to discover new sources of petroleum and which will bring us to self-sufficiency in Canada. Those two points are your limits on either side, but there is an area in between.

In the latest budget the federal government moved to take a greater part of that area, but because they could not take it from Alberta, they took it from the oil companies. I think that is a mistake. But the federal government really could not do anything else, because they could not get any more revenues from the Province of Alberta. The federal government was only getting 10 per cent of the revenues, and that 10 per cent was reduced by the very large amount of incentives they were paying to the oil companies to encourage development. So it seems to me that one matter that must be settled is that there must be a fairer division between the provinces and the federal government of petroleum revenues. And to buttress my point, I think I am correct in saying that in almost every other country in the world, the United States included, the federal authority has a much greater share of the petroleum resources than does Canada.

I know the argument that has been postulated by the Government of Alberta has been that "We have a non-renewable resource that one day will be exhausted and therefore we have to get our money out of it now." It is pretty hard to buy that, when you start listening to the estimates of the amount of petroleum reserves that there are to be found in the tar sands, I think we can look at a time-frame that is much longer, and there has to be a fairer distribution between the revenues that flow to Alberta and those that flow to the federal government.

There is one last area of concern that attracted the attention of your committee, and that is the reduction predicted in the growth potential of the Canadian economy over the next few years. That potential is based on the growth of the labour force, investment in productive machinery and the improvement in our productivity. We are particularly concerned with the question of the growth of the labour force. Due to lower increases in our population, it is predicted that we will have lower growth in our labour force. That, of course, will have a major effect on our growth potential.

It is true that we could cure that by immigration. We have done that in the past. But we are running into a difficulty. At the present time our unemployment rate is 7.3 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis. The problem we have is that, politically, we think of full employment in terms of 3 to 4 per cent unemployment, and when we get to 7 per cent we come to the conclusion that something must be done to lower that rate.

The difficulty we have is that we have arrived at a situation in Canada where unemployment rates of 6 per cent to 7 per cent are normal, but politically we have failed to accept that.

That natural rate of 6 to 7 per cent unemployment is due to the fact that we have failed to train our people for the jobs that are available; we have not had sufficient development in certain regions, with the consequence that we have high regional unemployment rates; and, perhaps most important of all, our eligibility rules under unemployment insurance are just too generous.

That generosity may be something we as a nation are prepared to pay for, but the fact of the matter is that, when we take those three elements, it is incorrect for us to say that the natural rate of unemployment can be 3 to 4 per cent. We must admit that it is probably much closer to 6 to 7 per cent.

The danger of that is that, if we will not admit it, we are put under political pressure, and when we are put under political pressure we attempt through demand policies to lower that rate down to the mythical and politically acceptable 3 per cent or 4 per cent, and the result is that we heat up the economy and we have greater inflation. The other problem with the idea that we can have a 3 to 4 per cent unemployment rate is that we refuse to have any immigration so long as we have 6 to 7 per cent of the people out of work. That is a problem that really has not had much discussion, but it is one we will have to grapple with because it is not so much an economic problem as it is a political problem. It is a problem that says one of two things: either we must accept that the natural rate of unemployment is about 6 to 7 per cent and that we cannot attack it with demand policies, or we must conclude that we will have to look at our training, at our regional development and, most especially, at our eligibility rules under unemployment insurance in order to bring that rate down to a more reasonable level.

Honourable senators, I will not deal with the whole report, and I am sure you will be delighted with that. As I said at the beginning, I gather that tomorrow we will have before us Bill C-47, the supply bill on these estimates. I understand that Senator Doody will now follow me and I hope we can wrap this up this afternoon.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have just one question to put to Senator Everett. Perhaps I misunderstood the way he was using the words "a more reasonable level."

Senator Everett, I believe you were saying at the end that we would have to deal with demand policies in such a way as to bring unemployment down to a more reasonable level, whereas, if I understood correctly what you were saying, "reasonable" would mean "politically acceptable" in the context that you had used that expression earlier.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, if I used "demand policies" in that context, I should have used "supply policies." What I was saying was that we either have to accept politically that the natural rate of employment is 6 to 7 per cent or if we are not prepared to do that but want to bring it down to the 3 to 4 per cent level that politicians can in their minds accept, them we must not try to do that by demand policies, because all we do is create an inflationary environment. We must do it by supply policies, and the supply policies that I was suggesting were: better training to fit people for the jobs that will be available in the future; better regional development so that we do not have these egregious rates of unemployment in certain areas of the country; and, most especially, an overhaul of the eligibility rules in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have just one question for Senator Everett. I regret not having heard all of the senator's remarks, but just as I entered the chamber he was speaking on the point maintained by the producing provinces with respect to oil, namely, that they are dealing with a limited resource that will be gone in a few years. He expressed the view that his committee had found it difficult to accept that, because the tar sands production could go on indefinitely into the future.

Was the distinction ever made before the committee, Senator Everett, between conventional oil and tar sands oil? Conventional oil, the supply of which is diminishing, has a large surplus in it because it costs less to raise out of the ground than the price it brings in the marketplace, so that there is money there to put aside to develop a different form of industrialization for future generations in the province once the oil is gone. The production of tar sands oil is more like a manufacturing process in which the cost of the process is equivalent to what you get for the oil, so that there is not that bulge that you have in the normal wasting resource. Was that distinction made before the committee?

Senator Everett: I cannot recall whether it was made, but it is an excellent point. I am not certain, however, that the division of revenues that I spoke of does not apply both to conventional oil and to residual oil and also to tar sands.

Senator van Roggen: I was not arguing the point of the division of revenues, but only the point with respect to the price being paid for conventional oil.

Senator Everett: Well, it seems to me that you can deal with two elements: one is the profitability, which is the difference between the cost and the eventual sale price, and that is very much in favour of conventional oil; the other is the division of revenues, which is more on the price itself and does not relate to the original cost. Nonetheless, your point is well taken.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I hesitate to rise at this late hour, but I assure you that I will not take long. I feel that I should comment for just five or six minutes on the subject before us and on the work of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. It is a committee in which I have taken great interest since coming to the Senate, and I wish to congratulate Senator Everett and his staff on their conduct of its affairs. It has done remarkable work. I should also like to comment on one or two of the items Senator Everett mentioned this afternoon.

With respect to the budget, or the estimates themselves, it would appear that the most striking part of that imposing document, quite apart from the huge amount of money involved—it is approximately $60 billion now, including the supplementaries—is the amount of money that must be allocated to servicing the national debt. It must certainly cause all of us to pause, to think that something close to 18 per cent of the budgetary allocations is dedicated to servicing the debt. As Senator Everett pointed out, it will probably be closer to 20 per cent if the inflationary aspect of the economy keeps climbing. The impact of this amount of money and the servicing of the needs of the citizenry must be a huge one by now, and it certainly must hamper the manoeuvrability of government to a very large extent.

It would seem to me that the most immediate and pressing task before any government—the previous one and this one—is to find a way of reducing the amount of borrowings and subsequently the amount of money that has to be dedicated to servicing that debt. We simply cannot let it climb forever and ever. I suppose the ultimate and logical extension of that 20 per cent figure would be an increasingly larger amount until there is literally no money left to service the needs of the public.

Right now we are spending something like 32 per cent of the budgetary outlay on the health and welfare of our citizens. That seems to be an inordinately large amount of our wealth for government to distribute for the health and welfare of the people. One would think that perhaps the time has now come, in our majority, for part of that burden to be assumed directly by the public itself; but, as has been suggested, this is perhaps a political decision that we are not prepared to make at this time. But we shall have to make it some time, because the end is rapidly approaching.

We look at the inflationary factor, and consider it to be the major problem that we are facing. The Minister of Finance has said so, and I believe he is absolutely right. Unless we can come to terms with inflation, we are going to be a victim of that cycle. Round and round it goes, and we never catch up.

We have to chase the United States interest rates to a certain degree—perhaps to the full degree—but it does seem unfortunate that the Governor of the Bank of Canada has to take full responsibility for the fight against inflation. Surely there must be some other weapons that the economic advisers to government can bring to bear that could somehow ease that inflationary burden. The automatic adjustment of Canadian interest rates to those of the United States does not really cope with the problem. A few years ago we tried the so-called stimulatory deficit, and that resulted in—excuse the expression—a short-term gain. But we very rapidly paid for it. In a matter of years inflation was completely out of control.

So that deficit is far too large and it has to be dealt with. It cannot be dealt with by the methods being used now. There has been almost literally no attack on the debt of the Government of Canada in its current budget, except to apply part of the responsibility for the reduction of that debt to the resource-rich provinces of our Confederation. It has been suggested by Senator Everett, and indeed by many people, that the time has come for the petroleum producing provinces to allocate a larger proportion of their revenue to, in effect, reduce the deficit of the Government of Canada. That may be oversimplistic, but it is, in effect, what is happening right now, and it does not seem to me to be a particularly fair way of approaching a national problem.

The fact that the Hibernia oil field off the east coast looms larger and larger in the immediate future has coloured my thoughts on resource ownership and management to a certain degree, but nevertheless I feel that there is a legitimate argument that could be made on behalf of the Government of Alberta, their defence of their natural resources and the revenue therefrom, and I feel that we should give them a fair hearing. There is, indeed, as has been pointed out, a large difference in the price of that old oil and the revenue to be derived from the manufacture of new oil.

I have one other point to make before I conclude. It concerns the unemployment factor that Senator Everett mentioned. Although I find myself in agreement with many of the things that the honourable senator has said in the past, I cannot, in all conscience, share his willingness to accept a 6 or 7 per cent rate of unemployment as being a natural phenomenon and one that we in Canada should learn to live with. That figure is really not what it appears to be. When one talks of a 6 or 7 per cent rate of unemployment in Canada, one is talking of perhaps a 70 per cent rate of unemployment in some of the northern and native areas, and a 60 per cent rate of unemployment now in the St. Alban's and Hermitage Bay areas in Newfoundland. By the time that 6 or 7 per cent rate gets stretched to the extremes of the country, the social impact is a huge one. It is not a political problem at all. The acceptance of a 6 or 7 per cent rate of unemployment in Canada is not a political problem; it is a real economic problem, and one only has to spend a short time in some of those areas to feel the frustration, despair and lack of hope on the part of those people who are anxious to participate in the growth of this country.

I do not mean to infer that Senator Everett is not sympathetic but it worries me to feel that people in this country can justify and feel reasonable about those unemployment figures. Job training is certainly part of the answer, but it is not the only answer. If one goes to the various regions of Canada, the needs, experiences, background and future are very different and have to be approached differently.

That brings me to my final comment. Once again it is a note of commendation of the National Finance Committee and its chairman for taking us down this new avenue of examining regional disparities in Canada. Hopefully we can come up with something positive in terms of the unemployment figures, rather than just an acceptance of them as a natural phenomenon.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words in reply to the honourable senator.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable senator closing the debate?

Senator Everett: I assume that no one else wishes to enter the debate so I will be closing the debate. I should like to say to Senator Doody that I hope that I did not convey any feeling on my part that I was unmindful of the ravages of unemployment. What I am trying to say—and it is due to my lack of articulation—is that it is impossible, in my judgment, to bring the unemployment rate much below 6 per cent by demand policies without exacerbating inflation.

It has been the policy of successive governments and central banks to try to lower those rates to politically, and perhaps socially, acceptable rates by demand policies. I am arguing that you cannot do it. I am not arguing that we should accept the 6 or 7 per cent rate. What I am saying is that we should use the right policies to correct the problem. Those policies are: better training for the jobs that will become available; regional development so that we do not have the kind of unemployment rates that exist in the outports of Newfoundland; and better eligibility rules for unemployment insurance, so that we use unemployment insurance in the way it was meant to be used, namely, as insurance for people who suffer unavoidable unemployment.

With unemployment insurance in this country, however, we permit people to work part of the year, then draw unemployment insurance for another part of the year, and then go back to work and do the same thing all over again. My contention was that unemployment insurance was never designed to do that.

I do not think there is much of an argument between us, Senator Doody, but I did want to make the point that I am not quite as callous as my rhetoric might have made me seem.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular

1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;

2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;

3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;

4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and

5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intended to go on with my comments on this inquiry, but since two committees are waiting for the Senate to rise in order to get to work on some fairly pressing business, and since it is ten minutes to five and those committees will want to work for at least an hour, I think I would be better advised to stand this inquiry.

Order stands.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator Lamontagne:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on 26th November, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as mentioned yesterday, we hope to have Senator Lamontagne proceed with his speech on this inquiry tomorrow, possibly before the Question Period so that the members of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution can hear his speech—if the Senate decides tomorrow that that is the course of action that should be adopted.

Hon. Lowell Murray: On that point, honourable senators, we have come to this kind of accommodation in the past, and, as the Deputy Leader of the Government will recall, certain problems arose at those times.

I would just like to make the point that if we are going to postpone Question Period until later in order to hear Senator Lamontagne, arrangements should be made for the ministers to be present during the Question Period.

Senator Frith: I agree.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

JOB SECURITY AGREEMENT OF JUNE 29, 1976

Early Retirement Allowance

8.10 An employee whose position is abolished due to a technological, operational or organizational change or who is displaced by a senior employee, such displacement being brought about directly by and at the time of the implementation of a technological, operational or organizational change will, if he is eligible and elects to receive an early retirement pension with an actuarial cutback, be entitled to receive:

(a) an allowance of $60. per month commencing in the month immediately following the last month in which the employee received wages and continuing each month until the date at which he would have been eligible for the pension without a cutback. The maximum period for which the employee will be eligible for the allowance is five years; or

(b) a lump sum payment calculated as follows:

Age At Retirement	Lump Sum Equivalent of the Total Value of Monthly Allowances he could have Received under this Provision
55	75% up to 60 months entitlement
56	80% up to 48 months entitlement
57	85% up to 36 months entitlement
58	90% up to 24 months entitlement
59	95% up to 12 months entitlement

An employee who elects benefits under Article 8.10 will not be entitled to any other benefits provided elsewhere in this Agreement.

The early retirement allowance will cease upon the death of the employee.

SPECIAL AGREEMENT OF NOVEMBER 14, 1980
ARTICLE E—SEPARATION PLAN

E.1 An adversely affected employee who is eligible for early retirement under the CN pension plans and;

(a) is sixty years of age or over;

(b) is fifty-five years of age or over, and

(i) would be laid-off at his home location; or

(ii) would be required to relocate in order to hold employment; or

(iii) by electing for a separation allowance, would allow another employee in his seniority group at that location with two or more years of service to hold a regular permanent assignment;

(c) is one year or less away from eligibility for early retirement under the CN Pension Rules, and who meets one of the conditions set out in sub-paragraph (i) or (ii) of sub-paragraph (b) above, shall be entitled subject to the conditions specified in Appendix A to elect to take early retirement and receive a separation allowance as hereinafter provided.

NOTE: The total number of employees entitled to elect early retirement with the benefits of this agreement are limited to the number of positions being reduced.

E.2 Subject to the provisions of E.8 herein, an employee defined in Article E.1 (a) and (b) above shall receive a monthly separation allowance until the age of 65 which, when added to his company pension, will give him an amount equal to a percentage of his average annual earnings over his best five-year period, as defined under the 1959 pension rules, in accordance with the following formula:

Years of Service at Time Employee Elects Retirement	Percentage Amount as Defined Above
35 & over	80
34	78
33	76
32	74
31	72
30	70
29	68
28	66
27	64
26	62
25 or less	60

E.3 An employee defined in Article E.1 (c) above:

(a) shall receive the lay-off benefits provided in Article "F" of this Special Agreement until he becomes eligible for early retirement; and

(b) thereafter shall receive a monthly separation allowance in accordance with Article E.2 above.

E.4 A separation allowance shall cease upon the death of the employee who dies before reaching the age of 65.

E.5 An employee entitled to the separation allowance hereinabove set out may elect to receive in its stead a lump sum payment equal to the present value of his monthly separation payments calculated on the basis of a discount rate of ten (10) per centum per annum.

E.6 An employee who received the separation allowance under this Article and is between the ages of 55 and 59 shall be entitled to have his group life insurance coverage continued until age 60 and paid for by the company.

E.7 An employee aged 60 or over who receives a separation allowance in accordance with this Article, shall be entitled to a life insurance policy, fully paid up by the Company, in an amount equal to that in effect in existing collective agreements.

E.8 In the application of Article E.2 above, an eligible employee, who is not a member of the 1959 Pension Plan or who became a member of the 1959 Plan as a result of the re-opening of that Plan in 1978, will receive the monthly separation allowance or the lump sum payment calculated on the assumption that such employee did belong to the 1959 Pension Plan, throughout the employee's career. Such employee will receive the payments due in accordance with Article E.2 or E.5 minus any pension payments which would have been due had the employee been a member of the 1959 Pension Plan.

Appendix "A" to Special Agreement Displacement Rights

In the application of Article E.1 of this Special Agreement, when the Brotherhood receives notice that positions are abolished within a function, e.g. Express, Marine, Transportation, Engineering, Equipment, Intermodal, Purchases and Material Management, Accounting, etc., it is agreed that a potential retirement opportunity will be created for each such position abolished. It is also understood that:

(a) for each potential retirement opportunity, an employee aged 60 and over and eligible to retire, may in seniority order within the function at the affected location elect for a separation allowance;

(b) if after the application of Clause (a) above, potential retirement opportunities are still available, employees who qualify under Article E.1(b) or (c), may in seniority order within the function at the affected location, elect for a separation allowance; and

(c) if after the application of Clause (b) above, potential retirement opportunities are still available, the employees displaced from the function may exercise their seniority and carry with them to the function and location to which they are exercising, a potential retirement opportunity (separation allowance) which can be exercised by an employee qualified under Article E.1.

Example of the Above Intent

—11 positions reduced in Express in Halifax

—There are 3 employees working in Express in Halifax with less than 2 years service

—4 senior Express employees elect retirement as outlined in clause (a) above

—3 employees with less than 2 years service are laid-off

—2 Express employees elect retirement as outlined in clause (b) above

—Two potential retirement opportunities remain. The two junior Express employees displaced exercise into Transportation where one employee has less than 2 years of service

—One Transportation employee with less than 2 years of service is laid-off

—One Transportation employee elects retirement as outlined in clause (c) above.

APPENDIX "B"

(See p. 1420)

JOB SECURITY AGREEMENT OF JUNE 29, 1976
ARTICLE 7—RELOCATION EXPENSES

Eligibility

7.1 To be eligible for relocation expenses an employee:

(a) must have been laid-off or displaced, under conditions where such lay-off or displacement is likely to be of a permanent nature, with the result that no work is available at his home location and, in order to hold other work on the Railway, such employee is required to relocate; or

(b) must be engaged in work which has been transferred to a new location and the employee moves at the instance of the Company; or

(c) must be affected by a notice which has been issued under Article 8 of this Agreement and he chooses to relocate as a result of receiving an appointment on a bulletined permanent vacancy which at the time is not subject to notice of abolishment under Article 8 of this Agreement and such relocation takes place in advance of the date of the change, provided this will not result in additional moves being made.

7.2 In addition to fulfilling at least one of the conditions set forth above, the employee:

(a) must have three years' cumulative compensated service as defined in Clause 9 of Appendix "C"; and

(b) must be a householder, i.e. one who owns or occupies unfurnished living accommodation. This requirement does not apply to Article 7.5, 7.6, 7.7 and 7.10; and

(c) must establish that it is impractical for him to commute to the new location by means other than privately-owned automobile.

Relocation Benefits

7.3 Payment of door-to-door moving expenses for the eligible employee's household goods and his automobile including packing and unpacking, insurance and up to one month's storage; the mode of transportation to be determined by the Company.

7.4 An allowance of up to $300 for incidental expenses actually incurred as a result of relocation.

7.5 Reasonable transportation expenses from his former location to his new location by rail, or if authorized, by bus or employee-owned automobile, and up to $75 for a single employee, up to $125 for an employee and spouse or dependent, and up to $175 for an employee and two dependents, one of whom may be his spouse and that an additional amount up to $35 will be paid for each additional dependent for meals and temporary living accommodation. Receipts will be required for rail or bus transportation.

7.6 Upon authorization, an employee may drive his automobile to his new location at an allowance of fifteen cents per mile.

7.7 Up to three working days' leave without loss of basic pay.

7.8 (a) Except as otherwise provided in Article 7.8 (c), reimbursement of up to $3,000 for loss sustained on the sale of a relocating employee's private home which he occupied as year-round residence. Loss sustained is determined at the outset plus any real estate agent and legal fees, and the amount established as the selling price in the deed of sale.

(b) The procedure to be followed in respect of determining the loss, if any, on the sale of a home shall be as described in Appendix "D" to this Agreement.

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 7.8 (a):

(i) Should a change take place involving relocation of Railway employees whereby the number of homes being listed for sale by such Railway employees represent 15 per cent or more of the residential homes in the municipality, the employees required to relocate shall be reimbursed for the full loss on such homes, which loss shall be determined by the procedures described in Appendix "D" to this Agreement. The number of Railway employees' homes referred to above shall, for the purpose of establishing the 15 per cent, include the homes of all Railway employees that are being offered for sale as a result of and at the time of the change; or

(ii) should a change occur involving relocation of Railway employees covered by this Agreement as well as Railway employees covered by other collective agreements, the maximum amount of $3,000 specified in Article 7.8(a) shall be adjusted upward to equal the maximum amount paid account loss on sale of home to any employee covered by such other collective agreement.

(d) An eligible employee who desires to sell his house and receive any benefit to which he may be entitled under Article 7.8 must advise the Company's officer concerned accordingly within twelve months of the date the initial change takes place. No employee shall be entitled to any claim under Article 7.8 if the house is not listed for sale within sixty days of the date of the final determination of value and thereafter the house continues to be listed for sale. Any claim for reimbursement under Article 7.8 must be made within twelve months of the final determination of value.

Note: Notwithstanding other provisions of Article 7.8 special cases of loss on sale of homes may be submitted to the Administrative Committee for adjudication, but such special cases shall not be subject to arbitration.

7.9 If an employee who is eligible for moving expenses does not wish to move his household to his new location he may opt for a monthly allowance of $50 which will be payable for a maximum of twelve months from the date of transfer to his new location. Should an employee elect to transfer to other locations during such twelve-month period following the date of transfer, he shall continue to receive the $50 monthly allowance referred to above but subject to the aforesaid twelve-month limitation. An employee who elects to move his household effects to a new location during the twelve-month period following the date of his initial transfer will only be eligible for relocation expenses under the Article for one such move and payment of the $50, monthly allowance referred to above shall terminate as of the date of his relocation.

7.10 Alternatively to Article 7.8, the cost of terminating unexpired lease and legal costs connected therewith up to a value of three months' rent where the relocating employee was renting a dwelling, except that where such lease was entered into following the notice of the change without prior approval of Company, no benefit will be provided. Such prior approval will not be unreasonably withheld. Should the law require payment of more than three months' rent in order to terminate a lease, such additional amount will be paid out of the Fund providing the employee first secures the Company approval to pay in excess of three months' rent.

SPECIAL AGREEMENT OF NOVEMBER 14, 1980
ARTICLE C—RELOCATION

Eligibility

An affected employee who is a householder, i.e. one who owns or occupies unfurnished living accommodation and who is required to relocate in order to hold work with the Railway due to:

(i) the filling of a position that is likely to be of a permanent nature; or

(ii) his work being transferred to a new location, will be eligible for relocation expenses provided that he establishes that it is impractical for him to commute daily to the new location by means other than privately owned automobile.

NOTE: An affected employee who is not a householder (one who does not own or rent unfurnished living accommodation) will be entitled to the relocation benefits contained in Article C.3, C.4, C.5 and C.6 only.

Benefits

C.1 Payment of door-to-door moving expenses for the eligible employee's household goods and his automobile including packing and unpacking, insurance and up to one month's storage; the mode of transportation to be determined by the Company.

C.2 An allowance of up to $400 for incidental expenses actually incurred as a result of relocation.

C.3 Reasonable transportation expenses from his former location to his new location by rail, or if authorized, by bus or employee-owned automobile, and up to $100 for an employee without dependents, up to $150 for an employee and one dependent, and up to $200 for an employee and two dependents and that an additional amount of $35 will be paid for each additional dependent for meals and temporary living accommodation. Receipts will be required for rail or bus transportation.

C.4 Upon authorization, an employee may drive his automobile to his new location at an allowance of 24 cents per mile. (14.9¢ per km)

C.5 In order to seek accommodation in his new location and/or to move to his new location, an employee will be allowed a continuous period of leave up to one week (seven consecutive calendar days). Payment for such leave shall not exceed one week's pay at his regular weekly rate. For other than weekly rated employees, 5 basic days' or 40 hours' straight-time pay shall constitute one week's pay.

C.6 If an employee who is eligible for moving expenses does not wish to move his household to his new location he may opt for a monthly travel expenses of $85 which will be payable for a maximum of twelve months from the date of transfer to his new location. Should an employee elect to transfer to other locations during such twelve-month period following the date of transfer, he shall continue to receive the $85 monthly travel expenses referred to above but subject to the aforesaid 12-month limitation. An employee who elects to move his household effects to a new location during the twelve-month period following the date of his initial transfer will only be eligible for relocation expenses under the Article for one such move and payment of the $85 monthly travel expenses referred to above shall terminate as of the date of this relocation.

C.7 If an employee who is required to relocate to hold employment does not wish to move his household to his new work location, he may, at the time of the change, opt for a lump sum payment. Such lump sum payment shall be mutually agreed upon by the parties and will be no less than the value of all contractual parties and will be no less than the value of all contractual relocation benefits other than those provided for in Articles C.6, C.8 and C.9. The lump sum payment shall be paid to the employee, so long as he remains at the new location, in equal quarterly installments over the 12-month period following the lump sum payment being agreed upon. If the employee returns to his former location during such 12-month period and remains, payment(s) shall be discontinued.

C.8 (i) Reimbursement for full loss sustained on the sale of a relocating employee's private home which he occupied as a year-round residence. Loss sustained is determined as the difference between the value determined at the outset plus any real estate agent and legal fees, including those legal fees and, if applicable, the land transfer tax established by the city or municipality on purchase of a home at the new location, and the amount established as the selling price in the deed of sale.

(ii) The procedure to be followed in respect of determining the loss, if any, on the sale of a home shall be as described in Appendix "B" to this Agreement.

(iii) An eligible employee who desires to sell his house and receive any benefit to which he may be entitled under Article C.8 must advise the Company officer concerned accordingly within twelve months of the date the initial change takes place. No employee shall be entitled to any claim under Article C.8 if the house is not listed for sale within sixty days of the date of the final determination of value and thereafter the house continues to be listed for sale. Any claim for reimbursement under Article C.8 must be made within twelve months of the final determination of value.

C.9 Alternatively to Article C.8, the cost of terminating an unexpired lease and legal costs connected therewith up to a value of three months' rent where the relocating employee was renting a dwelling, will be paid. Should the law require payment of more than three months' rent in order to terminate a lease, such additional amount will be paid providing the employee first secures the Company's approval to pay in excess of three months' rent.

Appendix "B"
Appraisal Procedure

When an affected employee desires to sell his home, under the provisions of Article C.8(b) of this Agreement, of which this Appendix "B" forms part, the following procedure will apply:

(a) In advising the Company officer concerned of this desire to sell his house, the employee shall include pertinent particulars as outlined in sample form attached, including his opinion as to the fair market value of his house.

(b) This fair market price of the house shall be the price determined as of a date sufficiently prior to the date of the change in order that the fair value will be unaffected thereby.

(c) Within 15 working days for date of receipt of employee's advice of his desire to make a claim, the Company officer shall advise the employee concerned whether the suggested fair market value is satisfactory and, if so, such price shall be the fair market value as contemplated by Article C.8(a) of this Agreement.

(d) If, however, the officer concerned is not satisfied that the price requested by the employee is the fair market value, then an effort shall be made to resolve the matter through joint conference of the officer and employee concerned and the appropriate Union representative if so desired by the employee; such joint conference to be held within 5 working days from date of advice to employee concerned as referred to in Clause (c) of this Appendix "B".

(e) If such joint conference does not resolve the matter, then within 5 days from the date of the final joint conference arrangements shall be made for an impartial appraisal to be undertaken as soon as possible by an independent real estate appraiser. The fair market price established by such appraiser shall become the fair market value for the purpose of this Agreement, and such price shall be binding on both parties.

(f) The employee will pick the independent appraiser referred to in Clause (e) from the following national companies: Canada Permanent Trust; Montreal Trust; Royal Trust; Trust Général du Canada; A.E. Lepage.

(g) The residence shall not have been listed for sale with any appraiser appointed pursuant to the provision of this Appendix "B", nor with such appraiser's employee, fellow employee or partner.

(h) The fees and expenses of any appraiser appointed in accordance with Clause (e) or (f) shall be paid by the Company.

Note: In the event an employee desires to sell his home at a price which is less than the fair market value as determined by the provisions of this Appendix "B", the Company will be given the right in priority to everyone else to purchase the home.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 11, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

December 11, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 11th day of December, at 5.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,

Ottawa.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1980-81

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending 31st March, 1981.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1980-81

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-49, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending 31st March, 1981.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I may not object, but I will draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government the fact that we have not received copies of these bills yet. I quite understand that it is required on his side to take such matters on faith, but such is not the case on this side.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is correct. Bill C-49 was just given that number when it was dealt with in the House of Commons last evening. I have a copy with "Bill

C-49" written in. I will try to get copies for honourable senators.

I can say that the bill is in what is called the "regular form." In the case of supply bills, as you know, the estimates have been referred to committee, the report has been made, and then they are put into the standard form of a bill. Subject to that assurance, I shall try to get copies in time for consideration.

Senator Flynn: Then let us say we will grant leave when copies of the bill have been distributed. The deputy leader can request leave then.

● (1405)

Senator Frith: I think that is reasonable.

Senator Walker: I would hope so.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. We have been informed that His Excellency the Governor General will be here at 5 o'clock for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills. What bills will receive royal assent? I am unaware of any that have been passed and are ready to receive royal assent.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the hope is that we will—

Senator Flynn: The hope?

Senator Frith: Hope, yes.

Senator Perrault: Hope springs eternal.

Senator Frith: I always try to take nothing for granted.

Senator Flynn: You should try not to take us for granted.

Senator Frith: I thought I had notified my honourable friends that we would be asking for leave to deal with Bill C-47 and Bill C-49 in the hope that supply could receive royal assent. Those are the only bills I am aware of that we will be dealing with this afternoon in order that they may be given third reading.

Senator Flynn: On previous occasions I have congratulated the government on the expedition with which they arranged for royal assent, because right after a bill was read the third time and passed the Speaker would rise and read the communication from Government House. But now we have the communication being read even before third reading is given.

Senator Benidickson: It has always been a matter of curiosity to me as to why we have royal assent almost always on a Thursday afternoon, and at a time after many senators have departed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I also expect that we will have Bill S-13 and Bill S-14. If I can be excused I will go and try to get copies of Bill C-49.

Senator Roblin: You are excused.

[Senator Frith.]

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Act, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 49 of the said Act, Chapter C-23, R.S.C., 1970.

PRIVATE BILLS

GENERAL SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—BILL TO AMEND AND REPEAL AN ACT TO INCORPORATE—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Comittee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 11, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill S-18, intituled: "An Act to amend and repeal An Act to incorporate General Security Insurance Company of Canada", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, December 9, 1980, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. Barrow
Deputy Chairman

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I rise on a question of privilege. We are not yet on reports of committees. I suppose it is a trend indicated by the deputy leader. We are doing things ahead of time today.

Senator Hicks: Nova Scotians are always ahead of time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

● (1410)

PRESIDENT OF THE LETHBRIDGE STAKE OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 11, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill S-16, intituled: "An Act respecting the President of the Lethbridge Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, December 2, 1980, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

Richard A. Donahoe
Deputy Chairman

THIRD READING

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, the 16th of December, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think, honourable senators, that now would be as good a time as any for the Leader of the Government to tell us about the business for next week.

[English]

• (1415)

Senator Frith: Yes, I agree, honourable senators. I regret to say that I probably will not have the firm information I hoped to have until sometime later this afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

RULES AND ORDERS

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator McElman be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He was there last week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Senator Flynn: Before the question is put, I would like to say that I was at the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders this week and Senator McElman was present and voted. I don't know why he did so if he was not a member. Is my honourable friend trying to correct, retroactively, what was done?

Senator Frith: No, honourable senators. He certainly was present and participated, but I do not believe he voted. He was sitting next to me, and the whip and I pointed out to him that he was entitled to participate fully but not to vote because he was not a member. I believe that is correct.

Senator Perrault: We are meticulous about that type of thing.

Senator McElman: If the question is: Did I vote on a committee of which I was not a member, the answer is, no, I did not.

Senator Flynn: The question related to whether you voted at the last committee meeting. I know you participated in the debate and expressed your views, and it seems to me that you raised your hand.

Senator Cook: No.

Senator Flynn: Senator Cook says "No", so I accept that to be the case.

Senator Cook: I was hoping he was going to vote with me, but he did not.

Senator McElman: Senator Flynn, I have never yet had to have my word corroborated by anybody. I would suggest that your hands were flying so much you saw hands in front of you everywhere you looked.

Senator Flynn: There is no doubt that I always see many hands on the other side.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA ANNUAL REVIEW—RATE OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF DOMESTIC OIL—NATIONAL ENERGY POLICY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday when a question was addressed to him respecting the Seventeenth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, he begged off from commenting or replying to the question on the ground that the review was so freshly released he had not had a chance to peruse it.

It is now 24 hours later, and it is inconceivable to me that he has not been occupying himself during the intervening hours by perusing a document of that import and significance. Today I ask him if he agrees with the assertion of the Annual Review that the current energy policy is a barrier to effective conservation, expanded supplies, diminished reliance on foreign sources and efficient use of labour, capital, materials and energy.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No.

Senator Donahoe: It is a perfectly proper answer. It is a much better answer than we are accustomed to receiving. It tells us nothing but it does not pretend to tell us anything.

I have a supplementary question which, perhaps, will meet a better fate. In proposing oil price increases almost twice as high as those proposed by this government, even higher than the ones introduced by the previous government, the Economic Council of Canada has said:

● (1420)

> The price to consumers must rise in the interests of conservation and efficient use. The price to producers must rise if Canada is to expand its energy supplies and become less dependent on risky foreign sources—

In other words, the Economic Council of Canada—and this is only my opinion—has vindicated the position being taken by the producing provinces. Is the government intending to adjust upwards its offer on price to the producing provinces in order to reflect more accurately world realities, as described by the Economic Council?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it must be taken into account that the government has offered a significantly higher price for several classes of additional supplies that can be brought on. That fact, however, was not addressed or even referred to in the question as it was put.

The other part of the answer is that the budget proposals came forward in the absence of an agreement with the producing provinces, but they carried with them the undertaking that we were prepared to negotiate a total package with the provinces and that it was highly desirable for that agreement to come into being.

Senator Donahoe: I have a further supplementary question. In the same report the Economic Council drew a direct correlation between employment and economic growth and substantially higher energy prices, implying that, should current energy policies remain unchanged, hundreds of thousands of jobs, most of them in central Canada, would be jeopardized.

Does the minister acknowledge this direct connection between the government's economic goals and the success of energy development projects? If so, is action contemplated which would put these projects back on the tracks to the benefit of all Canadians?

Before you answer that, I might just say that that question is, in essence, quite similar to a question I asked the other day but to which, in answering it, the minister went off at a tangent, speaking about something I thought was not at all responsive to my question. This time I hope he will direct his mind to the question.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in many respects the concerns expressed by the Economic Council in its review, which by the by was largely prepared prior to the budget, were in fact addressed in the budget itself and in the National Energy Program. However, to become more specific with regard to the unemployment levels my honourable friend has referred to, in the year 1981, for example, the council's pre-budget base case with respect to unemployment levels was 8.0, while in the council's post-budget base case it changes from 8.0 to 8.2.

I suggest that when my honourable friend asked his question the other day he was not aware of the close similarity of those two positions.

Senator Donahoe: Can the honourable minister tell us whether the total working force was at the same level, when those two calculations to which he has referred were made?

Senator Olson: I can only repeat what I have already said: with respect to the unemployment rate—the percentage level, that is—the council's pre-budget base case was 8.0, and that has now moved to 8.2. I assume they used the same basis on which to make those calculations.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED—CANCELLATION OF JUDY CREEK PROJECT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I notice that Imperial Oil has announced its cancellation of the $400 million Judy Creek Project. Along the same lines of thought as the questions dealing with the Economic Council of Canada, I would suggest that if the council's report was prepared prior to the budget, certainly this decision was made subsequent to the budget and it all amounts to the same thing: fewer jobs for Canada and Canadians during the coming year. This just adds to the deferment and cancellation of various other projects.

Has the government given any thought to reassuring the business community with respect to the economic climate? Is the government contemplating changes in the budget or in the energy policy which would permit job opportunities for Canadians to develop during the coming year?

● (1425)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, at the present time the government is not considering any amendments to the budget and energy proposals other than those that were given at the time and have been repeated since.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for the honesty of his reply. It is not very encouraging to the many people who are out of work.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

THE BUDGET—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, on Tuesday I asked the Minister of State for Economic Development a question regarding the Western Development Fund and its relevance to the Economic Development Committee's envelope. I was told that it was in addition to that envelope.

Subsequently I have had a chance to look at the budget document, and at page 32 it says, with regard to the Economic Development envelope:

> The envelope also includes spending from the Western Development Fund, which was established to cover initiatives in such areas as the western grain handling and transportation . . . Prairie water developments.

It goes on to give a breakdown. This document, which was tabled at the time of the budget speech, would seem to indicate that the Western Development Fund was part of the Economic Development envelope, and now I understand it is in addition to the Economic Development envelope. Which of the two statements is accurate?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I did not hear anything in that quotation from the budget that is inconsistent with the reply I gave yesterday.

TRANSPORT

TASK FORCE TO REVIEW TRANSPORTATION OF GRAIN IN WESTERN CANADA—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I address a few questions to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board with respect to the Crow rate? He and I share an abiding interest in the future of that particular policy. I refer him to a statement made by the Minister of Transport with respect to the task force that is going to be set up to once again review the state of affairs with respect to the transportation of grain in western Canada.

I suppose my question could invite the minister to tell me how many studies have been made on this subject within the last 10 years, and what good came of them all; but I will not put him to that trouble. I will ask him, however, what will be the terms of reference of this task force, whether there will be public hearings in respect of them, and whether this will have anything to do with the proposal that he and his seatmate have been advocating so enthusiastically with respect to a study of the Canadian Pacific Railway situation and its relevance to the Crow rate.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I do not think that I have anything further to report to the honourable senator beyond the statements I have made previously in reply to his questions. Discussions continue to proceed about the method by which the government at some time may look at the Crow rate. I read the text of Mr. Pepin's speech that he made to the Saskatchewan Wheat Board a couple of weeks ago, in which I believe he referred to a task force. So far as I know, although discussions are continuing, no decision has yet been made on whether there will be a task force; and since that decision has not been made, it would be impossible to say when such a task force, if it is put in place, would begin functioning.

I am not saying that there will not be a task force, or that there will be. I am just saying that the decision has not yet been made.

Senator Roblin: I could remind my honourable friend that at the same meeting in which the task force was discussed by Mr. Pepin, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, the Minister of Agriculture, said that the policy on the Crow would be ready before the beginning of the next fiscal year. Can my honourable friend reconcile or clarify those two positions by the two different ministers?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I read in the Regina Leader Post the report of the statement that Mr. Whelan was alleged to have made. Since that time, in a private conversation with him—I will not try to be specific because I am not certain that I remember his specific relationship to that story—he too felt that it was not fully accurate. Therefore I have to remain with the statement that I made about the task force. I believe that what I have said is accurate. There may be other ministers who would interpret differently what is going on, but I feel that the statement that I made a few moments ago is correct.

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: Well, I gather from that that the government does not really know what it is going to do yet with respect to the Crow, and I presumed that the minister, if pressed, would promise that they will at some stage get their act together and let us know which course they are going to follow.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND—COMPENSATION TO RAILWAYS FOR LOSSES ON GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): While the honourable minister is giving some thought to what I have just asked, may I ask him to clarify for us a statement made by the Minister of Transport with regard to Mr. Pepin's plan to use money from the $4 billion Western Development Fund to help pay the railway for losses on grain shipments? Is that statement a correct reflection of government policy? Is it a misreporting of his statement? Or is he just launching another one of those trial balloons that seem to be so much in vogue in this matter?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am not able to say whether it is a misstatement or not, and I am not able to say whether Mr. Pepin's statement has been misrepresented or not. Certainly I am not going to talk about launching a trial balloon. I really have to say, however, that no definitive decisions have been made about how that Western Development Fund will be spent, nor as to what portion may be paid towards transportation costs. Therefore, I am not able to say, because I do not know, how it might relate to any action that could be forthcoming with regard to the Crow rate.

The general principle that I believe we are trying to follow with regard to the expenditure of that money is that in whatever way it is spent it should provide for western Canada benefits that are in addition to what one might normally have expected to be provided had no such fund been talked about.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend care to speculate on the source of the money for that $4 billion fund? Who is putting it up?

Senator Argue: Well, I suppose it will come out of the consolidated general revenue, though I am not able to say that; but I believe it is a very important initiative. I believe the results will be of major importance to western Canada. I believe that announcements will be made in due course of measures that will be specific additions to anything that has been contemplated to date, so I feel that it is a very real thing. I am not going to speculate, however, about particular matters. All I can say is that these things are still being discussed. I believe substantial progress is being made in those discussions, and there will be some definite and welcome statements before very long.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND—PROJECTS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to the Western Development Fund, I wonder if I could have an undertaking from the Honourable Leader of the Government that he will provide the Senate very shortly with a list of all the projects that have been mentioned for possible inclusion under that Western Development Fund. In particular I would like to ask him again whether the $30 million to $50 million—I think that is now the figure—that he has committed on behalf of the government to the Province of British Columbia in connection with the rapid transit project is going to come from the Western Development Fund.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as far as the rapid transit showpiece project on the west coast is concerned, the final decisions have not been made. Negotiations are only in the initial stages, and so it is impossible to provide a definitive statement on that subject at the present time.

As far as other western initiatives are concerned, in due time public information will be provided about the program. I think it will excite the imagination even of the opposition.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PURCHASE OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEM

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on the matter of the rapid transit system, the minister is quoted as saying that the money would come either from the Western Development Fund or from the $550 million energy allocation fund for British Columbia. I referred to that statement by the minister the other day.

Will the minister say what the $550 million energy allocation fund for British Columbia is? Because I would like to know where I could find that in the National Energy Program as outlined in the budget.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, much has been said about the $550 million energy fund for British Columbia. In fact, all Canadian provinces are going to benefit from this vigorous new initiative, the object of which is to make ourselves energy self-sufficient over a period of time. I would be glad to send the information to the honourable senator.

[Senator Argue.]

The program is designed to enable Canadians in British Columbia and elsewhere in this country to more adequately cope with the rising costs of energy. Funds will be provided for such programs as the conversion of heating units from oil to other fuel forms. In certain areas where there is no alternative to natural gas, aid will be provided for the conversion to other types of fuel, and in some areas a special program will be available to assist people to make their homes more heat efficient. There are many other aspects to this program.

There is also a program to facilitate the conversion of automotive fleets to liquid propane. The program is designed to, in effect, enable Canadians to use fuel and energy sources as efficiently as possible, in view of the fact that inevitably the price of energy is going to escalate throughout the years.

That is not, of course, a partisan view. The previous government also recognized the challenge which exists in the energy area.

Senator Murray: The $550 million is not, therefore, $550 million that is intended exclusively for British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: No. The $550 million amount is designated for British Columbia, with hundreds of millions for the other provinces as well. A significant portion of this national energy fund will be channelled into projects which are going to help conserve fossil fuels. No final decisions have been taken yet as far as British Columbia's rapid transit project is concerned, but rapid transit projects in other parts of the country are on the drawing board or in the planning stage, including one in Ontario, I think in the Hamilton area. Projects of this kind, insofar as they are energy efficient, could come under the heading of energy saving projects, and therefore there could be some claim on the national energy fund.

FINANCE

INTEREST—INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for Economic Development. Within the past hour the Bank of Canada lending rate has been announced. It has increased by 1.38 per cent to, I take it, a near record 16.14 per cent.

Is the government proposing any action at all to insulate those who are most affected and, frankly, most hurt by these escalating rates, namely, small businesses?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the answer is that of course the government is extremely concerned. The exact amount that the Bank of Canada would increase its rates, of course, was not known until an hour or so ago, but it was fairly evident yesterday, when the rate in the United States went up to a point, I think, equal to its all-time high, that for the defence—if that is the right word—of the Canadian dollar, and of course, with the object of removing the temptation to have an exodus of capital, the rates in Canada would go up significantly following what happened yesterday and the day before.

This is not only of concern to Canada, although Canada is probably more immediately and more profoundly affected, because of the volume of our trade and financial transactions with the United States, but it is also a matter of concern to a number of other countries around the world. While there has not been any specific action taken up to now to alleviate the situation to some degree, the Minister of Finance is concerned about it, and is at present considering what action he could take.

• (1440)

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question. I think the prime lending rate in the United States is 20 per cent. With an indication by some authorities that that is not the end of that spiral, I wonder whether the minister could share with us any projections the government has as to what the end of that spiral might be—that is, what the anticipated highest rate might be.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the direct answer is that I cannot. We have no projection within the government departments. I agree with Senator Nurgitz when he says that some knowledgeable people have indicated that this rate, even though it is equal to an all-time record, may increase even more, because I also heard that.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

JAMAICA—INVITATION TO FORMER PRIME MINISTER TO APPLY FOR CANADIAN FOREIGN AID FELLOWSHIP

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which is of concern, I suppose, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or to the Prime Minister himself.

This question stems from a report in the Montreal Gazette of today, which states:

> Michael Manley, recently defeated Prime Minister of Jamaica and long time friend of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, has been "invited" to apply for a Canadian foreign aid fellowship worth up to $60,000—

It also indicates that the invitation was made by Ivan Head, President of the IDRC.

My question is: Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister not think that this, assuming it is true, could be interpreted as Canada's taking sides against the new administration in Jamaica, and wouldn't it render more difficult our relations with them, and possibly also create problems for Canadians going there?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can say that the interest which has been demonstrated in that fellowship was at the initiative of Mr. Manley.

Senator Flynn: They say it was Ivan Head.

Senator Perrault: I can only report the information which is known to the government. Mr. Manley on his own initiative, contacted the IDRC, the body of which Mr. Head is president, concerning the fellowship program. Mr. Manley has not yet formally applied for an award, and until he does, no recommendations can be made to the Board of Governors of the IDRC concerning the application.

Should Mr. Manley pursue his application and be granted an award, he has indicated his interest in studying and writing about the new international economic order, of which he has already written and published.

Mr. Manley visited the IDRC centre in Ottawa on November 24 to discuss his lively interest in the program. As is normal in these circumstances, IDRC was responsible for his air fare. On a point of information, $60,000 represents the maximum amount of an award, and includes such items as travel and research expenses, secretarial help, and so forth.

I want to emphasize that he has not formally applied for an award and until he does, no recommendation can be made to the Board of Governors of the IDRC.

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary question. With regard to the new economic order Mr. Manley is interested in looking at, is it the same new economic order that the Prime Minister was speaking of some years ago, which he has forgotten about now?

Senator Perrault: If the Leader of the Opposition is interested in Mr. Manley's views on what the new economic order should be—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Perrault: Let me complete my reply. I know that courtesy can be extended. The honourable senator should enter into correspondence with Mr. Manley and obtain from Mr. Manley a list of his works and essays. I think they would provide far more edification for him than directing a question to the Leader of the Government does.

Senator Flynn: In any event, would the Leader of the Government convey to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs the problems that may arise with such a decision by the IDRC?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition today will be given careful attention by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

POLAND—MASSING OF RUSSIAN TROOPS ON BORDERS—PRIME MINISTER'S MESSAGE TO PRESIDENT BREZHNEV

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, yesterday the Leader of the Government and I had a brief exchange concerning the position of the Government of Canada with regard to any possible Soviet military action in Poland. I had asked for assurances from the minister that the government would view any such action more seriously than it had in 1968 when Soviet troops invaded Czechoslovakia and when, as I said yesterday, the Honourable Mitchell Sharp had stated that the invasion was regrettable.

The Leader of the Government challenged my recollection of those events and invited me to document my assertion, which I wish now to do.

I have looked up the record, and indeed, if I made a mistake yesterday it was in stating that Mr. Sharp had described the invasion of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union as "regrettable." "Regrettable" was not the word he used. The word he used was "disappointing." To give him credit, he said "very disappointing."

My source is the publication Canadian Annual Review, 1968, which I believe is published under the authority of one or other of the government departments. The quotation attributed to Mr. Sharp is as follows:

> "There's little that we can do or little that we need fear concerning any outbreak of hostilities," the Minister said on the evening of 20 August.

That was the date of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. The paragraph continues:

> The movement of Soviet troops was "very disappointing and there's bound to be a great setback to the growing confidence in Europe and progress toward an East-West détente."

So, I think the statement I have just quoted does, indeed, document the assertion that I made yesterday.

To make the record complete, I will admit that the next day, after the cabinet had met formally, they redeemed that rather equivocal reaction by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and, after a telephone conversation between Mr. Sharp and the Prime Minister, who was holidaying in Spain, approved a statement that they later communicated to the Soviet Ambassador which described the Soviet action as a flagrant breach of the principle of non-intervention, and so forth.

I was certainly correct in my recollection of the rather soft and equivocal action by the government spokesman, the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, on the day of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia.

This is the third time in recent weeks that the minister has had occasion to challenge the accuracy of assertions made by members of this side of the house in putting questions. He did so with regard to some newspaper reports I quoted which reported statements made by several of his colleagues on constitutional matters. The other day he did the same thing when Senator Smith referred to statements made by the Prime Minister in his weekly press conference.

Having now documented the assertion I made yesterday, I simply wish to make the point that I hope that, with the Christmas season approaching, the minister will take a firm resolution to reform and to agree that when we on this side of the house make assertions they are always made in good faith, and almost invariably made with some documentation to back them up.

[Senator Murray.]

• (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): And completely against the rules in question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You don't know what you are talking about.

Senator Olson: Yes, I do.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we listen with interest day after day as Senator Murray takes uncommon delight in ferreting through the murky and tattered files of the past—

Senator Murray: Tattered is right.

Senator Flynn: How do you call it?

Senator Perrault: —and attempts to locate some obscure phrase which somehow is supposed to suggest this government was less than forthcoming when freedom was under challenge in some past affair. I wonder if Senator Murray would like to be reminded of the fact that in one of the great speeches of all time, made many years ago in Parliament, one of the more Neanderthal members of his party stated that the introduction of the old age pension was the first manifestation of Red Bolshevism in Canada—which is not at all consistent with the present day views of the Progressive Conservative Party on social policy. In quoting phrases of that kind, which are irrelevant to today's priorities and needs, do we really avail ourselves of very much?

Senator Olson: We just waste our time.

Senator Perrault: It is time-wasting and time-consuming. Mr. Sharp is not in Parliament today and, therefore, he is not in a position to defend himself. Anyone who is aware of his record as Secretary of State for External Affairs knows he was an uncompromising opponent of tyranny in all of its forms. I think it is unfair to attack him when he is not here to defend himself. I can only tell you the position of the government with respect to the Polish situation—the latest information that we have—which I think is relevant.

Senator Flynn: For once try to be relevant.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition again is writhing in his place terrified of the facts.

Senator Flynn: No! Bored by your words.

Senator Perrault: The information available to us does not indicate that there has been any dramatic deterioration in the military situation on Poland's borders. Although Soviet forces in the adjacent districts have been brought up to full strength, there is no evidence that they have been redeployed to the border or that a decision to intervene has been taken. I know that Senator Murray will rejoice at that news.

The Warsaw Pact's summit meeting, while reflecting high level concern among Poland's allies, does not provide a clear indication of the nature of the so-called "fraternal support" they are prepared to extend to Poland, nor their intentions vis-à-vis the Polish situation. We are pleased to note the participants committed themselves to renouncing the use or threat of force in relations between states, and to resolving all conflicts through negotiations. In other words, the Warsaw Pact states have pledged to follow the same precepts in their external relations that the Polish government has committed itself to follow domestically.

Canada has consistently expressed itself in favour of a peaceful political solution to the Polish situation. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made this point in his conversation with the Polish Foreign Minister in September. We remain of the view that the situation in Poland is an internal conflict for the Poles themselves to resolve, and that it is incumbent on all CSCE signatory states to fully respect the principle of non-interference in the affairs of other states, as embodied in the Helsinki Final Act.

Furthermore, honourable senators, when the question was asked in the other place the other day by the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, "Well, is not the Prime Minister going to make some representation to the Soviet Ambassador in Ottawa?" the Prime Minister replied, "No, I have already contacted Mr. Brezhnev."

Senator Murray: Did you table that document?

Senator Perrault: That is another example of this government's forthright support of initiatives to keep the peace and maintain freedom around the world.

Senator Murray: What did he say?

Senator Perrault: I think it is rather unparliamentary for the senator to pursue this—

Senator Flynn: Unparliamentary?

Senator Perrault: It is rather unparliamentary for the honourable senator do drag such—

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Perrault: —a shoddy collection of red herrings across the trail.

Senator Murray: I am going to end the debate right away and not take up the time of the Senate unduly with this matter. I have been told in an interjection from the Minister of State for Economic Development that what we have been doing is against the rules. There is no other course open to an honourable senator whose word is challenged but to bring in the documentation that proves his assertion, and that is what I did today. As I reminded honourable senators earlier, this is the third time in recent weeks that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has, without any justification whatsoever, challenged an assertion that was made by an honourable senator on this side in posing a question. I am here to tell him that every time he does it we are going to have to take up the time of the Senate to present the documentation that proves our assertion. It would not be necessary if the Leader of the Government in the Senate and his colleagues would show some elementary good faith and accept that assertions made on this side are made in good faith, and, as we have abundantly proved in the last few days, with plenty of documentation to back them up.

Senator Perrault: There are two short points to be made: First of all, the reference to the invasion of Czechoslovakia was made by the Honourable Senator Murray the other day. Secondly, the challenge, which was issued on this side, was that if we are going to be treated to this continuing recitation of phrases which, allegedly, were made in the past by certain members—

Senator Murray: What do you mean by "allegedly"?

Senator Perrault: —of Liberal governments, then the full statement should perhaps be tabled here so that honourable senators can make their own judgment about the position of those people at the time.

Senator Flynn: That is what we are doing.

Senator Perrault: That was not a full statement at all by any stretch of the imagination.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You are asking for more.

Senator Flynn: That is what we are doing. I might remind the Senate that Senator Murray mentioned "a minister," and the Leader of the Government said, "Name that unknown minister," and Senator Murray said it was Mr. Sharp. The Leader of the Government then complained that the statement was made on an unknown date, so Senator Murray gave the date. The Leader of the Government then said, "Well, bring in the documents." After all, the leader got what he deserved.

Senator Perrault: You have not produced a document at all.

Senator Murray: I have cited pages 240 and 241 of the Canadian Annual Review, 1968, and I can bring in other documentation if the minister wishes.

Senator Perrault: The Canadian Annual Review does not constitute a definitive statement of the position that Mr. Sharp took—

Senator Flynn: He will never be able to say anything in this place.

Senator Perrault: —or of all the words he employed at the time of the Czechoslovakian crisis. The senator is not suggesting that seriously. In any case, is there much value in debating an event that took place so many years ago?

Senator Flynn: That's right, but why did you ask all those questions?

Senator Olson: This is not the period of debate but the Question Period.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Yes, it is the Question Period and the debate.

Senator Flynn: You never understood anything about the debate.

Senator Smith: If the honourable gentleman opposite would also treat it as an answer period, we would avoid these kinds of discussion. What the honourable gentleman opposite is trying to do—and very frequently tries to do—is to avoid answering the question and obscure the allegation. I am not now talking about the Minister of State for Economic Development. I will deal with him separately. I am talking about the Leader of the Government. What he continuously, unashamedly and blatantly does is to try to obscure the purport of the question with a foggy sort of answer or some sort of challenge which bears no relation to the question itself. He tried the same thing with me the day before yesterday. He tries it every day.

Now, to turn to the Minister of State for Economic Development for a moment—

Senator Perrault: Watch out.

Senator Smith: After all, I repeat, that while we recognize this as the Question Period and endeavour to treat it as such, the honourable gentleman opposite does not recognize it as an answer period and does not treat it as such, and we have no recourse, therefore, but to do whatever we can to point this out, and that is exactly what we have been doing.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT'S SHAREHOLDING

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development in relation to his answer yesterday concerning the Canada Development Corporation. He has left a problem there that I solicit his help in solving. I asked him whether the original conditions under which the development fund was set up were still in force, namely, that the government was intending to reduce its stockholding from 49 per cent to 10 per cent, and that the Prime Minister had given an assurance that the government would not interfere with the operations of that organization. On that basis, I suggest, a good many people bought stock in that company. It is quoted on the stock market and it goes up and down, and the public have an interest in it.

When the minister replies to me—and I am sure this is not done with any intention of creating an uncertainty—he does so by saying he cannot tell me whether the government policy is changed or not because the whole matter is under review. A minute's reflection might indicate this might have implications for the value of the stock on the stock market until the atmosphere clears and the investing public can decide what they are going to do.

I do not know what the stock market authorities would do in this case, but I am saying to the minister that it might be helpful if he could clarify his statement in some way to indicate to holders of that stock that they have nothing to fear and that the government will make sure that their investment is not depreciated on account of its actions.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator is asking me to give an assurance that there will never ever be any change in the government's investment, which is still rather significant—I think it is nearly 50 per cent—in the CDC. I gave him what I consider to be a straightforward answer. If he is going to be concerned about this kind of thing, I think perhaps it is an indication of how we should answer some of the other questions that are put to us, and most of them in the last few days have been in the category of: "What is under consideration . . . ?"

I said, quite frankly, that the CDC is included as part of this review, and if he wants me to refrain from giving any indication of what the government is considering, then I can do that, but that would eliminate about 90 per cent of the questions that come from the opposition.

Senator Roblin: I hope I am not being quite so unreasonable as the minister suggests. I am not suggesting to him that the government should never change its policies, and I am not suggesting to him that we are dealing with speculation, because these questions arise from statements made by the ministers themselves. We did not invent the idea of fiddling with the CDC. That is a government statement.

This company's stock is traded in the market, and I only suggested to the minister that he ought to take cognizance of that fact in his statement, and that he ought to come forward with some formulation of the government's position that would make it clear to the stockholders that they are not hanging in there in a position of limbo, because this company can be manipulated by the government any way it sees fit, and that has an effect on the value of the stock. I am simply saying that the people who have invested in the Canada Development Corporation in good faith deserve some consideration. I do not want him to take any position that is frozen for all time. That is unreasonable. I am not making up rumours myself; I am drawing to his attention what his colleagues have said, and I think it is reasonable that he should take those facts into consideration.

Senator Olson: We will take those facts into consideration, but it seems to me that what my honourable friend is asking is, in fact, counter-productive to his objective, which is to leave some stability as to the value of the investment that private citizens and others have in this corporation. He really ought not to ask now for further speculation as to what might happen because it seems to me that the best thing that could happen in the interest of those other investors is for the government to say absolutely nothing until it has made a decision, and then announce it.

Senator Roblin: The point is that these things arise because of statements that members of the government have made. It is up to them to clarify the position. If they do not want situations to become difficult, then they should be careful about what they say. But my honourable friend is simply refusing to clarify the position or accept the responsibility that it is he and his colleagues who created the uncertainty in the first place.

Senator Olson: I think that the honourable senator is trying to create a lot of uncertainty simply because the government owns that portion of the stock, and they acknowledge that they are considering some more effective use of it. Surely, when a decision has been made, then an announcement should be made, and if I were to take my honourable friend's advice in the meantime we should make no comment at all to that kind of a question.

GRAIN

RAIL TRANSPORTATION IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I think all Canadians have been very pleased with some of the announcements regarding major wheat sales, but a continuing problem is the delivery. Westerners in particular are concerned about some of these aspects. I wonder if the minister could tell us if there is any change in the situation, particularly with regard to the labour problems in the Revelstoke area which have been of concern to western farmers.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I think there are indications that there will be a very major improvement in the performance of the railroads, particularly the CPR, in moving grain from southern Alberta and southern Saskatchewan. The situation to which the honourable senator referred really began back in March of this year. A labour dispute arose and there was a slow-down of rail deliveries through Revelstoke, and this situation resulted in unloads at Vancouver in some weeks going down to as low as 700 cars. The effect on the farmers in those areas was that at the end of the crop year they had a very large surplus of wheat on hand and they were unable to deliver it.

The Canadian Wheat Board provided supplementary and extra permits going into the new crop year, and I think that in the main these have been filled and deliveries have been made. However, in this area a very low quota still remains. The A quota is still in effect—a quota of just some three bushels per acre. But, as I have said, there is an indication of a definite improvement. The labour situation was referred to the Labour Relations Board in late October, and the ruling was that the slowdown was, in fact, a strike and was therefore illegal.

The improvements that have taken place since that time show that from November 17 to November 22, unloads at Vancouver amounted to 1,065 cars. For the next week, November 24 to November 29, unloads increased to 1,120 cars. However, there was a reduction because of bad weather in the mountains and heavy snowfalls in the week of December 1 to December 6, and the number of unloads went down to 865 cars. The encouraging fact is that in the first two weeks the number of unloads had gone up to approximately 1,100 cars per week, and the CPR is now sufficiently optimistic that they are targeting unloads beginning in January at the rate of 1,500 per week. I can only express the hope that the labour situation and the railroad performance, will, in fact, make the achievement of this important target possible.

I am now hopeful that the differences that have resulted in this slowdown may be discussed and settled, and settled in such a manner that the 1,500 target for car unloads at Vancouver will be met. If this target can be achieved, it will mean that there will be about 1,500 CPR unloads per week at Vancouver, and for the west coast an equivalent amount of CNR car unloads. We have an opportunity this year for maximum sales of grain. The sales are there. In spite of a disastrous early start this year, the crop yield exceeds that of last year by some considerable amount, so that the grain is available, and if the railways can perform, then the producers of grain will be able to meet our sales objectives. This railway dispute has been most difficult. Improvements have been made and I hope the target, the optimistic target, will in fact be reached.

Senator Flynn: A very good speech.

Senator Argue: You can't win in this place.

• (1510)

Senator Frith: Could I ask the minister if the word "unload" has the same meaning as the word "delivery"?

Senator Argue: It may not have been clear from what I said, but when the farmer brings a load of grain into the elevator and unloads it, that is called a "delivery". An "unload" is the emptying of the hopper car or the box car at the terminal.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1980-81

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

He said: Honourable senators, I should start by explaining why my comments concerning this bill will be brief. The bill represents an authorization by Parliament—which, of course, cannot take place without our approval—of the expenditure of very large sums of money. For the introduction to be brief, and for the debate itself to be brief, an explanation is required.

The bill before us today, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1980-81, provides for the release of the balance of the main estimates for 1980-81 totalling $20.3 billion.

These estimates were tabled in the Senate on April 23, 1980, and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on April 29.

Appropriation Act No. 1, 1980-81, which was approved last May, provided interim supply to cover expenditures to the end of December.

Honourable senators will remember that these estimates received very careful and detailed consideration by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and the main estimates were discussed with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials by that committee on November 18, and were reported back by the committee on December 4 of this year.

Honourable senators will recall that last evening Senator Everett spoke to that report and discussed some of the policy questions raised. Senator Doody made an intervention with some observations on the same subject.

What that means, honourable senators, if I understand the position, is that the estimates themselves were presented to the Senate, referred to committee, studied by the committee, reported back and some of the policy issues raised were discussed and debated. To that extent the bill before us is a formality. I do not say a "mere" formality, but it does finally formalize the work the Senate has already done on the estimates which are the subject of the bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have had the opportunity of discussing with the Deputy Leader of the Government passage of this bill on second and third readings. He explained why there is no need for the Senate to extend proceedings. Naturally, our Standing Committee on National Finance examined the budget, and its report was debated in the Senate. Senator Doody expressed our views. In any event, the main estimates, the object of Bill C-47, is the budget that had been prepared by the former administration.

We did, I feel, what the Senate should have done under the circumstances. The bill itself, as its sponsor pointed out, is a bill in its usual form. There is nothing else in that bill other than the granting of public funds and the balance expected for the financial year ending on March 31, 1981. We, therefore, have no objection to the bill being given third reading immediately after it has been read and passed a second time.

As for Bill C-49, which we had the good fortune of receiving just a few minutes ago, I have had a chance to look at it, and I believe we can proceed with it in much the same way.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[English]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: With leave, honourable senators, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1980-81

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-49, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Opposition had anticipated, Bill C-49 is also in the usual form. However, I would like to provide a few details. The bill introduced today contains all the votes included in supplementary estimates B. It is essentially in the same form as the estimates which were tabled in the Senate a month ago on November 6, and which were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. The committee examined the estimates with Treasury Board representatives on November 19, 1980. These supplementary estimates represent $2,001,096,000, of which $1,027 million represent expenditures to be voted and $1,069 million represent statutory votes.

The major items are as follows: $400 million representing additional oil compensation payments to refiners and to other importers of crude oil and oil products. This comes about because of the announcement early during the fiscal year of a major increase in OPEC prices.

Senator Flynn: The first one.

Senator Frith: The first item is for $400 million. There are also amounts of $113 million to CHMC for the extension of the Canadian Home Insulation Program from September to the end of the fiscal year, and $206 million for the Guaranteed Income Supplement Program, mostly because of the increase of benefits to $35 a month per household beginning on July 1, 1980.

These estimates include 27 $1 items which have already been examined by the Senate Committee on National Finance when it considered the supplementary estimates.

I hope that I have given the major points contained in this bill. If honourable senators would like further clarification, I shall do my best to provide it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe we should thank Senator Frith for his explanations. What concerned me when I saw that passage of this bill was to be moved this afternoon, was that the report of the Committee on National Finance, which is given in Hansard for December 4 on page 1377, does not refer specifically to the supplementary estimates.

We have already considered the main estimates, which amount to $59,013 million, and with this figure of $1,027 million, we reach a figure of over $60 billion for the general estimates. I note especially that the supplementary estimates include oil price compensation payments amounting to $400 million to refiners. Obviously, this is closely related to the energy and pricing policies of the governmernt. I recognize that this may not be the best time to discuss this consequence of the policy implemented by the government as the order paper calls for a debate on this issue. There is also a motion in the name of Senator Murray to refer this whole matter to a committee.

In any event, we are faced with a fait accompli, an irreversible situation. For that reason, I do not think it would serve any purpose to discuss this item, albeit very important, especially in view of the subsidy for the current year.

The bill is therefore similar to the other, in the standard form. It appropriates funds. It therefore poses no problem of interpretation. For that reason and in view of the explanation given by the sponsor of the bill, I see no objection to passing the bill now on second reading, with third reading to follow shortly.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, simply to emphasize the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition, it seems to me that political issues, if I may say so, and the question of opportunity that I spoke of are not dealt with separately in the report. That is especially so with respect to the $400 million, and I intend to deal with that directly during the next debate on the issue. In other words, even if we pass this bill, we can still continue to deal with the political aspects of the energy policy.

Senator Denis: Fine.

Motion agreed to, and bill read second time

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[Translation]

Senator Frith: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Davey, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, intituled: "An Act respecting The Royal Canadian Legion".—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Godfrey had to leave in order to attend a meeting of a committee of which he is the joint chairman. He asked me to request that this order be allowed to stand.

Order stands.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-10, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I would just point out that, according to the understanding the Leader of the Opposition and I reached yesterday, depending upon what might arise from the motion for the adoption of the report we could proceed directly to third reading of the bill.

Senator Barrow, the Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, has had to leave the chamber. He said that any questions concerning the committee's report would be answered by our colleague, Senator McIlraith. The sponsor of the bill, Senator Stanbury, is also present to answer questions.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular

1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;

2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;

3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;

4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and

5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had not expected that we would reach this inquiry so early. I am ready to proceed, but I have left my notes in my office. Therefore, I could be persuaded to ask that this order stand.

Senator Flynn: We agree.

Order stands.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lowell Murray, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, December 10, 1980, moved:

> That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., presently on the Orders of the Day, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

He said: Honourable senators, during the debate on Senator Argue's inquiry last week, I believe I spoke for one hour and five minutes. I assure you that my remarks today will be much more brief. I hope also to be a good deal less controversial than I was in the debate on Senator Argue's inquiry.

Basically, the subject-matter of that inquiry is the National Energy Program introduced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Honourable senators are aware, of course, that that program is being challenged by the producing provinces. Indeed, if I am not mistaken, there is a court challenge relating to part of it. It certainly is being contested by the industry, in terms of whether the program will achieve the objective of self-sufficiency, and it is also being contested by the official opposition both here and in the other place in what we believe to be the national interest. We have disputed, and continue to dispute, some of the assumptions on which that program is based. However, where there is no dispute is on the vital importance of the energy issue now and in the months and years just ahead.

I had occasion the other day to cite some of the statistics that have been produced by the International Energy Agency and others concerning world shortages that are bound to occur. I had occasion also to discuss some of the assertions made in Mr. Lalonde's program concerning possible supply and demand scenarios in the energy field, particularly in respect of oil, in Canada in the next decade. There is no disputing also the vital importance of energy as an engine of economic growth for Canada in the years ahead. Finally, there is no disputing the political and economic importance of this issue.

The program put forward by Mr. Lalonde, and, therefore, the subject matter of Senator Argue's inquiry, deals with the question of Canadian self-sufficiency and Canadian ownership. Those are sufficiently important matters for us to consider in some detail. While we are having a debate on Senator Argue's inquiry, it seemed to us, on this side, that it would be an excellent idea to have a committee of the Senate examine the policy as a whole. We also thought, and continue to think, that such a committee would provide a forum for some of the people from the industry, the producing provinces, and others interested in energy policy, to make their points at this stage and to be examined by honourable senators on the validity of their assumptions and assertions.

The committee could, in addition to examining the policy as put forward by Mr. Lalonde, also have a continuing watch on the policy as it develops and is implemented by this government, and on our progress as a nation toward the attainment of the objectives that I think all of us share, in particular the objective of self-sufficiency for Canada.

I mentioned the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in particular in my motion because the rules of the Senate provide that that committee concern itself, among other things, with natural resources and mines. However, if it is the desire of honourable senators to have another committee or, indeed, a subcommittee of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee deal with energy policy, that would be perfectly acceptable so far as we are concerned.

With those few remarks on the desirability of having a committee undertake an examination of the National Energy Program, and keeping a continuing watch on the policy and its implementation, I commend this motion to my colleagues for their support.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I propose to move adjournment of the debate on this motion. I do not wish to predict what I shall say later, but I believe I can safely commit myself to the statement that I think this is a good idea. We may want to look into the question raised by Senator Murray as to what is the most suitable committee and what are the modalities; but the concept of giving the Senate an opportunity, through a committee, to examine this policy, and to bring before it people who might have views to express by way of criticism, defence or just general observation, is, I believe, a good one. Perhaps I may be permitted to comment on the motion during my intervention on the inquiry dealing with the same subject.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving adjournment of the house during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell, there are two points that I should like to make. The first is that Senator Flynn asked me what bills we were going to deal with. Having elicited from me the answer that we were going to deal with supply, he stated his surprise—which I consider quite justified—when we announced we were expecting the attendance of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General on bills that had not yet even received third reading.

I should explain that the reason why we arranged that in advance was because we hoped, in any event, to have two private bills assented to. The point raised by Senator Flynn was well taken, and I do not believe it is a good practice to announce that royal assent is to be given to a bill before we have agreed to the third reading of that bill.

My second point is that I am sorry to say that I do not yet have information respecting the Christmas recess. I expect, however, that the House of Commons will adjourn next week. Whether it does or not, I have some tentative assurances that we will receive, at the most, two bills from them before Christmas. For that reason, I have moved that we adjourn until Tuesday evening.

• (1540)

I hope that we can complete our work by Wednesday, I say that for a couple of reasons. First of all, I do not know whether those two bills are so uncontroversial that we shall be able to pass them quickly, and perhaps arrange royal assent for something else, although I cannot imagine what that would be. If they are controversial, they will require referral to committee, in any event.

Secondly, I understand that there is a threat of an Air Canada strike next Thursday. I think we—and I take the liberty of including the Leader of the Opposition—should make every effort to finish our business by Wednesday of next week, so that honourable senators will escape not only the general difficulty that exists with respect to reservations at this time of year, but also the exacerbation thereof as, of course, will be the case if there is a strike. I am sorry my information is not firmer, but my intentions are—

Senator Flynn: Pure?

Senator Frith: —are pure, and also very firm. Perhaps, again, "hopes" would be a better word.

Senator Flynn: My information is that it is more likely that we will not receive any legislation from the other place. In any event, I agree with the outlook that the deputy leader has just described.

I understand that we are going to adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at 5 o'clock; but it seems to me that senators should be warned that if the other place passes the two private bills it may be later than 5 o'clock.

Senator Frith: I thought they had done so already.

Senator Flynn: They cannot deal with them before 5 o'clock.

Senator Frith: I think they have passed those two bills, though.

Senator Flynn: Unless they have followed a very extraordinary procedure, they would consider them only at 5 o'clock.

Senator Frith: It depends on which two bills we are speaking of.

Senator Flynn: I am speaking of Bills S-16 and S-18.

Senator Frith: I was speaking of Bills S-13 and S-14. I am sorry; I should have made that clear. As I understand it, the two private bills that we are anticipating will receive royal assent are Bills S-13 and S-14.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, it is important to have those bills passed, because the deadline is December 15.

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking of your own bills?

Senator Leblanc: I am referring to Bills S-13 and S-14.

Senator Flynn: The fact is that the sponsors hope that the other two private bills that we passed this afternoon and sent to the House of Commons, can be dealt with. In any event, I do not think the House of Commons can deal with those four bills before 5 o'clock.

Senator Frith: I think that is right, honourable senators, but there may be royal assent to those other two bills next week. The deadline for the two later bills was next week, but we hope to deal with Bills S-13 and S-14 together with Bills C-47 and C-49 today, and then have royal assent for the other two private bills next week.

Senator Flynn: Very good.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to revive Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd.

An Act to revive Tremus Industries Limited.

The Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bills:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

To which bills I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bills.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 16, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 16, 1980

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HON. JEAN LESAGE, P.C.

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise to pay tribute to a great Canadian, the late Honourable Jean Lesage. Known as the "Father of the Quiet Revolution" in the Province of Quebec, he was a member of the House of Commons from 1945 to 1958. His talents were soon recognized, for in 1953 he became Canada's youngest cabinet minister.

In 1958 Mr. Lesage became leader of the Liberal Party in the Province of Quebec. He served with distinction as premier of that province between 1960 and 1966. During that period of time, Jean Lesage effected major reforms—social, cultural, economic, educational, and agricultural. He was responsible for a great deal of constructive work in Quebec.

Throughout his career he was an outspoken proponent of the maintenance of the linguistic and cultural heritage of Quebec within a united Canada. He did much to reform and improve the educational system in his province. He greatly improved the educational standards.

While Jean Lesage defended Quebec's interests within the Canadian context, wherever he served, federally or provincially, he worked effectively to bring about profound but orderly change. The Honourable Jean Lesage wrote some very important pages in Canadian history.

I recall that when I was Liberal leader in British Columbia he came to western Canada to learn more about the west—its hopes, its aspirations and its problems. I toured British Columbia with him. He showed a truly profound and sympathetic interest in the development of my native province, and he showed great interest in our people. Throughout, he demonstrated his outspoken support for the concept of a united Canada.

One of his last public activities was to head the pro-Canada committee during the Quebec referendum.

[Translation]

To various degrees, we all benefit from his thoughts, deeds and accomplishments. I know that all honourable senators will want to join me in expressing to Madame Lesage and her family our most sincere sympathy in their affliction.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for a great many Canadians and probably most of honourable members of the Senate, Jean Lesage was the Quebec Premier from 1960 to 1966 and the Father of the Quiet Revolution, to quote a cliché from the newspapers. For me too, he was that, but he was also much more.

He was a man whom I came to know quite well a long time ago when he was a young lawyer, even before he began his political career. At the time I was regional counsel for the Wartime Prices and Trade Board in Quebec City. Under instructions from the justice department, I used to transfer over to him cases which were often fairly complex. I remember quite well how very consciencious and careful about details he was, and how he was already showing the hard working disposition which was later to characterize him and which has been often mentioned. Under such circumstances, I became great friends with him and with his younger brother Raymond, who had been my colleague at the university and who died in an unfortunate automobile accident in 1946.

I remember when he was elected member for the Montmagny-L'Islet riding in 1945. After congratulating him, I told him that his being elected was all right with me, but that I wished the Quebec Liberals had given some of our best candidates a break. This occurred only some years later, that is in 1957 and 1958. At that time, with the victory of Mr. Diefenbaker and the election of some 50 Conservative members in the province of Quebec, Jean Lesage accepted an invitation to get involved at the provincial level and later became leader of the Quebec branch of the Liberal party.

When he assumed these new responsibilities, things were not easy. Circumstances would have it that Mr. Sauvé died and that Jean Lesage was available to plan and achieve the so-called Quiet Revolution. He has always denied having been the "Father of the Quiet Revolution". Jean Lesage never used the dogmatic approach. He was a pragmatic. He was eager to serve, and he accepted the situation as it was when he became premier of Quebec. What happened was bound to happen, although it might have happened differently had anyone other than him been involved. Circumstances served him well. He was a man of action. He wanted to succeed. He wanted the good of his fellow citizens. He wanted the good of Quebec. He wanted the good of Canada and he fulfilled his mission well, though he had not chosen it. He accepted it, which is entirely different. I believe he recognized, all to his credit—and he recognized it repeatedly—that the mission he accomplished, he had accepted and not chosen. He performed it well and when time came for him to bow out, he did so with the graciousness that characterized Jean Lesage. He continued to work in other spheres of activity with great success.

Since he gave up politics, I have had many an opportunity to meet him. He was a friend. We got along very well together. However, I must say, very simply, that he is the one who probably put an end to my career in the other place. In 1960, he was elected in the provincial riding that corresponded to mine and as he was premier, that certainly did not help me keep my seat in Quebec South. But that is all in the game and part of the risks of politics. He too had accepted those risks as I had, as well as their consequences. We were always very good friends.

I deeply regret his premature demise. I conveyed to Madame Lesage and the whole family my deepest personal condolences. I should like to add those of the party I have the honour of leading in this house.

[English]

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should just like to join in paying tribute to Jean Lesage. I was a back-bencher in the opposition in the Ontario legislature when Mr. Lesage was Premier of Quebec and I well remember, as a politician, being impressed with his abilities.

Last night I was deeply moved by Senator Tremblay's tribute over the French radio during the emotional and rather dramatic funeral services for this great person.

In my opinion Jean Lesage transcended political partisanship. As indicated by the Leader of the Opposition this evening, Mr. Lesage was a great Canadian who had a pride in his province, a belief in the aspirations of its people and a faith in their ability to achieve those aspirations. In short, he believed in Canada.

I wish to concur in the remarks made so eloquently by Senator Flynn, and I would merely add that we owe a great debt to Jean Lesage who did so much not only for Quebec, as it moved into its own dynamic industrial era, but also for Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I did not have the opportunity to meet very often with Mr. Lesage in the other place, but he was there with me for a short while when I was an M.P. in 1958. I did not know him very personally.

I remember however, that in 1962 when I was both mayor of La Malbaie and a member of Parliament, he announced that he would visit my community. Just before, I had hosted a very close and dear friend of mine, Daniel Johnson, for whom I had given a tremendous reception at city hall. Mr. Lesage asked me if he would get a similar reception if he visited my town as premier. I told him: I will give you the kind of reception worthy of a premier, and of course that is what I did at city hall, with all his friends there.

After the reception he asked me if I could introduce him to the Liberals who would be gathering within half an hour in the parish hall. I said I would introduce him because I was mayor of the entire town, and that it was my duty to introduce him to his party faithful. So I went and I can assure you that there were a great many of his supporters who were very surprised to see me there at a Liberal gathering. I introduced Mr. Lesage by saying that even though I did not share the same political belief I was nevertheless happy to introduce the premier of Quebec who had come to visit "my" people.

He answered by saying that it was not political affiliation that was important but rather that it was being a Quebecer. That being a Quebec representative in Ottawa was more important than being Liberal like him. He made a lenghty speech on Quebec nationalism and on the role that Quebec should play in the Canadian federation. Mr. Lesage's visit has always brought back very good memories for me.

I therefore want to join with my leader and with all those who have spoken thus far to say that Mr. Lesage was a great Quebecer. He was there during the quiet revolution and made considerable changes in our province of Quebec which were pursued afterwards.

I want to express to Madame Lesage and to her family my deepest sympathy on the occasion of his untimely death.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I would like to associate with what my colleagues have said about Jean Lesage. I met him for the first time when he was elected to the federal Parliament. I met him often when he was serving as minister in the cabinet of Louis Saint-Laurent. I remember quite well that, a few days after his election as Quebec Premier, he called me to join with a few others because he wanted certain advice. We met at Montmorency House. Father Lévesque was there; he was in charge.

Senator Asselin: In that case, you were in very bad company!

Senator Goldenberg: A few weeks later, Jean Lesage created the Quebec Economic Advisory Council. He appointed me vice-chairman and I remained in that position during all his administration, and for two years after, under the administration of Daniel Johnson.

During that time, I worked quite a lot with Jean Lesage. I admired him very much. He was a strong man, a good Quebecer, as Senator Asselin has said, but also a good Canadian. As Senator Flynn mentioned and as I learned immediately, he was very pragmatic. I do not recall that Jean Lesage ever described himself as the father of a revolution, whether the quiet revolution or any other. He did much for the province where I was born and where I have always lived. It is therefore with much regret that I express my feelings following his death.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would simply like to join with all those who have paid tribute to the Honourable Jean Lesage.

You will certainly understand that I was too closely involved in everything that went on during this period and even before the administration of Jean Lesage to make any comments here this evening. Perhaps I will have the opportunity to do so later on.

I should point out that Jean Lesage should get a lot of credit for giving a political expression to forces which came about after the war in 1945, to forces of liberation in many areas which had begun to come to light under Paul Sauvé and that the Honourable Mr. Lesage perhaps expressed more strongly because circumstances were the more favourable. He accepted these forces for progress in Quebec. There is no question that his administration marked an important period of our history.

In any case, I do not believe that this is the time to make an analysis of the role of Mr. Lesage in history, and that we should instead pay tribute to a man who, like all politicians, was the product of conditions around him. I believe that everyone, whatever his or her party, should salute this man who was able to understand his era.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of messages, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN MERCHANT SERVICE GUILD—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill S-12, respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

GENERAL SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill S-18, to amend and repeal an act to incorporate General Security Insurance Company of Canada, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENTS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-2, to implement conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and the Republic of Liberia, Canada and the Republic of Austria, Canada and Italy, Canada and the Republic of Korea, Canada and the Socialist Republic of Romania and Canada and the Republic of Indonesia and agreements between Canada and Malaysia, Canada and Jamaica and Canada and Barbados and a convention between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with certain amendments to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

1. Title: Strike out the words "Canada and the Republic of Liberia".

2. Page 2: Delete Clause 4.

3. Page 2: Delete Clause 5.

4. Page 2: Delete Clause 6.

5. Page 9: Strike out line 19 and substitute the following therefor:

"of Spain, Republic of"

6. Page 9: Strike out lines 31 to 35 and substitute the following therefor:

"Schedule I, II, III, IV, V or VI, the Agreement set out in Schedule VII, VIII or IX or the Convention set out in Schedule X as amended by the Protocol set out in Schedule XI, as the case may be, is approved by"

7. Page 11: Strike out line 43 and substitute the following therefor:

"of Spain, Republic of"

8. Schedule II: Delete Schedule II and renumber Schedules III to XII inclusive as Schedules II to XI inclusive.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, essentially these amendments relate to the deletion of one of the countries. With the consent of the sponsor, I move that these amendments be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. The sponsor can explain the amendments at that time and honourable senators can decide whether or not to accept them.

SMALL LOANS ACT—CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, December 16, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-44, intituled: "An Act to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, October 16, 1980, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

George J. McIlraith,
Acting Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, before I put the motion in answer to that question, perhaps I could have the indulgence of the Senate to make a few brief remarks by way of explanation of the report.

In itself this is a simple report of the bill without amendment, but I should, in fairness to the honourable senators serving on the committee, say that during the many weeks the bill was before the committee questions were raised particularly as to the second part.

The first part of the bill deals with the repeal of the Small Loans Act, but the second part deals with an amendment to the Criminal Code which has the effect of making the charging of interest above a certain rate a criminal offence, and sets out at some length certain rules for determining what those interest charges are.

Questions were raised in committee as to this matter. Some were of a technical nature, having to do with what should be included in the term "interest", thereby constituting the offence, and others involved matters of principle.

In order to avoid a delay in reporting the bill so that those questions could be resolved the committee had to assess a consideration, namely, the damage being done by the failure to pass it with the present rate of interest on borrowings being so high that the companies that would ordinarily be lending at rates under the maximum set out in the legislation simply could not lend, so that their credit would not be available to the group of persons who would normally borrow from them.

A rather complex system of reporting was also involved that would have caused a deluge of such reports in the office of the Superintendent of Insurance, since he was required, when the reporting took place, to examine each report of each company.

There was also the prospect of many applications for the licensing of companies that would have caused other problems, all to no end.

For that reason it was thought advisable to report the bill, as the committee has done, but with an undertaking from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister of Justice, that efforts to seek and obtain satisfactory amendments to the Criminal Code clause would be continued by the committee's counsel and the staff of the Department of Justice working together. If found warranted, such amendments would be introduced for examination and action by Parliament in the Criminal Code omnibus amending bill that is anticipated within a year.

• (2030)

I should, in the form of a motion, answer His Honour's question. With leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

If that is not agreeable, there is no objection to its being read the third time at the next sitting.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I suggest that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow.

I am rather disappointed that the committee met this afternoon rather than tomorrow morning. When Senator McIlraith spoke to me this morning, my understanding was that the committee would meet tomorrow and that we would examine the problem raised by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the effect that if we were not to pass the bill at this time it would force many institutions to complete complicated returns. That was the minister's argument for reporting this bill without amendment.

However, at the same time, when the minister spoke to me yesterday afternoon in Quebec, after Mr. Lesage's funeral, we did not discuss the problem raised by some amendments which had been proposed by the committee's counsel and which would have clarified at least the provision created by the new section 305 of the Criminal Code. I did not think about it at that time and said that, in any event, as far as the principles were concerned, if the committee wanted to report the bill, that would be its decision, but I would certainly say it would cause a division in the Senate.

Then, this morning, Senator McIlraith suggested that the committee meet tonight, and I suggested tomorrow morning. Now I come here and find the committee met this afternoon, so I am rather uneasy about the situation, and for this reason I would like to think about it. Therefore, I suggest that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow.

Senator McIlraith: Then, honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SIXTH REPORT STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the sixth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last Friday the Minister of Finance assigned to the United States the responsibility for our high interest rates saying that in the government's view it was not a proper application of monetary policy in the current circumstances. Does the minister and the government actually think that Canadians believe the Liberal assertion that the government is responsible for interest rates declining while maintaining the United States is the culprit in interest rates increasing?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators, I do not think so. My honourable friend will recall the government did not claim credit for the decline in the interest rates when that happened some months ago.

Senator Phillips: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. There has been considerable discussion concerning the possibility of Canada's pursuing an independent course in establishing interest rates. The Prime Minister stated that the formula introduced by the Minister of Finance is precisely that—an independent interest rate policy set by the free market in Canada, and not an economic index of the United States interest rates.

If it is indeed the case that our interest rates are independent of the United States, and if Liberal policies are responsible for interest rates declining last spring, will the government re-apply those policies in order to bring down our exorbitant interest rates?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is either right or wrong, whichever he chooses.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Can he be wrong?

Senator Olson: We have an independent monetary policy in this country. We do not automatically follow what happens in the United States, and the proof in this respect is obvious when you see that interest rates are 3½ to 4 percentage points lower in Canada at the moment.

On the other side of the coin, of course, with the capital markets so interrelated with those of the United States and, indeed, with those of many other countries, unless we want to put up foreign exchange controls and other things that have some undesirable characteristics or ramifications, it is obvious that our interest rates will follow to some extent. However, we do not automatically follow, that is clear, but with the economic and financial factors of our interrelated economies, of course, any country as large as the United States has some influence on our rates.

● (2040)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, we will see on Thursday whether we automatically follow. I have always appreciated the fact that the minister makes every effort to obtain information for the Senate, and I would ask him if he would provide us with a calculation on the estimated negative aspect or taxation loss to the federal government from corporate and income tax revenues as a result of the extremely high interest rates that we have at the present time.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, before I could give an undertaking to do that exercise, which I am sure my honourable friend realizes would be a rather involved prognostication of what might happen, perhaps he would indicate what rate and for how long it persists. If he examines the situation and, indeed, the history, even since this government came in, he will find that in Canada we have managed to avoid some of the extremes that have been experienced in the United States with interest rates going up very rapidly and then going down very rapidly. One of the advantages in Canada has been that those extremes have not been experienced in this country.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I think it is a bit early to try to make those kinds of projections. There would be much public expense, and probably would not be very valuable because the interest rates may be moving up or, indeed, moving down rather significantly if history repeats itself, and some economists expect that to happen within a short space of time. I could not give that kind of undertaking because at the moment it would be like running after a moving target, and if we tried to be precise about that I am sure my honourable friend would criticize us and say that we were wrong.

Senator Phillips: I accept the statement of the honourable minister except in one aspect where he says he would be chasing after a moving target. Certainly interest rates are moving. Unfortunately, they are moving up. In his calculation he could take the interest rate of six months ago, and calculate what it has cost us up to now. I am sure that is no great problem for the honourable minister.

Senator Olson: It may be that some assumptions would have to go into that calculation, and if my honourable friend would not agree with the assumptions then he probably would not agree with the result either.

An Hon. Senator: Get Senator Argue to do it.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary on that interest rate question. There is part of it that is very puzzling. Perhaps the Minister of State for Economic Development could tell us exactly what it is that the government finds wrong with the monetary policies of the United States. Governor Bouey has found fit to denounce them recently, and the Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen, has found fit to denounce them.

Until just a couple of days ago we were told it was absolutely imperative that we follow the monetary policies of the United States; that they were the way out of our inflationary difficulties. Now we find that they are being denounced. Could the minister explain exactly what is wrong with the monetary policies of the United States or what has changed in the past week to make them now anathema when they were so acceptable just a few weeks ago?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, here again the honourable senator prefaces his question with a preamble that I cannot agree with, and that is, that the government said some time ago that the monetary policy, and the cost of money flowing from it, was acceptable, and now it has changed its mind. That is simply, as far as I am concerned, a matter of opinion; it is not a matter of fact. Therefore, I would suggest to him that what is wrong with the policies, not only in the United States but in other places of the world, is that they are too high. That is a fairly simple, straightforward answer, but if we want to participate with our trading partners and have the freedom of capital movement between countries that we have enjoyed—and I am sure my honourable friend would agree that that has some advantages—then, obviously, we are caught up in the whole situation.

Senator Doody: Just a brief supplementary. There seems to be some confusion and, obviously, I am the one who is confused. The honourable minister seems to have the whole thing completely under control although I do not think he has explained it very well.

During his budget speech, the Minister of Finance described the United States policy of controlling the money supply—am I interrupting something?—as being exactly what the Government of Canada needed. I have spoken in the Legislature of Newfoundland, and that is far more difficult than in this house. The Minister of Finance said, "The Bank of Canada will have my continuing support in holding down the rate of monetary expansion", and went on to indicate that when he became Minister of Finance, on May 27, the bank rate was 14 per cent and on October 28 it was 11.83 per cent and that was quite a reduction. He tied that in with the policies of the United States and indicated they were heading in the right direction.

Now the situation seems to have changed and the policies of the United States are no longer acceptable. It seems to me and to most observers that the policies have not changed but the interest rate has. It has increased. Is the only thing wrong now that it is unacceptably high, and is there a level at which we are going to cut it off? Is there going to be some help for those people who are going to be cut off in the process—the small business people and the mortgage holders. Are they going to be helped in any way as we reverse ourselves?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think I can add much to what I said without repeating myself.

Senator Flynn: Repeat it.

Senator Olson: I do not think I have anything to add now. If the honourable senator would like me to refer those questions to the Minister of Finance, I can do so and try to get a more detailed reply to them.

Senator Doody: I think it is vital.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA—SUPERTANKER MANOEUVRABILITY TRIALS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Government Leader in the Senate and it pertains to a naval exercise in the Strait of Juan de Fuca involving the United States Coast Guard and an oil carrier. Does the leader have anything to report to the Senate with respect to this incident?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He didn't know anything about it. I don't know if he has learned about it now. That is what we read in the press the other day.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I hope honourable senators will extend me their usual charity. The media reports that the United States Coast Guard is preparing to conduct supertanker manoeuvring tests in the Strait of Juan de Fuca are accurate. The United States Coast Guard plans to conduct a series of manoeuvring trials with a VLCC—very large crude carrier—during the period from January 12, 1981, to January 31, 1981. The purpose of these trials is to provide a factual assessment of the ability of tugs available within the area to perform specific manoeuvres with a VLCC in case of an accident. The trials are going to be conducted in American waters off Puget Sound. The target involved will be in ballast—that is, it will not be carrying an oil cargo. The trials will include an assessment of the tugs' ability to tow such a ship and their ability to control and stop such a ship.

● (2050)

We are, of course, very interested in the trial results. The United States Coast Guard has informed the Canadian Coast Guard of their intention and has followed U.S. requirements for public notice.

I can inform honourable senators that the Canadian Coast Guard was informed on October 24 last at a local administrative level. The Pacific Pilotage Authority and the National Harbours Board, Port of Vancouver, will be represented at the testing. Manoeuvres are in U.S. waters, apparently in areas of "lots of sea"—that is, an area in excess of 12 miles wide because, as I understand it, it takes a great many miles to stop one of those tankers, so it is rather helpful to have a large navigational test area.

I have received a late report indicating that the testing is being conducted by United States federal authorities in United States waters, and is part of a continuing study by the United States Coast Guard to determine the risks inherent in tanker traffic on Canada's west coast and how to make the passage of tankers through these waters as safe as possible.

The Department of the Environment will follow these tests closely and will act as appropriate to provide the maximum degree of protection for the west coast marine resources.

The Department of the Environment has expressed its concern about environmental risk from existing marine traffic and, in particular, has stressed its opposition to increasing tanker traffic on the west coast.

Over three years ago Washington State enacted legislation limiting tanker size in the Strait of Juan de Fuca and in Puget Sound to 125,000 dwt. The legislation was struck down by the U.S. Supreme Court as ultra vires. The 1977 Marine Mammals Protection Act which places a ban on new or expanded oil ports on Puget Sound is frequently confused as placing a limitation on tanker sizes but in fact does not deal with this issue at all.

Subsequently, U.S. Secretary of Transport Brock Adams set a limit of 125,000 dwt. for two years, ending sometime in 1981, for tankers passing through these waters and requested the U.S. Coast Guard to carry out studies to test the effectiveness of tug escort and assistance under various conditions south of the San Juan Islands at the eastern end of Juan de Fuca Strait.

Currently, the Oceanographic Institute of Washington is conducting a study using worldwide statistics of tanker sizes and accident incidence to get a better appreciation of the traffic risks involved and to make tanker traffic as safe as possible. A draft report is anticipated in March 1981 and we have requested a copy.

The proposed test can be seen as a continuing activity to meet concerns expressed by Canada and the United States and which has already resulted in the Vessel Traffic Management Agreement. The test will employ a tanker laden with sea water and even if an accident were to occur it will not pose a major environmental threat. It should be noted, however, that the Department of the Environment was not officially informed either regionally or at headquarters of the forthcoming tests.

The Canadian concern centres on the environmental risks associated with any tanker traffic in Puget Sound and the corresponding risks to the sensitive Canadian Strait of Georgia. If tankers larger than 125,000 dwt. were to be allowed to enter Puget Sound changes in United States Coast Guard rulings would be involved. During the period that the United States Coast Guard evaluates these study results the Canadian government would have an opportunity to re-emphasize its concerns to the United States.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The last question dealt with floating tankers, but my question deals with floating interest rates. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce both assert that the Canadian interest rate is a free floating one, but I have had drawn to my attention—

Senator Smith: It hasn't sunk much.

Senator Donahoe: —the statement of John Grundy of Commercial Union Assurance Company. In his weekly commentary, he insists that the current rate is not a floating one but is being artificially suppressed by the Bank of Canada. So nobody will say that I misinterpreted what I read, I shall quote Mr. Grundy. He said:

> The reluctance of the central authorities to allow our short rates to find their own level had a devastating effect on the value of our dollar . . . it is as low as it has been for nearly 50 years and little improvement is expected in the near term.

My question is: Does the minister, like his cabinet colleagues, insist that the interest rate is a floating one, or does he acknowledge Bank of Canada interference to keep the rates down?

Pursuant to that, considering that the dollar fell today to 82.69 cents, the lowest level in 47 years, would the minister indicate if it is the government's view that the Bank of Canada's suppression of the interest rate foretells the virtual inevitability of a still lower dollar?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the senator made a number of comments and then asked a whole series of questions, the central one being whether or not there is a floating interest rate. The fact is that there is a floating interest rate which changes each week, depending on the yield of the treasury bills that are auctioned.

My honourable friend also knows that occasionally from time to time the Bank of Canada does intervene, not to stop interest rates finding their own levels, but to mitigate against wide fluctuations. That is not a new practice. That has been done for some time. It seems to me that my honourable friend will have difficulty trying to have it both ways—that is, complaining that interest rates are too low, which may cause some sell-off of Canadian dollars, and also complain that the dollar is dropping too rapidly. Those are opposite situations. He cannot have both at the same time.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY GENERAL OF NATO—COMMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in view of the confusing reports relating to the statement on the Polish crisis made by the Secretary General of NATO, and the comments made last Friday by the Prime Minister, followed by his Secretary of State for External Affairs, would the Leader of the Government clearly inform this chamber of the true position of the government on such an important matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to most thinking observers it would seem that there is no real conflict between the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. Most of the confusion has been created by spokesmen for the opposition. I am sure it is honest confusion, because they have difficulty following some of the—

Senator Marshall: Gyrations.

Senator Perrault: —policy formulations from time to time.

I have made a statement in the Senate on the Polish situation. I will take this question as notice. If it can be demonstrated that any degree of misunderstanding truly exists, I will be pleased to bring a supplementary statement to the Senate on the subject of Poland.

POLAND—REQUEST FOR ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: As a supplementary question, is the Leader of the Government aware of any requests made to Canada by the Polish government for an extension of credits or other economic assistance?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

THE ECONOMY

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—PROJECTED GROWTH RATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The question deals with the projected growth rate in the GNP. I know that has been revised downward several times, but last week the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced the result of a study indicating that an expected substantial decline in investment spending can be expected in 1981 by the 380 firms in Canada.

In light of that projection, does the government intend to further revise downward its 1981 growth projections, or does the minister contend that substantial investment declines will have no effect on growth? Will there be a further downward projection of the growth indicator?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators, I would not contend that a significant decline in investments would not have an effect on growth, because one automatically follows the other.

Senator Doody: That being the case, honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I wonder if the spending projections in the budget, then, will be revised downward, because I understand that a commitment has been made that the rate of growth in spending will not exceed the rate of growth in the year? Can we expect a cutback in government spending to try to keep the deficit under some kind of reasonable control?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, without accepting some of the—I am almost tempted to say "the convoluted reasoning in the preamble to the question"—

Senator Perrault: That is what it is.

Senator Olson: —I would advise the honourable senator that there is no intention to change the projection set out in the budget.

Senator Doody: A final supplementary question. In the interest of clarity and the record, I wonder which part of the reasoning was convoluted. Was there not a commitment that the rate of growth in spending would not exceed the rate of growth in the G.N.P. this year?

Senator Olson: Those were the targets that were set; that is right.

Senator Doody: So that was the convolution. Was that a commitment by the Liberal government?

Senator Olson: No, other than there is some convolution that one thing leads to another. That does not necessarily follow.

Senator Doody: Of course, it does not. That is your reasoning.

NATIONAL REVENUE

THE BUDGET—EXTENSION OF FEDERAL SALES TAX—EFFECT ON MARGINAL MANUFACTURING

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Department of National Revenue has released preliminary guidelines on how the extension of the federal sales tax will affect marginal manufacturing—an extension brought about by the October budget.

As the new tax will apply to packaging, I am wondering whether the government has studied the possible impact of this tax extension on food prices, and, if so, whether the government is prepared to release the details of such a study.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Sherwood: A supplementary, honourable senators. It is reported that importers are considering the closing of their domestic assembly or packaging plants so as to avoid the brunt of the tax, and undertaking those processes in the country of origin. Have there been any calculations made as to the possible additional unemployment which could be created if the extension of this tax were to force these importers to close down their assembly or packaging plants in Canada?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question is a good one and one which calls for certain details. It would be irresponsible of me to hazard a tax ruling at this time. The supplementary question will be taken as notice.

[Senator Doody.]

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION LICENCES—PROVINCIAL REVENUES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Is it correct that certain provinces, such as British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, hold sales from time to time, by way of auction or otherwise, of oil and gas exploration rights or licences?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That is the case in the Province of Alberta, and I think it is the case in the other provinces as well. Certainly it happens from time to time in the Province of Alberta, and I think it is on a fairly regular basis.

Senator Smith: Does the Government of Canada keep itself informed as to what happens at these sales and the way in which they affect the revenues of the various provinces concerned?

Senator Olson: I cannot say positively that each sale is followed precisely, but I would expect that the Department of Finance, and perhaps the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, would have an interest in those values, and certainly would obtain that information. Whether it is done immediately or not, I am not sure.

Senator Smith: Would the minister be able to find out whether there is an estimate of the expected return to British Columbia from the next such sale, and when that sale will be held?

Senator Olson: I suppose it would be relatively simple to ask the Government of British Columbia when it intends to hold the next such sale, or when it will be receiving tenders or bids. I am not sure that they could predict exactly what the results of those sales might be.

I can see what the honourable senator is trying to lead me into, and I might say that I am going to try to see that he does not succeed.

Senator Smith: I think the honourable gentleman's mind-reading might have led him a little astray, because all I am trying to find out is whether he knows anything about these things. Obviously he does not, as he has demonstrated quite clearly.

Senator Perrault: Don't get political now.

Senator Smith: I do not know what words of wisdom the Leader of the Government wished to interject into this exchange, but I would be delighted to listen to his advice and give it the same careful attention that I always do, and that I am sure other honourable senators do.

Would the honourable gentleman be able to tell us whether or not the Province of Alberta, the province from which he comes, has made public any estimate as to what it expects to receive in 1981 by way of revenues from sales of the kind we have been discussing?

Senator Olson: I could refer that question to the Government of Alberta, and I would be happy to do that. However, I think my honourable friend could do the same thing, and they would probably be just as anxious to give their projections to him as they would to me.

No doubt, when discussions relating to some of these matters took place in the provincial legislature, they indicated just what they expected to receive from such sales in 1981, if that is what my honourable friend is asking for. If his question relates to the fiscal year 1981-82, I would point out to him that, since the budget of the Province of Alberta would not usually come out until late February or early March, they probably have not yet made public their projections for that period.

Senator Smith: I am concerned with the calendar year 1981 and its comparison with the calendar year 1980. I would have thought that, in the present circumstances, given the importance of the negotiations and discussions going on between the Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta, these pieces of information would have been instantly to hand. It seems to me that I have demonstrated very clearly that that is not so.

Senator Olson: You may have demonstrated that to yourself, but it should be noted that there is some uncertainty—and we have acknowledged that uncertainty—as to the amount of exploration and development activity, and there will be that uncertainty until the producing provinces and the Government of Canada come to an agreement respecting a number of outstanding issues, including price. Until that has happened, it may even be possible that some of the producing provinces would want to retard to some extent, or postpone, the calling of these sales. It would be understandable, for instance, that they would want to await more firmness, if that is the right word, in the market.

That is one other reason why we in this government are so anxious to escalate—and I say that because they have already started at the officials level—the negotiations between the Government of Alberta and the Government of Canada, and that is so that we can come to a satisfactory and a negotiated arrangement, which is much preferable to both governments proceeding in the absence of an agreement.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether the minister undertook to make some inquiries about the expected revenues from these sales in Alberta or not. I think he did. If he did, I would ask him to inquire, at the same time, if there should happen to be an estimated substantial decrease in such revenues, whether the Province of Alberta attributes such a decrease to the National Energy Policy of the Government of Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did give that undertaking, because it is not difficult. However, I should caution my honourable friend that if he is talking of the calendar year 1981, which of course includes several months of the 1981-82 fiscal year for the Province of Alberta, then I would doubt that that information is available.

Senator Smith: The honourable gentleman may be correct. I would not attempt to instruct him in these matters. I expect him to know about them—or, if he does not, to find out. In any event, perhaps I could assist him a little in relation to information from the Province of British Columbia. I am led to believe that in that province the sales take place in January—

Senator Olson: Some of them.

Senator Smith: There are such sales in January of each year in the Province of British Columbia. Perhaps my honourable friend would be good enough to ascertain, in the course of his inquiries, whether the Province of British Columbia has made any estimate as to how its expected revenues from sales in January 1981 will compare with sales in January 1980, and whether, in the event that that estimate is lower, it too attributes the probable decrease in revenues from sales to the National Energy Policy of the Government of Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what my honourable friend is asking is a whole series of hypothetical questions that are supposed to be related to a stable situation where these kinds of projections can be made. I don't know if I should say it over again, but if he wants me to I will: There is a measure of uncertainty in the industry right now which will be there until the two levels of government come to an agreement. After that the amount that the industry might want to bid for these kinds of sales will be much clearer and much firmer. Those provinces, therefore, may wish to hold some of those sales until after that much happier situation has been achieved.

• (2110)

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman and I look forward with keen anticipation to receiving the information he has undertaken to obtain.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

PURCHASE OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEM DEVELOPED IN ONTARIO—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government concerning the federal government's involvement in the lower mainland rapid transit system. My question arises from a statement attributed to the minister's colleague, the Honourable Ed Lumley, who said in Vancouver the other day that the provincial government had undermined the chances of getting a large federal government contribution to a lower mainland transit system by announcing the project too soon. Apparently Mr. Lumley went on to say that the provincial government's announcement might have harmed behind-the-scenes negotiations in Ottawa to bring the federal government into the scheme.

How does the Leader of the Government reconcile that statement by Mr. Lumley, which puts federal financial involvement in considerable doubt, with what we on this side have taken to be his own very firm commitment of at least $30 million to $50 million from the federal government to that project?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is too close to Christmas to engage in any kind of acrimony.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: It is uncharacteristic of me to do so in any case.

Senator Murray: That is good news for Ed Lumley.

Senator Perrault: I do not have the full text of Mr. Lumley's alleged remarks before me and I would not wish to comment on what I am sure was an outstanding speech by a member of the ministry.

Senator Flynn: Outstanding?

Senator Perrault: Or an outstanding interview, whatever the form of the minister's remarks.

Senator Argue: Good medicine!

Senator Flynn: Whatever it is.

Senator Perrault: The interest of the national government in light rapid transit in British Columbia and in the other provinces remains.

Senator Flynn: Despite—

Senator Perrault: "Despite" is an excellent word suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. Despite the statement made—

Senator Flynn: Made by Mr. Lumley.

Senator Perrault: —made by one of the provincial ministers. However, I do not regard that statement, and the government does not regard that statement—

Senator Flynn: That will teach him!

Senator Perrault: —as a matter which should prompt the cessation of LRT negotiations with the Province of British Columbia or with any other entity.

As I said in some of my earlier remarks, we are discussing the proposed project now in a preliminary way with the provincial and local transit people. We are discussing with them the degree of possible federal participation which may be required. Ultimately the full cabinet will make a decision on federal involvement, the degree of participation, and the amount of money involved. Certainly. Mr. Lumley and other ministers have a cabinet mandate to negotiate with the provincial government.

Senator Flynn: That will teach him next time he goes to British Columbia to shut his trap.

Senator Murray: I am sure all of us are quite heartened by the fact that the Honourable Leader of the Government, in view of the approaching feast of Christmas, has decided not to vent his true feelings on Ed Lumley tonight.

Senator Olson: That is not what he said at all.

Senator Murray: But in view of the minister's answer, and in view of the answers he gave me the other day, which I am looking for now in Hansard, will he confirm now his statement of the other day that $30 million to $50 million is being committed to this project by the federal government?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is an estimate that a "showcase" project involving a demonstration of Canada's advanced light rapid transit technology would be in the area of $30 million to $50 million, but the exact amount of money that could be involved in such a project has not yet been set.

From the material that has been made available to me, and that material is not of a restricted nature, the costs would probably be in the area of $50 million. But that has yet to be determined. As I have said, there is now the matter of negotiation and discussion involving the transit authority in the Province of British Columbia as well as provincial and municipal representatives.

I must say that I am flattered at the avid way in which Senator Murray is ferreting through the transcript my past speeches on the subject.

Senator Donahoe: He is a great student of fiction.

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Since the subject of the Christmas season has been mentioned by the Leader of the Government, may I ask the deputy leader to tell us when it is likely we will recess for Christmas?

Senator Olson: It depends on the length of the Question Period.

Senator Smith: It depends on the length of the answers.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, last week we discussed the business we could anticipate receiving from the other place and the business we might wish to complete before the Christmas recess. Bill S-18, the insurance company merger bill, was passed in the other place without amendment and can be given royal assent, if that can be arranged this week. We have had the report of the committee on Bill C-44, the small loans bill, and third reading has been set for tomorrow. Bill S-2, the tax convention bill, was sent back to us from the other place with amendments. When Senator Hicks, the sponsor of the bill, explains those amendments tomorrow, we will consider whether we wish to concur in them. There is then Bill C-51, the amendment to the Clean Air Act. To my knowledge that is all of the business we will have received from the other place before adjourning for Christmas. I understand that Bill S-16, Senator Manning's private bill on the Lethbridge Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, will not be back from the other place before the adjournment.

In terms of the recess itself, I understand that the other place has on its order paper a notice of motion to adjourn on Friday of this week and to return on January 12 next. In that context I think we should try to achieve what we set last week as our target, which was to finish tomorrow afternoon. As I have indicated, there is at least one bill which could receive royal assent tomorrow. We might then, like the Commons, come back on January 12 next or we might come back a week later than that, depending on the amount of business we have on our order paper and on any business we receive from them that week. I suspect, however, we will not receive any business from the Commons in that second week of January, but we may wish to clean up our own order paper. I will discuss these matters with the Leader of the Opposition, and no doubt our plans for January can be decided together. So that is the plan.

The threatened strike by Air Canada flight attendants on Thursday still exists. As we mentioned last week, if there is a way in which we can complete our business and avoid the difficulties that honourable senators might have as a result of the proposed strike, then I believe we should consider it.

● (2120)

Senator McElman: The honourable senator did not mention Bill S-12, respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild. Has that yet been dealt with by the Commons?

Senator Flynn: It was reported without amendment. We received the message at the beginning of the sitting.

Senator McElman: It was received from the Commons?

Senator Frith: That is correct. I should have referred to Bills S-12 and S-18 together. We received messages from the House of Commons informing us that they had passed these bills without amendment.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government a question about our legislative program. I certainly do not want to delay the time of our Christmas adjournment, but I was at once reminded that a long sought meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is scheduled for when the Senate rises tomorrow. I am not sure how that meeting will fit into the legislative timetable suggested by the deputy leader, but arrangements have been made for the attendance of officials from the Department of Transport in connection with the committee's study of the subject matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, which was given royal assent on July 17 last. Included among the witnesses is an expert on the voluminous regulations which are in draft form.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I can see two possibilities. We could try to conclude our business and have royal assent at 5.45 p.m. The committee could commence its proceedings and interrupt them so that its members could respond to the bell for royal assent, and then resume its deliberations after royal assent. An alternative would be for the committee to sit tomorrow evening. However, perhaps travel arrangements have been made for the witnesses as well. Are any of the witnesses from out of town?

Senator Smith: They are departmental witnesses and I believe that they are all from this area. Another possible difficulty occurs to me. I am not sure that the committee would have the authority to sit after royal asent and the Senate has adjourned for the Christmas recess.

The deputy leader, speaking of a certain strike, said that might take place on Thursday. From what I have read in the newspapers—although certain ministers tell me that one should not rely on them too much—I was led to believe that the strike will not likely take place until Friday. Has the deputy leader any firm information on that.

Senator Frith: As lawyers often say, that is a nice point. I understood that the strike could commence on Thursday at midnight, which in effect means Friday. The date they talk about is Thursday, but no doubt they mean midnight on Thursday.

With regard to the other point raised by the honourable senator, we will ask the Senate for the necessary leave to enable Senator Smith's committee to meet when the Senate rises tomorrow, if it is necessary to cover the period between the Senate rising and awaiting the call of the bell. We will see that whatever is required is done in order to cover that eventuality.

Senator Smith: Thank you. I should explain that I did not consult my committee about these problems because it had not occurred to me that they were likely to arise. If what I have said has taken any members of the committee by surprise, I ask for their indulgence.

Hon. Alasdair B. Graham: On the point raised by Senator Smith concerning the sitting of committees, I would remind the Deputy Leader of the Government that the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration is scheduled to meet on Thursday at 11.30 a.m. There are a number of important items to be discussed which should be completed before the end of the year. I would hope, if leave is necessary for that committee to sit, that the deputy leader would move the necessary motion during the sitting of the Senate tomorrow.

Senator Frith: I understand that there are some social activities planned for Thursday. With reference to committee meetings on either Wednesday or Thursday, I realize that the suggested plan involving the scheduling of the Senate's activities may create some difficulty in connection with committee meetings. I had hoped, however, that those plans, in the context of the strike, would allow those senators who had plane reservations for Friday to move them forward to Thursday. I hope that honourable senators will be able to attend any committee meetings scheduled for Thursday, and still meet their travel plans, even though the Senate itself may not be sitting on Thursday.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

PURCHASE OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEM DEVELOPED IN ONTARIO—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, perhaps I may have the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to follow up my exchange of a few minutes ago with the Leader of the Government on the subject of federal involvement in the lower mainland transit system of British Columbia. I should like to invite his attention to page 1389 of Hansard for December 9, where he said:

> After studying the available data, and after looking at the specifications of the system, we then hope to enter into negotiations with the Province of British Columbia. The final price tag has not yet been determined. It would be irresponsible of me to say definitely that it is going to cost $30 million or $50 million, but the general estimated amount of money is in the area of $30 to $50 million.
> SENATOR MURRAY: From Ottawa.
> SENATOR PERRAULT: From Ottawa.

I could also place on the record, but will not, the minister's earlier statements to the press concerning his conversations with the mayor elect of Vancouver, in which he mentioned hundreds of millions of dollars that were available in the Western Development Fund and elsewhere, all of which have been taken as a commitment.

In view of those statements, and in view of Mr. Lumley's statements that I read earlier, will the minister say whether there is a federal commitment to the tune of $30 million to $50 million to help finance this project?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I welcome the honourable senator's interest in this matter. It is important for Canada and for our economy. One of the uncertainties, frankly—and I can share this with honourable senators—is the fact that the new mayor of Vancouver has invited citizens to write to him expressing their preference for either of two systems they would like to see established there. The two systems, which have been described by some as the "Calgary system" and the "Ontario system," are really the German system and the Canadian system.

Senator Walker: Hear, hear—in that order.

Senator Perrault: In fact, it is not a simple matter of choosing between a "Calgary" system which is now in existence in some parts of Alberta, and an "Ontario" or "Kingston" system. The alternatives are a good German system or an outstanding Canadian system, developed by Canadian scientists, engineers and working people. The development facility just happens to be located in Ontario, but the engineers come from every province in the country, and 90 per cent of the construction materials would be from Canada. The industrial benefits of a Canadian system would be shared between eastern Canada and western Canada. In my view it is time that we gave a boost to Canadian technology, and to Canadian engineers that we graduate from our universities. It is time we took a pride in Canadian industrial achievement.

● (2130)

I have nothing against German technology at all. However, it is time for a vote of confidence in a Canadian system. I hope that the informal poll taken by the mayor of Vancouver will indicate that the people of British Columbia feel the same way about the value of a Canadian system. We have a project here which may be worth $600 million. These industrial benefits could be spread from coast to coast across Canada. And why not?

Honourable senators, I want to inform this house today that the Los Angeles city council has just announced that it is going to purchase this particular all-Canadian system for that city. The initial cost will be around $200 million. That is a great deal for Canada, won against intense competition from throughout the world.

Let me pursue to a short conclusion the question asked by Senator Murray. If the British Columbia authorities, and the civic authorities, say in the ultimate that they prefer a European LRT system, or a system developed outside of Canada to an all-Canadian system, which is one of the best light rapid transit systems ever evolved, I am not personally prepared to support the pouring of massive amounts of Canadian taxpayers' money into that project. All of us want to give a boost to Canadian workers, the Canadian inventive abilities and to Canadian ingenuity, and to help industry in western Canada and Atlantic Canada as well as in Ontario and Quebec. We can do this by supporting Canada's own LRT project. There is a potential $200 billion market for light transit sales throughout the world today, and Canadian companies, wherever they are located, should get their full share.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF CANADIAN FOREIGN POLICY

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, much as I love British Columbia, and the honourable senator who represents that great empire of a province, I would like to direct my question to the Honourable Senator Frith. In the light of the present very serious considerations in the realm of external affairs, and in the light of statements made by the Prime Minister from time to time, which are somewhat disturbing, would the deputy leader give thought to having the Senate of Canada study Canada's foreign policy in respect of Poland and other problem areas abroad?

Does the deputy leader not consider that it is important for this house to give serious thought to what Canada should be doing with regard to these very grave situations? Does he have any suggestions as to what we might do in this regard, perhaps after the recess?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I certainly will give some thought to the honourable senator's suggestion. Perhaps Senator Macquarrie and I can approach the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to see whether he and his committee members can be convinced to interrupt their work of Canada-U.S. Relations in order to look at some of these questions. Perhaps such a study could be undertaken when we return in January.

FINANCE

FLUCTUATIONS IN INTEREST RATES—REACTION BY CANADIAN BANKING SYSTEM

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. It concerns another Canadian operation about which I am not nearly so happy as both he and I are with the Ontario light transit system. I am referring to the chartered banks in Canada.

As honourable senators know, over the past year and a half in particular, as a result of federal government policy as translated and transmitted through the Bank of Canada, there have been very rapid fluctuations in interest rates within our country, following, for the most part, similar and leading fluctuations in the prime rates in the United States. I have noted that during those periods when the rates have been high, and they begin to fall, our chartered banks follow very rapidly, normally the following day, any reduction in the rate that is set on Thursday of each week by the Bank of Canada; but when there is an increase in the rate, the chartered banks are extremely slow to follow the lead of the Bank of Canada. This week, following a lapse of four or five days after the announcement by the Bank of Canada on Thursday last of an increase of 1.37 points in the bank rate, two Canadian chartered banks that I checked personally had not, by the close of business today, Tuesday, made any change in their rate for term deposits.

This leads a suspicious mind such as mine to believe that a delay such as this means that the chartered banks of Canada are making an immense profit—I would call it a rip-off—from their depositors that is unconscionable and unacceptable.

That is rather a long preamble to my question, which is as follows. Would the Leader of the Government undertake, through the facilities available to him, to determine from the Bank of Canada if there is any viable or acceptable reason, why, when the rate goes down, that rate change can be reflected the next day by the chartered banks, but when the rate goes up, a period as long as from Thursday until the following Tuesday or Wednesday transpires before the banks can use their IBMs to decide what the revised rate should be?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this unusual phenomenon will be made the subject of a question which I shall direct to the Minister of Finance. That information will be brought here as quickly as possible.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I wonder if one could add to that question, honourable senators, the other financial institutions which take deposits and pay interest?

Senator Perrault: That will be taken as a supplementary.

Senator McElman: Thank you for that assist, Senator Smith.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA—SUPERTANKER MANOEUVRABILITY TRIALS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I had several questions for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I will cut them down to one, which is in the form of a supplementary, on the question of the tanker test in the Strait of Juan de Fuca. I apologize for not getting to my feet sooner.

I thought the leader had said that the harbours people, and the Canadian Coast Guard, would be monitoring and would be present during the testing of this tanker, and that, indeed, the government was very interested in the results of the test. I take it that it is fair to assume that the Government of Canada has in no way objected to the tests taking place.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is no complacency on the part of the government with respect to—

Senator Nurgitz: I was not concerned about complacency. I was concerned about objections not having been made.

Senator Perrault: I will give you a reply. There is no complacency on the part of the government toward ocean traffic consisting of huge oil supertankers on either coast. It is something we have been concerned about for some time. There have been some disastrous oil spills on the Atlantic coast, such as at Chedabucto Bay, which have caused great damage. I was one of those who visited that particular spill to see the terrible environmental effects.

● (2140)

With respect to the trials on the west coast, I understand that the Canadian Coast Guard was consulted by the U.S. Coast Guard at the regional level and expressed no objections. However, we have for some time been concerned, and we have expressed our concerns to the U.S. about the potential problems presented by supertanker traffic to Canada's west coast environment. We have, in co-operation with the United States, taken all possible measures to ensure that this forthcoming test is conducted as safely as possible and that we have available the best information possible on a number of questions including navigation methods.

The U.S. experiment will take place entirely in U.S. waters and apparently presents no risk to the environment because there will be no oil in the tanker. The test run has been explained by U.S. authorities as necessary to make possible the safer management of tanker traffic. However, the government continues to be concerned about any developments which could lead to an increased risk to the marine environment off Canada's west coast and will, therefore, be following the progress of this experiment closely.

In the material I have incorporated in the record of today's proceedings there is further information about the attitude the Department of the Environment has taken towards the matter. After reading it, honourable senators may wish to ask a supplementary tomorrow.

Senator Nurgitz: I trust the material deals with the question of whether there was an objection on the part of the Government of Canada to the Government of the United States.

Senator Perrault: The record will make it quite clear that there was no formal protest as such delivered to the United States. We have obtained assurances that there will be Canadian observers from the National Harbours Board and other jurisdictions present for the test. I must express the hope—perhaps a hope shared by others who live in a fragile marine environment—that this is not the prelude to the movement of huge supertankers travelling close to Canadian shores. The fact is that the weather conditions on both our Atlantic and Pacific coasts can be very difficult at times. Some of these supertankers take something like 6 to 10 miles to stop. Understandably, there is a great deal of apprehension on both of Canada's coasts.

We face the traditional task of balancing economic advantage and advancement against the preservation of environmental values, and many of these decisions are very difficult to come by.

Senator Nurgitz: Would the Leader of the Government not agree that a successful test without oil could well lead to that becoming a route which in future could result in all kinds of environmental hazards?

Senator Perrault: I think the honourable senator makes a very good point. That is precisely one of the concerns of many who are looking at the scheduled tests with some concern and apprehension.

ALBERTA

RUMOURED DISTRIBUTION OF HERITAGE FUND

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers which I should now like to give. They are very short, and I can read them as quickly as I can identify them for the record.

I want to respond to a question raised on December 3 by Senator Robichaud which concerned distribution of the Alberta Heritage Fund. I have made some inquiries and the rumour that the Heritage Fund will be distributed to citizens from Alberta is just that—a rumour, and not based on fact. Distribution of the funds would be totally inconsistent with the fundamental objective of the Heritage Fund as a means of investing in the economic development and diversification of the Alberta economy.

The honourable senator might be interested to know that the fund stood at about $7.3 billion as of mid-summer. An update on the balance is expected early next year.

INDUSTRY

MANUFACTURING SECTOR—SUGGESTED NEW CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should also like to respond to a question raised on December 9 by Senator Murray which concerned setting up a new crown corporation for the manufacturing sector.

I am not aware, at this time, of any proposals to establish such a corporation.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RECAPITALIZATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on December 2 by Senator Smith concerning recapitalization of the CNR.

I assure the honourable senator that the government has no plans at this time to introduce a CN recapitalization bill. Recent comments made by the president of CN many have been influenced by a substantial capital expenditure CN will be required to make over the next five years.

These include upgrading of its main lines on a number of subdivisions in western Canada, notably between Edmonton and Prince Rupert; major improvements to yard facilities; and an expenditure of almost $1 billion in new equipment.

I would point out that CN activities experienced successes, and the corporation's return on investment for 1979 was 7.5 per cent. In conclusion, I would reiterate that no recapitalization legislation for CN is planned.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 10, the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the second reading of Bill S-15, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Godfrey speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill S-15.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to compliment Senator Marshall on his contribution to this debate. Since he has been in the Senate, he has shown great interest in veterans affairs, and he demonstrated in his excellent speech his broad interest and knowledge of the affairs of the Royal Canadian Legion.

Senator Macdonald in his speech also demonstrated that the Royal Canadian Legion is near and dear to his heart—so near and dear, in fact, that he wants to keep the membership exactly the way it is as far as qualifications are concerned. In his speech he raised a number of questions and points which I think would be most effectively dealt with in committee. He said he would not oppose second reading of this bill.

It is my belief that the clause of the bill which deals with broadening the qualifications for membership is only an enabling clause which will permit greater definition later by by-law. I should like to make only two comments about that particular clause to which Senator Macdonald objected.

First, I am informed that this clause was the result of interest from the floor of the convention held in 1978. It was not originally proposed by the officers themselves; this is a grass roots request from the floor of the convention. Secondly, I understand that the approval of this clause was overwhelming and that there was, in fact, only one person who spoke against it at the convention.

However, I believe those matters could be better dealt with in committee where Senator Macdonald can ask questions as to just how unanimous the approval was and what the feeling was, because I think he will agree that is a relevant matter to be considered, and that one cannot really expect unanimity in these matters in an institution which had, in 1978, 500,000 members. Therefore, I suggest that the questions raised by Senator Macdonald could very well and more effectively be dealt with in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Godfrey moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Leblanc, for the second reading of the Bill S-17, intituled: "An Act to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax".—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I spoke to Senator Phillips today and he thought he would proceed. He is out of the chamber at the moment, so I would ask that this item be placed at the end of today's order paper. If Senator Phillips is detained, the item will stand. However, he did tell me he was hoping to make his intervention on this bill today.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I have mentioned, I believe the subject matter of Order No. 3 and that of Order No. 6 are sufficiently linked that they should be dealt with together. I would like my remarks on Order No. 6 to include some comments on Order No. 3. Therefore, I am asking that both those items stand.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, which was presented on December 10.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, before addressing myself to the subject matter of the report, I should like to make a progress report of the activities of the Northern Pipeline Committee since Parliament resumed. We have continued to fulfill our major obligation with respect to the northern pipeline, and in that regard we have held three meetings. Senator Olson, the Minister of State for Economic Development, and the Minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline Agency, gave evidence at one meeting. We had evidence from the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, the Commissioner of the Northern Pipeline Agency; and we had a meeting with officials of Foothills Pipe Lines.

I can report to honourable senators that as of today on the western leg from Caroline to Kingsgate on the United States boundary the work is 92 per cent complete. It will be complete on the western leg between Christmas and New Year's and all that remains to be done is testing. The pipeline will be taking gas in May after construction has been completed on the United States side.

With respect to the eastern leg from Caroline to Saskatchewan and the United States border, work will commence in May 1981 with 427 kilometres scheduled to be constructed and 208 kilometres in 1982. It will be ready to accept gas in the fall of 1982.

There is a continued problem with respect to right-of-way acquisition. The contractors are having difficulties and landowners are really looking to this Parliament for the reintroduction of Bill S-12, which was the result of this committee's work two Parliaments ago. I can only appeal to the minister to use his good offices with respect to the introduction of a bill to modernize the acquisition of right-of-way through modern procedures instead of using the Railway Act of 1917.

I am pleased to report that Foothills is acquiring right-of-way on the basis that adjustments will be made in any act that will be passed by Parliament.

With regard to Canadian content in the construction and supply of goods and services, the committee is happy to find that Foothills is providing just about 90 per cent Canadian content on all construction.

We are also happy to learn that a great deal of credit is due to Foothills and the contractors and unions with respect to encouraging participation and interest of the native population of Alberta and British Columbia in the construction of the pipeline, and its economic benefits.

Honourable senators will appreciate that manpower data fluctuates from day to day, but a tally taken on September 15, 1980, indicated that out of a total work force of 348, 69, or 20 per cent, were native. Later, when the total work force went over 700, that proportion dropped to 15 per cent. A great deal of credit is due to Foothills and the unions for going out of their way to make certain that the native and indigenous population of the Alberta region is benefiting from the construction of this pipeline.

Preparatory work continues in northern Alberta, the Yukon and northern British Columbia with respect to construction which will commence, if it is on schedule, in 1983. We are pleased to see that the minister has appointed an advisory council for northeastern British Columbia, to encourage the participation of local citizens.

In Alaska, which represents the most expensive and probably the most difficult portion of the pipeline, considerable progress has been made with regard to engineering and planning. Ralph M. Parsons Company of Los Angeles, California, has been awarded the contract for the design and engineering activities for a processing and conditioning plant on the north slope of Alaska. It will process 2.4 billion cubic feet of gas per day for delivery through the pipeline. In addition, 430 miles of right-of-way has been acquired by agreement with the Department of the Interior of the United States.

So the work continues on all segments of the pipeline with the active work being done, of course, in the south where the prebuild commenced in August.

Honourable senators, with respect to the enhanced recovery reference, your committee has held eight meetings. We heard from research institutes, industry associations and individual petroleum companies, and we propose to hear from the National Energy Board and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources after the Christmas recess.

The examination has generated a great deal of interest, enthusiasm and participation for industry. I think we have established that we have a valuable energy potential resource of about four billion barrels of oil in place in the western sedimentary basin. It is a resource that can make a significant contribution to our supply inventory. We have to understand that it can be recovered only at great risk with very expensive procedures, which means high cost oil consumers. Therefore, a decision must be made as to whether or not we are prepared to pay this price for this resource. Your committee will present a complete and comprehensive report on its findings after its consultations in January with industry officials in Calgary.

Honourable senators, turning now to the report of the committee, which is that your committee be authorized to examine and report upon all aspects of transmission and distribution of natural gas in Quebec and the maritime provinces. The matter of a pipeline from Montreal to Halifax was first mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. It has been restated as a national priority in the National Energy Policy as part of a drive to convert maritime Canada from oil to gas, and it still remains a preferred option. The purpose, of course, is to replace insecure expensive energy by less expensive energy from a secure Canadian source. At the same time, we are hearing of new possibilities in Hibernia and Sable Island, and research continues on the feasibility of the polar gas route project.

It is against this background that it has been announced that Trans-Quebec & Maritimes Pipeline Company will make a new application to the National Energy Board, which will directly assess and rectify the reasons for an earlier refusal to grant a permit to construct the Quebec and Maritime segment of the line. Without prejudging any decision of the National Energy Board, the principals are optimistic that approval will be obtained within a short period of time, and that natural gas to the maritimes can be a reality with a scheduled delivery date in 1983. The construction of a gas distribution network will be of major benefit to consumers in the maritime economy.

• (2200)

The capital cost is estimated to be approximately $2 billion, which does not include the investment in changing from gas to oil. It will result in positive employment and economic impact on the maritimes.

Any policy designed to fill the energy needs of the maritimes must be guided by three principles—it must be the most efficient source; it must proceed with the agreement of the provinces; and it must ensure that the needs of the consumers are met.

Honourable senators, the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline, during the past few years, through its work on the pipeline in western Canada, has gained a certain expertise, knowledge and experience which will capably fit it to carry out an examination of all aspects of this pipeline and report to this house in due course. Therefore, I recommend the adoption of the report to the Senate.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, very briefly, I should like to say a word or two of support for the motion.

Since Senator Hastings mentioned the question of compensation and acquisition of right-of-way, I should like first to say a word of tribute to the energy and diligence of the former chairman, our colleague, Senator Olson, in pressing the matter of bringing the method of compensation, as well as the method of acquisition, up to date. I fully concur in the suggestion of Senator Hastings that these matters should be taken out of the provisions of the Railway Act and embraced in some modern legislation which would deal fairly and adequately with the owners of the land through which this pipeline or any pipeline might go.

I might say that the work of Senator Olson, which culminated in a bill being passed by this chamber, was not confined to western rights-of-way. That bill would have been applicable to the country as a whole if it had become law. Honourable senators will recall that this house passed the bill which Senator Olson was so instrumental in having prepared, but it did not succeed in making its way through the other place because of the dissolution of Parliament.

I believe that the extension of what is now called the TQ & M Pipeline—it used to be called the Q & M pipeline—to Quebec and on to the maritime provinces, to a suitable termination in Nova Scotia, is of great importance to that part of the country. I think it also has a benefit to the nation as a whole. I say that, first of all, because it will help lessen the dependence of the maritime region on foreign oil, and will thus serve a national purpose.

I seems to me that an equally important national purpose is that there should be a means of distribution of various kinds of energy from one corner of the country to the other, or from one side of the country to the other, not the least of which are gas and oil, and not the least of which, either, is electricity.

It seems to me that while we are now concerned with extending the means of transportation of gas, the other forms of energy should not be overlooked.

I could not speak of energy for use in the maritime provinces without referring to the question of tidal power and, more immediately, to the question of the utilization of coal, particularly in Nova Scotia. Nevertheless, despite the offshore prospects to which Senator Hastings referred, it seems to me a matter of real urgency that this pipeline be extended. I hope and believe that the application soon to be made to the National Energy Board by TQ & M Pipeline Company will be sufficiently improved over the last one and will gain the approval of that board. Therefore, I look forward with anticipation to that approval and the commencement of the work.

Honourable senators would probably judge my contribution as being of sufficient length at this time. I think I have expressed the thoughts I wished to put before the chamber, so I will close by just repeating my support for the motion.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I wish to commend the suggestion of Senator Hastings that we extend the terms of reference of what we now know as the Northern Pipeline Committee to include the TQ & M Pipeline. Perhaps now we should call it the Canada Pipeline Committee.

During the past few years, we in the maritimes have been particularly interested in the routing of the pipeline, because it has been suggested to us by some of the witnesses that the pipeline will generally follow the route of the Trans-Canada Highway through New Brunswick. I was glad to hear this evening that Senator Thériault has been added to the membership of that committee.

The pipeline, if it is approved, should bring gas to northern New Brunswick, particularly northeastern and northwestern New Brunswick, to Edmundston, Campbellton, Bathurst, the Caraquet Coast, Newcastle and Fredericton. We must look very closely at what volumes of gas will be diverted to the United States. It has been suggested to us by witnesses that some of this gas will go into the State of Maine and from there, conceivably, into what we call the New England states.

In addition to the route of the pipeline, we must consider what was formerly Bill S-12, which was introduced by Senator Olson, who played a prominent role in bringing this question of compensation before the Senate. We must be careful in the maritimes on this question of compensation. What we have in New Brunswick is a pretty good system of compensation now over what we previously had. I am sure that some of the senators from New Brunswick were instrumental in the adoption of this type of compensation. I hope that they will look closely at this matter, and realize that we must get away from the Railway Act type of compensation and consider what real values are today with respect to pipelines going through farm lands. We must also look to the real estate value of land in the province.

• (2210)

When we talk about natural gas in the Province of New Brunswick, we should realize that we have in that province probably the oldest gas field in Canada, that being the Albert County field.

Senator Guay: And oil.

Senator Riley: And oil, to some extent, yes. The output of natural gas from the Albert County field was the prime source of energy for the City of Moncton from 1902 until very recently. The reserves are depleted now, but one can still create a flame by igniting a match over the bubbles to be found in the streams in that area.

Many of us feel that this potential in the Province of New Brunswick should be further exploited, particularly from the standpoint of EOR, a program that is going on in both the United States and western Canada. We feel that we can perhaps get some tertiary recovery from that field. I hope we can, and that there will be further recovery.

I know Senator Smith will agree with me when I say that we in the maritime provinces are all very happy about the potential of the Sable Island discoveries.

I do not want to take up too much time of the Senate—

Senator Guay: Hear, hear.

Senator Riley: Senator Guay is more concerned with the west. Eastern Canada does not stop at the Ontario border. I come from the maritime provinces. I do not know whether Senator Guay has ever visited the maritime provinces. If he has not, I suggest that he do so. We are a wide-awake people. We populated the west. In fact, some of Senator Guay's forebears might have come from the Province of New Brunswick.

An Hon. Senator: If they didn't, they should have.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I want to assure Senator Riley that I do regard the maritime provinces as a wonderful area of Canada—an area which I appreciate greatly. I had the opportunity of seeing much of the maritime region during the war, and also since the war. Not only do I have great respect and regard for that region, but I am a little jealous of those who live in it. I would not mind living in some of the wonderful places to be found in that region. Being a westerner, I am concerned with both areas.

Senator Riley: I hope that Senator Guay was not one of those soldiers who created havoc on the trains coming from the west to Halifax.

Another area of concern is the regional content in the proposed Quebec and maritimes pipeline. We hope that due regard will be given to the fact that unemployment is high in the maritimes and that technical schools will be established to train people to work on the pipeline project. We hope that particular attention will be paid to maritime content in the construction of the pipeline. It is a project that is very important to maritimers, and I warn Parliament that we have learned a lot as members of the Northern Pipeline Committee, and we will be fighting hard for the principles that we regard as very important to us.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

December 16, 1980

1. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

(Enabling Clauses No. 1)

2. By Order of Reference dated 20th November 1980 the subject matter of clauses 2, 3 and 17 of the Canada Post Corporation Bill (C-42) was referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments for its consideration. Your Committee has studied these clauses together with the other clauses of the Bill to which they relate. All these clauses are set out in the Appendix to this Report. Your Committee has received evidence from the Postmaster General and his Director of Legal Services, and has entertained submissions from and heard representatives of the Government of Ontario and of the following organizations:

Canadian Telecommunications Carriers Association

Canadian Trucking Association

Canadian Bankers' Association

In addition, submissions have been received from:

Loomis Courier Service Limited

Canadian Direct Mail Marketing Association

Canadian Industrial Communications Assembly.

3. Clause 14(1) of the Bill gives to the Canada Post Corporation a monopoly, called an exclusive privilege, over the collecting, conveying and delivering of letters (subject to exceptions set out in Clauses 14(2) and 15(1)). Your Committee was seriously concerned by the power given to the Corporation to define, by regulation, the word "letter" and, hence, the extent of its own monopoly. Such a subordinate law making power is inappropriate to a parliamentary democracy. Your Committee's concern was heightened by the fact that the word "letter" could, in light of Clause 5 of the Bill and the definitions in Clause 2, be defined to include messages and information transmitted by all known and projected electronic or optical means of telecommunication.

4. The Postmaster General has tabled amendments before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee which would provide a statutory definition of "letter" and a specific exclusion from the Corporation's monopoly of "letters in the course of transmission by electronic or optical means". The amendments read as follows:

" "letter" means any item of mailable matter that weighs no more than 500 grams and has an address, code or other identification sufficient to enable delivery of the item to a specific addressee or destination but does not include

(a) any item consisting solely of a newspaper, magazine, book or catalogue or of goods,

(b) any item consisting solely of an item referred to in paragraph (a) and of an invoice relating exclusively thereto,

(c) any item having no further address than "householder", "boxholder", "occupant", "resident" or other similar expression and

(d) any item consisting solely of advertising matter, or a greeting card

(e) any item that is specified by the regulations;

15(1) The exclusive privilege referred to in subsection 14(1) does not apply to

(h) letters in the course of transmission by electronic or optical means."

These amendments have allayed many, but not all, of the fears of the telecommunications carriers. By reference to the definition of "transmit" in clause 2 of the Bill, the exclusion proposed by the Postmaster General in the new clause 15(1)(h) amounts to an exclusion for letters in the course of their sending from one place to another by electronic or optical means. The Postmaster General was clear in his evidence before your Committee that he wished to maintain the postal monopoly over what are commonly called hard copies before and after transmission of any information or messages by electronic or optical means. However, he spoke in terms of letters as traditionally understood and not in terms of "letters" as they will now be defined. It appears that the actual electronic transmission of information can not be a letter at all because it has no mass. However, it must be assumed to be included within the new definition of "letter" because it will be specifically excluded from the monopoly over letters by the proposed clause 15(1)(h). Your Committee notes that there are misgivings amongst telecommunications carriers about the precise effect of clause 15(1)(h) on their ability to provide a fast and efficient service, including messenger delivery of hard copy, to those who wish to transmit messages by what is popularly known as electronic mail. Just when electronic or optical transmission begins and ends seems to be uncertain. However, as clause 15 stands outside your Committee's terms of reference, it can not deal further with this issue.

5. The proposed definition of "letter" to be inserted in clause 2 of the Bill is governed by a test of mass. It is cast in terms of "mailable matter" having a mass of no more than five hundred grams. Such a mass limit will catch many time-critical items commonly sent by courier service or other speedy means, including vaccines; pharmaceutical and optical prescriptions; medical tests, including radio-active isotopes for cancer tests; mini-cassettes and so on. The definition will encompass all manner of legal, accounting, financial and data processing material and negotiable instruments and a great variety of small packets, unless they can be classified as "goods", a term which is not defined in the Bill although it appears in paragraph (a) of the definition of "letter".

Until regulations appear defining "mailable matter", it will not be known what precisely will be included within the statutory definition of "letter". This lack of clarity will produce uncertainty and apprehension in the courier and parcel delivery industries. The position of courier services under the Bill is a question of significance. It lies beyond your Committee's terms of reference but is deserving of study by the Committee properly charged with the carriage of the Bill. The term "goods" could be defined in such a way as to include many items now carried by couriers. Perhaps clause 15(1)(e) could be redrafted to provide a certain basis for courier services dealing with urgent or time-critical matters having a mass of five hundred grams or less. The regulation-making power to be conferred by paragraph (e) of the proposed definition of "letter" could be used to solve many problems and to alleviate many concerns. In its Fourth Report for this Session (Statutory Instruments No. 10) your Committee recommended that regulations should be tabled and studied by the appropriate Standing Committees at the same time as they are studying the Bills which provide for their making. Without the regulations to be made under paragraph (e) of the definition of "letter", the definition of "letter" and the proposed exclusions in clause 15(1) are not sufficiently specific.

6. Clauses 17(1)(u) and 37(1) and (2) contemplate regulations being made to subject the postal authorities to civil liability for loss, delay or mishandling of anything deposited at a post office, a liability from which they would otherwise be exempt under clause 37. Here again, it would be desirable if the proposed regulations were to be studied by the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee while it is studying the Canada Post Corporation Bill. Couriers are liable for loss or delay of matter committed to their charge. The position of the Canada Post Corporation when competing with, or taking over under its exclusive privilege, the business presently carried on by courier services deserves to be considered.

7. The definition of "mailable matter" in clause 2 of the Bill is itself a matter for concern. It is said to include "any message, information, funds or goods that by this Act or the regulations may be transmitted by post". There is no definition of "goods" in the Bill and there is, consequently, no upper limit on the mass of items of freight which the Canada Post Corporation might handle. This is of concern to those in the trucking industry particularly.

8. Under clause 17(1)(a), as the Postmaster General wishes to amend it, the Corporation may make regulations defining "mailable matter". It is objectionable on principle to give a power to define by regulation a term that is already defined in the enabling statute. It is not clear just what regulations might appear to define mailable matter. The definition could not by regulation be made narrower than that in clause 2 ("includes . . . "). The inescapable conclusion is that it is sought under clause 17(1)(a) to take power to widen the definition which is set out in clause 2. This is objectionable. Your Committee recommends, therefore, that the words "mailable matter" be deleted from clause 17(1)(a) and that a definition of "goods" be included in clause 2. Should it be too difficult to define "goods" immediately, your Committee recommends that it be defined by regulation but that any regulation that is proposed should be subject to obligatory notice and comment procedures.

9. Pursuant to clause 3, the Bill will, if enacted, be binding on the Crown in right of Canada, the Crown in right of each and every Province and on each and every agent thereof. Your Committee has been informed that the reason for the insertion of the clause is to bind provincial governments and agencies by the postal monopoly from which, it appears to your Committee, they are now free. The Parliament of Canada has not hitherto exercised its undoubted legislative authority to make the postal monopoly binding on the Crown, whether in right of Canada or of a Province. Once it does so, the same confusion will exist in respect of provincial governments and agencies as now exists in the private sector over the right to operate internal mail, message and information delivery services.

The effects of clause 3 are not confined to the Corporation's monopoly but will also render the provincially owned telephone companies (Ontario Northland and the prairie telephone companies) subject to clause 42. This situation is not of immediate concern since all telephone companies seem willing and indeed anxious to co-operate with the proposed Canada Post Corporation in the transmission of electronic mail.

10. Your Committee notes that it is the Postmaster General's intention to move to delete paragraphs (d), (e), (f) and (i) of clause 17(1) and to deal with their subject matter by particular clauses not relying on regulations. This your Committee endorses.

11. Paragraph (m) of clause 17(1) contains a very large and vague grant of enabling power permitting the making of regulations "providing for the holding of mail by the Corporation at the request of the sender or addressee thereof or in any other circumstances specified in the regulations". The underlined words carry with them the potential for the holding of mail for purposes not now envisaged. The reason for this inclusion was explained to your Committee as being, first, to accommodate bulk mailers who mail in advance, which would seem to be a matter covered by the first part of the paragraph and, secondly, to cope with situations in which, because of strikes, insurrection or war, overseas mail is "embargoed". Your Committee recommends that the underlined words be deleted and that some such words as the following be added:

"or at the request of the government of any country or any independent postal authority or in the event of industrial disputes, insurrection or war."

12. Your Committee was informed by the Postmaster General that it was the Government's intention that the Canada Post Corporation should be free to engage not only in the funds transfer business, by means other than the present postal money order, but also in banking operations, as is the case under the present Post Office Act. If this be the case, paragraph (o) of clause 17(1) would seem to require the addition of the words "or put on deposit with the Corporation" (c.f. clause 36).

13. It seems to be clearly contemplated by clauses 17(1)(o), 36 and 2 (definition of "mailable matter") that the Corporation could engage in sophisticated funds transfers and in banking. From the evidence of the President of the Canadian Bankers' Association it appears that the Post Office is not included in the new Canadian Payments Association and was not a party to the prolonged negotiations leading up to the foundation of that body. Your Committee suggests that the Postmaster General and the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee seek the views of the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance on this matter.

14. The President of the Canadian Bankers' Association pointed out to your Committee that paragraph (k) (ii) of clause 17(1)(a) enables the making of regulations providing for the transmission by post free of postage of

"mailable matter relating solely to the business of the Corporation and addressed to or sent by a person engaged in that business"

Since "postage" is defined in clause 2 to mean the charge or surcharge payable for any service provided by the Corporation, it will include the charges for funds transfers. Consequently, this paragraph might be construed as authorizing regulations providing for funds transfers (part of the business of the Corporation) addressed to or sent by a person engaged in that business free of charge. This would enable the Corporation effectively to undercut the sophisticated and extensive payments network already in place in Canada. This is so despite clause 17(4), as that provision does not appear to require a revenue from every activity or line of business of the Corporation.

15. Concerns were expressed to your Committee that paragraph (q) of clause 17(1) could be used to regulate or prohibit the installation of machines belonging to or used by competitors of the Corporation if such machines are necessary to or used in the business of the Corporation. Your Committee is confident that this was not the intent of the draftsman and considers that this fear could be overcome by adding the words "of the Corporation" after the words "or other products or services" and by changing the word "vending" to "dispensing" to accord with the French text. The words "that are necessary or incidental to the business of the Corporation" might then well be considered to be redundant. If there are other machines which should be regulated or prohibited, they should be specified with particularity.

16. In considering paragraph (t) of clause 17(1), your Committee was advised that it was the view of the Post Office Department that the postal agreements or arrangements referred to extend beyond those dealt with in clause 34. Just what might be covered beyond the agreements referred to in clause 17(4) is unclear. Since the Corporation will have the powers of a natural person, it may enter into any agreement it chooses and the only limitation on paragraph (t) is, therefore, the word "postal", which is undefined and the meaning of which would have to be construed from the context of the whole Bill. Paragraph (t), therefore, amounts to an exceptionally broad grant of power to make regulations of unforseeable scope. Consequently, your Committee recommends that it be expressly limited to agreements entered into pursuant to clauses 17(4) and 34 and that the Corporation be required to disclose the agreement or arrangement which is to be carried out by regulations under paragraph (t). Unless such disclosure is made, it will, apart from any other consideration, be impossible for your Committee to scrutinize the regulations made under paragraph (t).

In respect of other agreements or arrangements your Committee feels that the Corporation should rely on the law of contract.

17. Pursuant to the combined effect of clauses 17(1)(u) and 37(3) regulations may be made derogating from the inviolability of the mails. Such regulations may provide for the demanding of matter in the course of post and for its seizure and detention. This provision has been explained as allowing the Corporation to make regulations dealing with inherently dangerous items that are posted and permitting the seizure of mailable matter by way of levying executions on civil judgments. The circumstances in which the inviolability of mail is to be given up should be more clearly set out than they are in clause 37(3).

18. Your Committee draws attention to the very wide scope of paragraph (v) of clause 17(1). Under clause 5 of the Bill the Corporation will be free to provide a huge range of services and systems, some of which such as funds transfers and electronic mail are dealt with only in a limited way in the Bill and may expand drastically. Consequently, paragraph (v) will come in time to be the foundation for the regulations governing the modern technological activities of the Corporation. It amounts therefore, to a general grant of enabling power in a most important area and runs counter to the idea that grants of enabling power should be specific and detailed. Your Committee takes the position that this provision which confers a law making power of great scope on the Executive, is undesirable.

19. Your Committee notes that it is only in respect of regulations setting first class letter rates that proposed regulations of the Corporation must be published before they are made. Your Committee regards it as desirable in principle that all proposed regulations of the Corporation should be published in draft and an opportunity given for public comment before they are made. But particularly in the case of regulations setting rates (paragraph (h)) and defining matters basic to the Corporation's business or of possible public importance (paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (i), (k)(ii), and (m)) notice and comment procedures should be applied. Because it is probable that regulations made under paragraph (v) of clause 17(1) will be of great importance in the future development of the Corporation, they too should be subject to notice and comment procedures.

20. The decision to refer the subject matter of clauses 2, 3 and 17 to your Committee represented the first time that the Government had acted in response to the recommendation of the Committee's Fourt Report, namely, that the regulation-making authority contained in Bills should be referred to the Committee for review and report to the appropriate Standing Committees of the Houses having the Committee stages of the Bills. We have found the procedure of referring the subject matter of enabling clauses to the Committee rather than the clauses themselves to be equally effective. Although it does not permit the Committee to report directly to the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee which is studying the whole Bill, no doubt that Committee will give the same consideration to this Report as it would have if we had reported direct to them.

On the basis of your Committee's experience while considering Bill C-42, it can state that it found the practice both workable and desirable from the point of view of ensuring that the expertise contained in the Committee be used in a nonpartisan fashion to scrutinize at the Committee stage the regulation-making powers in Bills. We believe it will improve the legislative process if in the future the subject matter of all enabling clauses in a Bill is referred to your Committee.

Appendix

2. (1) In this Act,

"Board" means the Board of Directors of the Corporation;

"Chairman" means the Chairman of the Board appointed pursuant to section 7;

"Corporation" means the Canada Post Corporation established by section 4;

"delivery", in respect of mail, means delivery to the addressee thereof;

"deposit at a post office" means to leave in a post office or with a person authorized by the Corporation to receive mailable matter;

"mail" means mailable matter from the time it is deposited at a post office to the time it is delivered;

"mail bag" means any container or covering in which mail is transmitted, whether it contains mail or not;

"mail contractor" means a person who has entered into a contract with the Corporation for the transmission of mail, which contract has not expired or been terminated;

"mail conveyance" means any physical, electronic, optical or other means used to transmit mail;

"mailable matter" includes any message, information, funds or goods that by this Act or the regulations may be transmitted by post;

"Minister" means such member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada as is designated by the Governor in Council to act as the Minister for the purposes of this Act;

"post" means to deposit mailable matter at a post office for transmission by post;

"post office" includes any place, receptacle, device or mail conveyance authorized by the Corporation for the deposit, receipt, sortation, handling, transmission or delivery of mail;

"postage" means the charge or surcharge payable for any product or service provided by the Corporation;

"postage stamp" means any stamp, postage impression or postage meter impression authorized by the Corporation for the purpose of paying postage;

"postal remittance" means any instrument authorized by the Corporation for the remittance of funds;

"postmaster" means a person who is in charge of a postal area or post office, whether in a temporary or permanent capacity;

"President" means the President of the Corporation appointed pursuant to section 8;

"transmit" means to send from one place to another place by any physical, electronic, optical or other means;

"transmit by post" means to transmit through or by means of the Corporation.

(2) For the purposes of this Act,

(a) leaving mail at the place of residence or business of the addressee thereof,

(b) depositing mail in a post office lock box or rural mail box or any other receptacle or device provided for the receipt of mail of the addressee, or

(c) leaving mail with the addressee or his servant or agent or with any other person who may reasonably be considered to be authorized to receive mail by the addressee thereof, according to the usual manner of delivering mail to that addressee, is deemed to be delivery to the addressee.

(3) For the purposes of this Act, a thing is deemed to be in the course of post from the time it is deposited at a post office to the time it is delivered.

Application

3. This Act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province and on any agent thereof.

5. (1) The objects of the Corporation are

(a) to establish and operate a postal service for the collection, transmission and delivery of messages, information, funds and goods both within Canada and between Canada and places outside Canada;

(b) to manufacture and provide such products and to provide such services as are, in the opinion of the Corporation, necessary or incidental to the postal service provided by the Corporation; and

(c) to provide to or on behalf of departments and agencies of, and corporations owned, controlled or operated by, the Government of Canada or any provincial, regional or municipal government in Canada or to any person services that, in the opinion of the Corporation, are capable of being conveniently provided in the course of carrying out the other objects of the Corporation.

(2) While maintaining basic customary postal service, the Corporation, in carrying out its objects, shall have regard to

(a) the desirability of improving and extending its products and services in the light of developments in the field of communications;

(b) the need to conduct its operations on a self-sustaining financial basis while providing a standard of service that will meet the needs of the people of Canada;

(c) the desirability of utilizing the human resources of the Corporation in a manner that will both attain the objects of the Corporation and ensure the commitment and dedication of its employees to the attainment of those objects; and

(d) the need to maintain a corporate identity program approved by the Governor in Council that reflects the role of the Corporation as an institution of the Government of Canada.

14. (1) Subject to section 15, the Corporation has the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, conveying and delivering letters within Canada.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as requiring any person to transmit by post any newspaper, magazine, book, catalogue or goods.

15. (1) The exclusive privilege referred to in subsection 14(1) does not apply to

(a) letters carried incidentally and delivered to the addressee thereof by a friend of the sender or addressee;

(b) commissions, affidavits, writs, processes or proceedings issued by a court of justice;

(c) letters lawfully brought into Canada and immediately deposited thereafter at the post office nearest to the place of entry in Canada;

(d) letters concerning goods for delivery therewith, carried by a common carrier without pay, reward, advantage or profit for so doing;

(e) letters concerning the private affairs of the sender or addressee thereof that are sent casually by a messenger;

(f) letters of any merchant or owner of a cargo vessel or the cargo therein that are carried by such vessel or by any employee of such merchant or owner and delivered to the addressee thereof without pay, reward, advantage or profit for so doing; and

(g) letters exempted by regulations made pursuant to paragraph 17(1)(l).

(2) Nothing in subsection (1) shall be construed as authorizing any person to collect or receive any letters for the purpose of conveying or delivering them as described in that subsection.

17. (1) The Corporation may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, make regulations for the efficient operation of the business of the Corporation and for carrying the purposes and provisions of this Act into effect, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations

(a) prescribing, for the purposes of this Act and the regulations, what is a letter and what is mailable matter, non-mailable matter and undeliverable mail;

(b) classifying mailable matter, including the setting of standards for any class thereof;

(c) prescribing the conditions under which mailable matter may be transmitted by post;

(d) providing for the exclusion of non-mailable matter from mail;

(e) providing for the opening of mail, other than letters, for the determination in any particular case

(i) whether the conditions prescribed pursuant to paragraph (c) have been complied with,

(ii) whether the manner prescribed pursuant to paragraph (i) has been adhered to, or

(iii) whether the mail is non-mailable matter;

(f) providing for the opening of mail for the determination in any particular case whether the mail is undeliverable mail;

(g) providing for the disposition of non-mailable matter, undeliverable mail and mail on which sufficient postage is not paid, including the disposition of any thing found therein;

(h) prescribing rates of postage and the terms and conditions and method of payment thereof;

(i) providing for the reduction of rates of postage on mailable matter prepared in the manner prescribed by the regulations;

(j) providing for the refund of postage;

(k) providing for the transmission by post, free of postage, of

(i) letters, books, tapes, records and other similar material for the use of the blind, and

(ii) mailable matter relating solely to the business of the Corporation and addressed to or sent by a person engaged in that business;

(l) exempting from the exclusive privilege under section 14 letters carried by any naval, army or air forces of any country other than Canada that are in Canada with the consent of the Government of Canada;

(m) providing for the holding of mail by the Corporation at the request of the sender or addressee thereof or in any other circumstances specified in the regulations;

(n) providing for the insurance of mail and the payment of indemnity by the Corporation in case of loss of or damage to mail;

(o) providing for the payment of interest, including the rate thereof, on funds transmitted by post;

(p) governing the design, placement and use of any receptacle or device intended for the deposit, insertion, reception, storage, transmission or delivery of mailable matter;

(q) regulating or prohibiting the installation of machines for vending postage stamps, postal remittances or other products or services that are necessary or incidental to the business of the Corporation;

(r) regulating or prohibiting the manufacture, installation and use of postage meters;

(s) regulating or prohibiting the making or printing of postage impressions;

(t) carrying out any postal agreement or arrangement entered into pursuant to this Act;

(u) dealing with any matter that any provision of this Act contemplates being the subject of regulations; and

(v) providing for the operation of any services or systems established pursuant to this Act.

(2) The rates of postage prescribed pursuant to subsection (1) shall be fair and reasonable and consistent so far as possible with providing a revenue, together with any revenue from other sources, sufficient to defray the costs incurred by the Corporation in the conduct of its operations under this Act.

(3) Every regulation made pursuant to subsection (1) is deemed to have been approved by the Governor in Council sixty days after the day it is submitted to the Governor in Council for approval, unless he has previously given or refused to give such approval.

(4) Notwithstanding subsection (1), the Corporation may prescribe rates of postage otherwise than by regulation for any person who has entered into an agreement with the Corporation for

(a) the variation of rates of postage on the mailable matter of that person in consideration of his mailing in bulk, preparing the mailable matter in a manner that facilitates the processing thereof or receiving additional services in relation thereto; or

(b) the provision of experimental services related to the business of the Corporation for any period not exceeding three years.

(5) The Governor in Council may make regulations providing for the payment of compensation to the Corporation in respect of materials for the use of the blind transmitted in accordance with regulations made pursuant to paragraph (1)(k).

34. The Minister may enter into such agreements or arrangements with the government of any country or any independent postal authorities as appear to him necessary or desirable for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this Act.

36. (1) In this section,

"deposited amount" means an amount that, after the coming into force of this section, is put on deposit with the Corporation or left with the Corporation for transmission by post, but does not include an amount paid to the Corporation on account of services or products to be provided at a future date;

"creditor" means a person to whose credit a deposited amount stands or who is otherwise legally entitled to claim a deposited amount.

(2) Where a deposited amount is less than twenty-five dollars and no transaction has occurred, or statement of account been requested, in relation thereto for a period of thirty years

(a) the creditor shall have no claim in respect of the amount; and

(b) the amount shall be credited in the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the Receiver General on such day as the Minister of Finance may fix.

(3) Every payment made in good faith to a creditor or any other person who reasonably appears to be entitled to a deposited amount is valid and discharges Her Majesty, the Corporation and any employee or agent thereof from all claims by any person for the amount.

(4) Her Majesty, the Corporation and any employee or agent thereof are not bound to see to the execution of any trust, whether express, implied or constructive, to which any deposited amount is subject.

Liability

37. (1) Subject to this Act and the regulations, Her Majesty, the Minister and the Corporation are not liable to any person for any claim arising from the loss, delay or mishandling of anything deposited at a post office.

(2) Subject to this Act and the regulations, a mail contractor is not liable to any person, other than the Corporation, for any claim arising from the loss, delay or mishandling of any mail in the performance of his duties as a mail contractor.

(3) Notwithstanding any other Act or law, but subject to this Act and the regulations, nothing in the course of post is liable to demand, seizure or detention.

42. (1) Every person commits an offence who, without reasonable cause, refuses to permit or delays permitting any mail or mail conveyance to pass on or use any road, ferry or other route or mode of transport access to which is under his control.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), collecting toll, ferriage or other charge for the use of any route or mode of transport is deemed not to be reasonable cause.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 17, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, by way of corollary to what we discussed yesterday on the subject of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, the chairman of that committee has asked for leave to have his committee sit while the Senate is sitting today. My only concern, in moving the motion which I am about to move to that effect, is the question of a quorum for the rest of our deliberations in the Senate chamber. I hope honourable senators will recognize that when they agree to this motion they might have to support the committee by supporting the proceedings of the Senate as well.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Where will the problem of a quorum arise? In the committee or here?

Senator Frith: That is a nice point, senator.

With that preamble I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I rise not to oppose the motion but rather to thank the Leader and Deputy Leader of the Government for their co-operation in making this meeting possible. I should also like to indicate to the members of the committee that the witnesses should be ready at 3 o'clock, if the committee cares to sit at that time. I hope our sitting will not interfere with or cause any problems for this chamber in terms of its quorum.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

IMPORTATION OF OIL FROM SAUDI ARABIA—PRICE INCREASE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the latest oil price increase by Saudi Arabia. I would like the minister to provide, if possible, the precise calculation of the difference between the price which Canada will pay for the oil purchased from Saudi Arabia—the 100,000 barrels, or whatever the total amount is—and the most recent price offered to Canada's producing provinces?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, because of the announcement made by OPEC, there will no doubt be an increase in the amount that Canada will pay for the oil now being imported from Saudi Arabia, which is a significant portion of what we do import.

I should again remind the Leader of the Opposition that we have not made a deal for an additional 100,000 barrels, although there are some negotiations under way. The Leader of the Opposition should also note that we have stated consistently that we have some flexibility in our approach to get back to negotiations with the provinces, and the Minister of Energy had some encouraging remarks to say about that in the other place yesterday.

Senator Flynn: I can understand the reasoning, but I had hoped that the minister would have been able to provide an idea of the difference between the price we pay to Saudi Arabia or to other countries, and the price we pay to Canadian producing provinces. Is it, for example, in the range of $36 per barrel compared to $18 a barrel, or something like that?

In any event, on the basis of the announced price of Saudi Arabian oil, I should like to ask the minister if he has anything to say about the estimates that have been mentioned as an increase in the Oil Import Compensation Program. Some newspapers mentioned today that it is half a billion dollars a year, while others say $1 million per day. Those figures are not in the same range, of course, and I would like the minister to tell us what his own estimate is.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is a little early to give an accurate estimate. However, I shall take the question as notice and refer it to the departments that make these calculations—the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Department of Finance.

Certainly, when there is a change of this nature, because of the Oil Import Compensation Program there will be additional financial requirements. Therefore, I will take the question as notice. I would not attempt to give a precise answer—I know my honourable friend always likes to receive accurate and precise answers—until we have had an opportunity to look at the totality of that fall-out.

I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will also realize that because of a change in the value of the Canadian dollar, the financial requirements will also change.

Senator Flynn: I agree with the minister that I always like precise figures, but I very seldom get them from him.

Senator Olson: All that is necessary is to ask the question in a precise way.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: It is very difficult to do better than I did.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—ENERGY CONSERVATION PROGRAM

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will try to be precise and ask the minister why the government is fudging the figures in respect to energy savings. As an explanation of that succinct and direct question, I refer him to the observations made by the Auditor General in which he criticized the way in which the government presented the progress of its energy conservation program within the government service and arrived at figures substantially lower than those proclaimed by the government.

• (1415)

I would ask the honourable minister if he would endeavour to give us some reconciliation of the figures provided by the Auditor General, as compared to the figures provided by the government, explain to us why they are not the same, and give us the government's view as to which is the correct one, because there should be some answer to this question.

The Auditor General, at the same time, raised a number of observations about the way in which the energy conservation program has been carried out, and made some recommendations as to how it should be improved. I would like to know what the government's reaction to the whole situation is.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and try to provide an answer. I have to remind the honourable senator, however—and I do not like to do it during the last sitting before Christmas—that his preamble completely destroyed his question. First of all he said, "I am going to be precise and succinct," and then he asked why the government fudged its figures. I do not agree that the government fudged its figures.

However, I promised myself, coming in here today, that while my wish for the New Year is that the Senate will return to a Question Period in which senators seek information rather than use it for the purpose of debate, I was not going to bring it up today.

Senator Roblin: I have to respond to the invitation. The minister does not like the word "fudge". All right, I will be a little more precise and tell my honourable friend that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reported that energy use in the 1978-79 fiscal year was 11.3 per cent less than in 1975-76. The Auditor General found that it was only 4.2 per cent less. There is, therefore, about a 7 per cent spread between the finding of the government and the finding of the Auditor General, My question is: How come?

Senator Olson: Well, the "how come?" can only be answered if you make sure that the same factors are put into the calculation. That has to be determined first.

It may easily be true—I think it is true, although I will check—that they did not put everything in. They may be talking about gas and oil as separate entities, or even talking about total energy requirements and use.

Senator Roblin: I can come to my honourable friend's rescue and tell him what the Auditor General said. This is the quote:

> We believe, therefore, that the government should ensure that its reporting performance is as adequate and reliable as possible.

The inference is that the figures given were neither accurate nor reliable.

Senator Perrault: Unfair!

Senator Olson: That is an opinion, not a fact.

THE ECONOMY

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—PROJECTED GROWTH RATE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Official projections of Canada's growth rate for 1981 are constantly being revised downwards. Lask week the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced the results of a study indicating an expected substantial relative decline in investment spending during 1981 by Canada's largest 300 firms. Speaking of precision and of fudging, I thought it might be interesting if I quoted an article from the Globe and Mail of December 11, 1980, as follows:

> The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce said its fourth quarter survey suggests business capital investment will continue to be a source of strength in the economy—

Having said that, the direct quotation is added: "... but at a reduced rate."

That is a nice, positive way of going backwards, by making it sound as if you were really effecting some improvement. In the light of that projection, however, does the government intend to revise its 1981 growth projections downwards still further, or does the minister contend that substantial investment decline will have no effect upon growth?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I was asked essentially that same question yesterday, and the reply that I gave then is equally valid today.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY GENERAL OF NATO—COMMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should like to come back to the answer he gave Senator Haidasz yesterday concerning the situation in Poland. In his reply, the Leader of the Government claimed that, if there was any confusion, it is because the members of the opposition have difficulty following some of the policy formulations. It may be that the members of the opposition suffer from some form of idiosyncrasy that prevents them from always understanding the statements of ministers. That is why, today, pleading this inferiority which afflicts me, I should like to put a supplementary to the question put by Senator Haidasz yesterday.

Naturally, as pointed out by Senator Haidasz, if we go by the statement of the Secretary General of NATO, it is obvious that the ministers of NATO countries, meeting in Brussels, discussed economic, diplomatic and military sanctions were Poland to be invaded by the USSR.

I should like to know, first, whether the Leader of the Government can table the statement of the Secretary General of NATO, Mr. Lance, who to my mind spread considerable confusion about the statement of our own Prime Minister on the situation in Poland following the statement of the Secretary General of NATO, as well as about that of our Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House of Commons.

I therefore wish to know whether or not the statement of the Secretary General of NATO corresponds with what was reported to us. Does it also correspond with the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs? In addition, to throw light on the situation, can the Leader of the Government table in this house—I am asking him to do so, once again—the message sent to the President of the USSR, Mr. Brezhnev, with regard to the critical situation in Poland?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

I do not have a copy of that important message available on my desk at the present time. I can report, however, the type of meeting held in Brussels on December 11 and 12, and the participation of Canada in sessions which very much involved consideration of the Polish situation.

The foreign ministers of NATO met in Brussels on December 11 and 12. On the first day of the meeting, ministers conducted a general review of the international situation. The current situation in Poland was one of the subjects discussed. The ministers agreed unanimously, again with the full support of Canada, that every possible effort should be directed toward avoiding a Soviet intervention, a move which they did not consider to be inevitable. They stressed the importance of responding sympathetically to Polish requests for economic assistance, noting that care should be taken to avoid interfering in Polish internal affairs.

The ministers asked the permanent representatives accredited to NATO to follow the developments closely and to study possible political, diplomatic and economic responses to a Soviet intervention in Poland. Again, this was fully supported by Canada's representatives.

In the final communiqué, the ministers stressed that détente could not survive if the U.S.S.R. once again violated the fundamental rights of all states to territorial integrity and independence. While this does not meet all the terms and conditions set forth by the honourable senator in his question, supplementary material will be sought.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: On a supplementary. The minister said that this statement from NATO ministers contained economic sanctions. Will Canada take part in these sanctions? If so, how does it expect to maintain credibility in the eyes of the Soviets since after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan the Conservatives imposed economic sanctions which the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board lifted? Will Russia consider our actions credible? Will we be taken seriously if we take part in the economic sanctions mentioned by the minister?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is an argumentative question; it is a rhetorical question, and it is not a question which I am prepared to answer.

• (1425)

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—SPACE OCCUPIED BY NEWS MEDIA—RENTAL VALUE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. As honourable senators are aware, the news media occupy most of the north face of the third floor of this Centre Block Building. My question is as follows: Could the leader inquire how many square feet are so occupied by the media; secondly, what would the rental value of that space be as a commercial area in this part of the city; and, finally, do the media pay rent for this space? In other words, are the media being subsidized by the Canadian taxpayers in whole or in part in their use of this space?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will press for an early answer.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—MANAGEMENT CONTROLS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government relating to Chapter 6 of the Auditor General's Report. This chapter deals with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and paragraph 6.37 of this chapter states that the department intends to write off $17 million of $81 million loaned by the Indian Economic Development Account, which is obviously a high loss ratio. The Auditor General reports that a significant portion of this write-off stems from inadequate management controls.

My questions are: What controls are now being implemented? Who will exercise these controls? What is the cost of these controls? Will someone be monitoring the effectiveness of these controls?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the detailed nature of the question makes it imperative that it be taken as notice.

INDIAN BANDS—INTEREST PAID ON TRUST FUNDS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question dealing with the same aspect of the Auditor General's report, and with respect to a press release issued by the National Indian Brotherhood relating to complaints about interest rates paid to Indian bands on their trust funds. The Auditor General reported that the Indian bands were paid interest on their funds at a percentage rate determined by the Governor in Council. That is the complaint.

My question is: Is the rate competitive with privately offered rates, and what is the precise current rate? Could the leader tell us, for instance, what the rate is today, how long that rate has been in effect, and how often it is adjusted?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, but as far as establishing such rates by Order in Council, this, of course, is an established practice at various levels of government.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND—DEVELOPMENT OF HYDROELECTRIC POWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It was reported in a news release today that Mr. Robert Boyd, President of Hydro-Quebec, indicated a willingness to sit down with the Government of Newfoundland to discuss Upper Churchill power with a view to developing the Lower Churchill, a development which would enable us to supply a lot of our energy needs.

Could the minister tell us what action his government is going to take in any discussions that might be held, and whether his government intends to intervene and try to come to a solution that would result in a saving of so much energy for Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not aware of the news release referred to, but I will take notice of the question and try to obtain an answer as soon as possible. In any event, if during the recess some information comes to my attention that I feel would be useful to Senator Marshall, I will convey that information to him before we meet in the New Year.

CONTROL OF RESOURCES

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a supplementary question dealing with the Hibernia discovery. These seems to be a reluctance on the part of the conglomerate that makes up Hibernia, and by other oil explorers, to go ahead unless there is some determination between the federal and provincial governments as to the control of resources.

• (1430)

I wonder whether the Minister of State for Economic Development could delve into that matter and give us an answer when he gives the answer to my other question.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, yes, I can try to provide a report on the status of the negotiations, if that is the right word, respecting the ownership.

My honourable friend will know that there are some people in the federal government—and perhaps in the provincial governments, too—who would like to have a reference of this matter to the Supreme Court. I am not sure that there has not been agreement that this would be a joint reference.

The other part of the question is somewhat different. The honourable senator asks whether or not the consortium doing the exploration and development would possibly make a commitment about whether government policy is inhibiting their activity. Most of these activities are likely to take place, of course, in a régime of uncertainty as to what the rules will be, so I am sure they will be apprehensive about that.

THE ECONOMY

PRESENTATION OF NEW BUDGET

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is it now the plan of the government that a new budget will be brought down in the month of March?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, it is not.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—STATEMENTS BY FORMER MINISTERS OF FINANCE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I noted recently that Mr. Donald Macdonald, a former federal Minister of Finance, and a former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has added his voice in support of those who feel that a much larger oil price increase is warranted. He disagrees with his colleagues in Ottawa as to the rate of the increase. This appears to be in "synch" with the recent call by another former federal finance minister, Mr. John Turner.

I wonder if the words of these heirs presumptuous and heirs presumptive to the tattered mantle of the Liberal leadership are an indication of changes in the Liberal policy, or are we to assume that these are voices crying in the wilderness?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): These gentlemen are entitled to their opinions. Their views will be listened to with interest by the government.

Senator Flynn: That is the best you can do.

COMMUNICATIONS

BROADCASTING—CONTROL OF PAY TELEVISION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on December 4, the Honourable Senator Smith asked whether any agreement had been reached recently among the provinces that they have jurisdiction over pay television. He asked whether this had been communicated to the federal government, and, if so, what was the position of the federal government in respect of it.

The agreement among the provinces has not been communicated formally to the federal government, although it has been reported in the press and some provincial views respecting pay television have been included in the various communiqués which were issued following that conference.

He then went on to ask whether the government had taken a clear position on the decision of the provinces regarding pay television.

The answer is that the federal government has a clear position respecting pay television. On October 21, the Minister of Communications, the Honourable Francis Fox, indicated publicly in a speech to the Canadian Broadcasting Executives Society that he recognized the need for a strongly Canadian-oriented pay-TV service based on the prerequisites that it contribute positively and significantly to broadcasting in Canada, that it include the use of Canadian resources and that it stimulate Canadian program production industry.

On October 21, 1980, the CRTC announced that it anticipated being in a position to deal with the introduction of pay-TV in Canada as soon as the steps necessary to ensure extension of services had been taken. Provinces have unanimously agreed that priority should be given to the extension of services, and that the introduction of pay-TV should follow that.

It is the view of the government that the proposed hearings by the CRTC would provide the most appropriate forum to determine an approach that takes into account the variety of interests respecting this matter and would avoid a fragmented and balkanized approach to this matter.

May I read once again the question posed by Senator Smith, because I think there was a transposition of words. His question was: Has the agreement reached recently among the provinces that they have jurisdiction over pay-TV been communicated to the federal government, and if so, what is the position of the federal government in respect of it?

• (1435)

THE CONSTITUTION

PATRIATION—GOVERNMENT REACTION TO RESULT OF GALLUP POLL

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I now have the answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on December 10 concerning a possible meeting with the provinces to come to some agreement on an amending formula.

The government sees no reason for a meeting with the provinces at this time. The government gave an indication of what it was proposing to the provinces in May, after the Quebec referendum. The premiers had the texts in front of them all summer. Those who disagree with the constitutional package have had ample opportunity to say so during the summer negotiations, the First Ministers' Conference, and before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NUCLEAR FUSION RESEARCH

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the answer to a question asked by Senator Yuzyk on October 31 last concerning nuclear fusion. It is a rather lengthy reply, running some three pages, and I would appreciate the co-operation of honourable senators in simply having it incorporated in today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

> Given the budgetary constraints we have, and the very sizeable funding requirements necessary to advance some of our alternative energy supply options, such as frontier gas and oil, heavy oil recovery, improved tertiary recovery, coal liquefaction or gasification, both through development and demonstration phases, we are going to have to make some choices about which to pursue.
> Fusion power is certainly a long-term supply option. Some of those knowledgeable in the field predict that commercially-reliable fusion power is some 40 to 50 years away. And while it may offer an inexhaustible fuel supply, Canada has another nuclear option which also offers a virtually inexhaustible fuel supply, and an option whose development could, it is believed, be achieved more easily and more quickly. I refer to the thorium fuel cycle for our CANDU system. Moreover, it would use existing Canadian technological and industrial capability in a proven hardware system. There are, it must be noted, those who express considerable doubts about the feasibility of fusion power.

While fusion is being promoted as a "clean" power source, this argument is, if not questionable, certainly premature. While the process does not inherently use fissile materials, any country possessing a fusion power system, or any other sizeable source of neutrons, could produce such materials if it wished to do so. In addition, there will certainly be radioactive by-products, although perhaps not as long-lived or as much as in fission power.

Another factor to be considered concerns the role of fusion research in fostering indigenous research and technological innovation.

We should be comparing what can be achieved in fusion research and in other major R&D programs, both in the conduct of and arising from these programs. In this regard, the National Research Council has initiated studies, or is in the process of doing so, to obtain additional information with respect to its proposals for a national program of fusion research which would involve provincial governments, industry and the universities.

The proposed national program calls for research of international calibre in three areas—magnetic confinement, inertial confinement (laser fusion) and fusion materials research engineering. An obvious question is whether Canada would be advised to specialize in only one or perhaps two of these areas, to increase our chances of mounting an effort which will provide an accepted contribution and full-fledged partnership in the work of other countries.

We are aware that opportunities for international collaboration do not exist forever and a too-long deferred decision on the extent and nature of a Canadian fusion research program could mean that Canada no longer had a contribution to make that would be of interest to others working in fusion power development. The government hopes to be able to announce a decision on the nature and extent of government support for a fusion research program in the near future.

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)

COST OF PRINTING MONTHLY APPENDIX

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 12, 1980, Senator Grosart asked a question respecting the cost of printing the monthly appendix to the Debates of the Senate, which I answered on November 18 on the basis of information I had been provided with—information that I believe to be accurate. However, there was an aspect to the matter that I did not deal with at that time, and since it is preferable to have complete information on the subject, I have been asked to add the following:

> Printing costs contain both a fixed cost element per page (composition), and variable costs per 1,000 pages (press run), a standard practice in the printing trades. Accordingly, the total cost a particular issue of Debates of the Senate would depend upon the number of pages produced and the quantity printed.
> Based on the above, the cost per copy of the 24-page appendix to the Debates appearing November 6 was approximately 62 cents, or 2.6 cents a page.

SMALL LOANS ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the third reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not propose to make extended remarks at this point, because when the committee's report was presented last evening I gave a brief explanation. It is my understanding that several honourable senators wish to speak on the motion for the third reading of this bill, and in order not to pre-empt their time, and with a view to there being royal assent later today, I will say nothing further at this point.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, following the conversations I had yesterday morning with Senator McIlraith, I made some remarks last night concerning the bill which has been before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for quite some time. Up until the day before yesterday, however, nobody had suggested that this bill should be disposed of most urgently. I was therefore somewhat surprised when the Honourable André Ouellet, whom I met Monday afternoon in Quebec City, suggested that this bill should be passed as soon as possible. His main argument was that if the Senate failed to pass this bill before the end of the year, several financial institutions, including caisses populaires and credit unions, would be compelled to submit a fairly complicated report.

That was then Mr. Ouellet's argument. I replied to him that I had no intention, through my sole opposition, to create difficulties to so many institutions, and that I had no objection to the committee considering the minister's request. Following this conversation, Senator McIlraith telephoned me yesterday morning in Quebec City. I had then suggested that the committee should meet today, Wednesday. When I arrived here last night, I was advised that the committee had already met yesterday afternoon and had found that the bill should be reported without amendment. I was a little surprised and uneasy, as I indicated yesterday, specially because the committee had apparently agreed that at least one amendment should be made to section 305 of the Criminal Code, providing so to speak for a new crime, in accordance with the bill.

I suppose that, had we suggested amendments to that provision, we would have had to send Bill C-44 back to the other place, where those changes might not have been accepted before the Christmas break. It would have resulted in additional delay that could have extended to the end of January and perhaps even later.

My position is rather simple. Briefly, I am not happy with this bill. I do not feel that it is the real solution to the problem envisaged when the bill was drafted and introduced. However, if I am to be told that it will create problems for everyone, or at least to a large number of financial institutions such as caisses populaires, credit unions, I am quite willing to change my hesitation to a mere indication of my disapproval in principle.

In that sense, I am quite resigned to the bill being read the third time this afternoon and passed on division. On the other hand, all we have is the commitment of Mr. Ouellet, who is not Minister of Justice, to the effect that specific cases will be examined in light of this bill, this legislation that repeals the Small Loans Act and creates a new offence, a new crime, in the case of any person who charges a rate of interest of over 60 per cent for a loan.

Senator Asselin: A rate of 59 per cent is not criminal?

Senator Flynn: No, it has to be 60 per cent otherwise it is not a criminal rate. I have doubts about the repeal of the Small Loans Act: really, some other solution could have been found. The banks do not have a maximum rate of interest but, in a way, their rates can be controlled within reason, if you will, through the Bank of Canada and the competition between institutions.

With regard to credit unions, perhaps they are in the same situation. But I would say that in the case of all other lending institutions, if there is no control whatsoever, as the case will be when the Small Loans Act is repealed, then their interest rates will certainly be much higher than those of the banks or the credit unions. Then, undeniably, interest rates could very well be pretty close to the criminal rate, that is 60 per cent. I doubt that we can find a real solution. Not that I claim to have one, but I feel that what we are told is far from convincing.

As for the criminal offence created by this legislation, we are told that the 60 per cent rate—so I was told when I was Minister of Justice—that the so-called criminal rate is meant to help police forces control "loan sharks".

Senator Frith: Les requins de la finance.

Senator Flynn: Yes, indeed. But that expression in French is pejorative; the late Réal Caouette felt all banks were loan sharks. Personally, I would not dare put banks and "loan sharks" in the same group. Be that as it may, let us say real sharks, in every sense of the word.

I am far from convinced that this provision will help the police. I strongly doubt it. What characterizes these sharks is the fact that they use other means of persuasion to obtain a reimbursement of loans, and interest which is usurious. They use violence. They use blackmail. They use all kinds of methods which are already classified as crimes under the Criminal Code.

In any case, I have noted that Mr. Ouellet, on behalf of the Minister of Justice, has undertaken to report within about a year, as I recall—approximately one year, Senator McIlraith?—to report within a year, as I was saying, on the results of this new provision.

I believe that this provision will not be used very often because it will not be very effective. Police forces often have the habit of asking that the Criminal Code be strengthened, that something be added to it, or that the number of offences be increased as soon as they have problems in applying the law. Everything becomes a crime simply to help police forces. For my part, I have always been opposed to this concept or this philosophy. I would like the Criminal Code to remain a criminal code, and I would prefer other methods to be used when other problems come to light.

I am therefore very dissatisfied with these restrictions. I believe that it would have been better to wait. After much criticism and much urging of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of Justice, we would perhaps have found a better solution. We would probably have found something better than what has been suggested.

In view of the circumstances, I believe that I should bow to the inevitable. However, I must tell the Senate that I believe we are making a mistake. It is not the first time and it will not be the last.

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I too am disappointed with the results of this bill. The committee really did not have any indication of its urgency, and it had been before us for a couple of months. Counsel to the committee had proposed certain technical amendments with which we were not satisfied, so when the matter came up yesterday we really did not have any other choice but to report the bill without amendment. However, in speaking today I would like to comment on the undertaking given by the minister and as reported by Senator McIlraith.

In the report of the proceedings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee there is this:

> Mr. Ouellet, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, having talked with Mr. Chrétien, the Minister of Justice, has given us an undertaking to continue to have this clause examined by the appropriate officers of the government, in conjunction with our counsel, with a view to improving the section under discussion—clause 9 of the bill—to meet the arguments raised in our evidence before this committee, and to bring forward, if the facts seem to indicate that it is desirable—

And I particularly draw your attention to those words:

> —proposed amendments, or to bring the clause before us when the omnibus Criminal Code amendments come before us—I would expect within the year; is that a reasonable assumption?

HON. MR. OUELLET: Yes, I think so.

In speaking yesterday, Senator McIlraith used the words:

> If found warranted, such amendments would be introduced for examination and action by Parliament in the Criminal Code omnibus amending bill that is anticipated within a year.

When Mr. Ouellet made his statement in the committee yesterday, I was not satisfied. I wanted to pin him down a bit more than what appeared in his statement, so I asked him the following question:

> It is not clear to me whether the Minister of Justice conceded that they should be amended and improved, and that he will bring in such amendments and improvements which we can consider a year from now or is he simply saying, "If I do, you will have a chance to consider them.

Mr. Ouellet made a reply which I shall not read, and then I asked another question.

> That does not quite answer my question whether or not the Department of Justice already concedes that there should be some amendments that can be approved. That is all.
>
> HON. MR. OUELLET: The answer is yes, but it cannot be carte blanche, because we don't yet know what final wording the Senate will recommend.
>
> The Minister of Justice told me, however, that I could tell you that, indeed, there is room for improvement, and along that line he is ready to accept or to entertain, at the appropriate time, any amendments your committee will want to make.

• (1450)

Therefore, I believe the sort of hedging phrase "if found warranted" used by Senator McIlraith really should not have been included in his summary of the undertaking given by Mr. Ouellet. In fact, we have been given a firm undertaking that amendments are needed, and that they will be proposed by the Minister of Justice.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of Senator McIlraith? I mentioned that I would like to have within one year a report by the Department of Justice on the experience with this new criminal law section. I would also like the Department of Justice to monitor the effect of this new section on provincial laws that exist to control unconscionable practices to see whether the tendency of the courts would be to consider interest of close to 60 per cent as quite normal, in view of the adoption of this new Criminal Code section.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am not sure if the Minister of Justice and the Department of Justice has the responsibility for monitoring the provincial legislation. According to my understanding—I am not absolutely certain about this—it is the responsibility of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Department of Justice has a more limited area of responsibility.

[Senator Godfrey.]

In any event, we did discuss the ongoing nature of the requirement to keep not only this point but all the points that had been raised in connection with this criminal law clause of the bill under examination, and to have counsel in the Justice Department, notwithstanding the fact that our committee was reporting the bill yesterday, continue the work by looking at proposals and counterproposals for amending the clause. I must confess that I found that there were three agencies of government, or three departments, concerned with this. There was the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the office of the Superintendent of Insurance—which comes under the Finance Department—and the Department of Justice.

I hope my answer has adequately dealt with the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition. I quite understand and appreciate his position about yesterday's meeting being called earlier than anticipated. A situation had arisen with respect to having the minister come before us. He was committed to appear before a committee of the other house at 9.30 a.m., 3.30 p.m. and 8 p.m. I was not sure of the ongoing position this morning, nor was he. The meeting was called rather more quickly than I would have wished. But I did take the precaution of advising the executive assistant to the Leader of the Opposition and asking him to attend. Whether he did so, I do not know, but I did ask him. I recognize the embarrassment of the Leader of the Opposition on that point, but I do not think there is anything more that I can add.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

On the Order:

> Consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to implement conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and the Republic of Liberia, Canada and the Republic of Austria, Canada and Italy, Canada and the Republic of Korea, Canada and the Socialist Republic of Romania and Canada and the Republic of Indonesia and agreements between Canada and Malaysia, Canada and Jamaica and Canada and Barbados and a convention between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Hicks.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I move that these amendments be concurred in. We have before us an amended version of Bill S-2—or to be precise, if honourable senators refer to page 659 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for yesterday, Tuesday, December 16, 1980, they will see a series of proposed amendments to that bill.

It will be recalled that this house gave third reading to Bill S-2 on June 4, 1980. At that time, the bill embraced tax treaties with 11 countries, namely Austria, Barbados, Great Britain, Indonesia, Italy, Jamaica, Liberia, Malaysia, Romania, South Korea and Spain. The amended version contains the treaties with all those countries, except Liberia. So that the nature of the detailed amendments set out on page 659 is merely to remove all references to Liberia in the bill.

Honourable senators may also recall that when I moved second reading of Bill S-17, to implement tax treaties with Australia and New Zealand, on December 4, 1980, I indicated that Bill S-2 rested in committee in the other place because some members of that place were fearful of the inclusion of Liberia, which they suggest may be a tax haven. The committee of the other place met on December 9, 1980, and it was agreed, with the concurrence of the government, to remove from Bill S-2 the approval at this time of the tax treaty with Liberia.

I can mention a few of the factors that led the committee of the other house, and the other house itself, to arrive at that decision. First, six of the tax treaties—those with Austria, Indonesia, Italy, Korea, Malaysia and Spain—could be made effective from January 1, 1980 if they are ratified before the end of this year. This would be to the advantage of all those affected by such treaties, and therefore it is highly desirable that the treaties be ratified before the end of 1980.

Secondly, representatives of a number of foreign governments have made numerous representations to the Canadian authorities complaining about the long delays in the Canadian ratification process. While they understood and were sympathetic to the problem with the Liberian treaty, they could hardly accept that their own treaties, which did not raise difficulties, should be delayed for reasons outside of their interests.

Thirdly, the treaty with the United Kingdom would require renegotiation if not ratified before the end of the year, as its revisions would become effective retroactively for a number of years, some of which might be statute-barred next year.

Fourthly, generally a number of companies have been, or are, in the process of negotiating contracts with other countries on the basis that the advantages of the tax treaties would be available. Any further delays in the ratification of those treaties would only add to their frustration.

The government has undertaken to review the provisions designed to avoid abuse of the tax treaty with Liberia, with a view to tightening them if necessary, and to reintroduce that treaty for ratification as soon as possible. In the meantime, we should proceed with ratifying the treaties with the other 10 countries.

All in all, I believe the amendments, which secured the passage of the bill in the other place, should receive the approval of this house in order to enable the treaties, other than that with Liberia, to be implemented without further delay, and I invite support for my motion for concurrence in these amendments.

Motion agreed to and amendments concurred in.

CLEAN AIR ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved the second reading of Bill C-51, to amend the Clean Air Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is an amendment to the Clean Air Act, which is found in chapter 47 of the Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72. The bill before us proposes amendments to two sections, section 9 and section 16, and the addition of a new section 21.1.

In what I hope will be brief and to-the-point remarks in support of these amendments, I propose, first, to tell honourable senators what I understand to be the main purpose of the bill and then to describe the bill in the context in the main scheme of the statute; second, to describe the context of the amendments in the present practice with reference to the provinces; and third, to define its context in reference to our position, policies and co-operative arrangements with the United States of America.

The purpose of these amendments is to provide the residual federal authority to control, as necessary, sources of air pollution adversely affecting another country. We believe the amendments are desirable in themselves, but we believe that they are particularly propitious at the moment, and their pre-eminent reason is to establish the reciprocity required by the United States Clean Air Act and, place the United States federal authorities in a position to more vigorously address the acid rain problem.

The Clean Air Act, to which this bill proposes amendments, sets up a plan relating to air contaminants and air pollution. Section 3 and its subsections refer to "national ambient air quality objectives"—which is not as esoteric an expression as it sounds—and they set up a system of research information, data collection, and establishment of national ambient air quality objectives.

National emission standards and guidelines are set out in section 7.

In section 9, which is one of the sections that is proposed to be amended, the prohibition of contravention of the emission standards is set up. That is the key section which provides for an offence and for prohibition of contravention of the standards.

Section 10 of the act deals with federal works, undertakings and business, and develops some special sections with reference to that subject. Those will be of some relevance since that expression is mentioned in the proposed amendments.

The act goes on to deal with the composition of fuels and the powers of inspectors, and those sections are proposed to be amended in order to give effect to the clause which is to be added. The act then deals with provincial co-operation, regulations, forfeiture, and so on.

Honourable senators, I have outlined the basic structure of the main statute, the Clean Air Act.

The amendments provide the Governor in Council, on the advice of the Minister of the Environment, discretionary authority to regulate individual emission sources or classes of sources which cause or contribute to air pollution which, in the minister's opinion, is injurious or may be anticipated to injure the health, safety or welfare of persons in another country. That is set out in clause 21.1 in the bill.

If I may revert just for a moment, honourable senators, section 9(1) is the first section to be amended, and all that is added is subclause (c). It adds to the two classes in section 9(1) a third class, and that is:

> (c) any source in respect of which a specific emission standard has been prescribed pursuant to section 21.2,

The amendment to section 9(1) is what is sometimes called an incidental or ancillary amendment; in other words, the main amendment is the addition of clause 21.1, and section 9(1) simply had to be amended to make sense of the main amendment which is the addition of clause 21.1.

On page 2 of the bill, section 16(1) has to be amended to give sense to clause 21.1 by adding the provision of clause 21.2 to the provisions of section 16, which deals with the operation of a federal work, undertaking or business.

That again brings us to the main clause that is being put to the Senate for its support. The first is clause 21.1(1), which I referred to before reverting to the incidental amendments. There are three subclauses: The first deals with the Governor in Council provisions; the second requires the Minister of the Environment, before exercising his responsibilites under the first category, to be willing to receive, through appropriate channels, and to take account of, related representations from the foreign country adversely affected or likely to be adversely affected by pollutants from a Canadian source. Therefore, you can see the scheme is starting to evolve; essentially, as I mentioned, what we are looking at is legislation to try to tighten the reciprocity between the United States and Canada on the question of rain in particular, which, as we know, transcends all international borders. No acid rain ever needs a customs or immigration permit to get from the United States to Canada or from Canada to the United States. This amendment attempts to tighten the reciprocity.

The third subclause requires the Minister of the Environment, before exercising his responsibilities, to consult with the provinces where the source or sources of pollutants of concern are located and to seek the application of provincial law to control the sources to a level judged adequate by the minister. Here an attempt to tighten up international co-operation is being made and, of course, to seek provincial co-operation since often that co-operation is necessary to make any reciprocal scheme work.

Clause 21.2 specifies that the discretionary authority outlined would be exercised only on behalf of a country which, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, provides Canada with comparable legislative protection. In other words, we would not be doing this unless we would expect that the United States provided us with the same protection. If they complained that some pollutant had its source in Canada, then this amendment would help us do something about it. We would be doing it on the understanding, which is correct, that if the source comes from the United States, they would have the power to deal with the complaint from us.

The second of the three general areas and contexts, honourable senators, is the context of this amendment in relation to present practices in Canada with the provinces.

• (1510)

An objective analysis of Canada's response over the years to incidents of trans-boundary pollution originating in Canada would show that, working through and with the provinces involved, we have acted in the spirit of these proposed amendments. We have traditionally taken full account of the concerns of the United States, and the provinces have generally been willing to modify their pollution control requirements where reliable evidence of actual damage or likely damage to the United States has been forthcoming. There is no reason to believe that this responsible attitude on the part of the provinces will change in the future. Indeed, it is our hope that the pollution control authority provided to the federal government under these amendments will never need to be used. This message has been conveyed to the provincial authorities.

The third and final context for our understanding of these amendments is the bill's context with reference to the history of our relations with the United States on this subject.

Honourable senators will remember that last summer the Minister of the Environment met with his counterpart in the United States and signed a Memorandum of Intent, which the Governments of Canada and the United States signed on August 5, 1980, expressing both the intent of both nations to develop a bilateral agreement to combat trans-boundary air pollution. It will be remembered that the particular concern was the alarming information that both countries were getting with reference to the damage done by acid rain.

That Memorandum of Intent also commits both nations to take interim actions under existing authorities to vigorously enforce existing regulations. The amendment before us is therefore very much in the spirit of our negotiations with the Government of the United States in that it is an unequivocal expression of appropriate Canadian federal authority over pollution crossing international boundaries. The provision of legislative protection to the United States equivalent to that which now exists in their Clean Air Act will place both countries on equal footing in offering protection to its neighbours against environmental damage from air pollution. It will consequently strengthen the hands of those within the United States Congress who are seeking legislative authority to control acid-causing pollutants. Considering the strong support Canada has given in recent years—and when I say "Canada," I mean the Canadian government and the provincial governments—in international fora to the principle that nations have a responsibility to avoid causing trans-boundary environmental damage, it is appropriate that the federal authority necessary to live up to that principle be embodied in relevant legislation.

Honourable senators, if we are able to give speedy approval to these amendments, it will add to the weight of an opinion shared by all senators and all Canadians to the collective view that acid rain is a unique menace to which we must respond vigorously.

I do believe that the global village that has been described by Mr. McLuhan and others, or how global our village is, is illustrated by this menace we share with the United States, and to some extent with all our fellow human beings.

I am going to ask honourable senators to give second and third readings to this bill today because there are some administrative objectives to be met between the two countries' departments. Those can be met, we hope, if they receive legislative authority to do so by establishing reciprocity between the United States and Canada with respect to this serious source of air pollution.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I suppose it is somewhat difficult to argue with the purposes and objects set out in these proposed amendments. Some day the deputy leader will have to explain to me how worthwhile this legislation is when yesterday we discussed an oil tanker trying to find its way—albeit, full of water—through difficult straits. That tells us that, with the best intentions in the world, some day we are going to be shipping oil through those straits, otherwise these tests would not be conducted.

In any event, I do wish to say that the amendment to this legislation is welcomed by Ontario, as I found out today, just as it is welcomed by such provinces as New Brunswick and British Columbia. There is no doubt that it is a step in the right direction. I think both sides of this chamber welcome legislation setting out what we usually call motherhood issues. This is something that will help clean up the environment for our American friends, and hopefully, it will prompt them to clean up something for us.

I have listened with the greatest of respect to Senator Godfrey while he was doing an outstanding job as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. Day after day, meeting after meeting, and again in reports he makes to this chamber, he has criticized government by regulation; he has criticized giving wide discretionary powers. Time and time again we have heard how it is abused and how it is the second best way of governing, all others being better. We accept the fact that we need some regulation, but I must tell the deputy leader that one has to wonder about the form of this bill, or indeed be nervous or suspicious about it. It is rather wide-ranging.

Clause 3 of the bill, dealing with section 21.1, says, "The Minister has reason to believe", without setting any standards or without saying how or why. It goes on to say: "that may reasonably be expected to constitute a significant danger to the health, safety or welfare of persons in a country other than Canada". As I said, it does not set out anything.

Another part of the bill that is bothersome to me is that the minister may, on the basis of recommendations made to him, notify the province or the particular industry, and then proceed to hear representations. That does not say that he must give reasons for a decision; it does not set out any principles under which he would operate to render that decision.

I am sure that people like Senator Godfrey and those who laboured in his committee would find that kind of criticism. I am sure honourable senators understand that I am talking in terms of reform as opposed to substance.

I appreciate the urgency of this matter and the time limit imposed. I accept the statement made by the deputy leader that in order to complete these administrative arrangements we ought to proceed with this bill. It would be welcome to have an undertaking from the government that some rules and definitions will be forthcoming in the New Year. For instance, the minister might have to give reasons for his decision. I cite that as one quick example. One would hope that in this day and age there could be an appeal of some form from some ill-founded or unfair decision. In this day and age when we are able to measure the pollution problem by scientific means, I do not know why the legislation would not set out what the particular danger level is. If that were the case, there would not be any discretion; one would act when the dangerous levels were reached. Notwithstanding these concerns—and I suggest to you, honourable senators, that they are genuine, although I worry that if we proceed in this sort of eleventh-hour fashion too often we will have the problem come back to haunt us later when we are stuck with what we have passed in haste—I do urge passage of the bill without any reference to committee. I do not see what purpose that would serve. I concur in the comments of Senator Frith in suggesting that we proceed with it today.

• (1520)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, what Senator Nurgitz just said has caused me to rise for just a minute to point out that phrases like "the Minister has reason to believe" are phrases that the committee of which I am joint chairman has been objecting to for some years. If the recommendations contained in our report brought out in July are accepted, then the enabling clauses of bills like this will be referred, as the enabling clause in the Canada Post Office bill was, to our committee—just the enabling clauses—and we can point out that words of this kind should be deleted. The government will then not be able to get away with it as they have been doing in the past. The only reason for those words is to block off appeals to the courts, and to ensure that the government has complete and absolute discretion without any hope whatsoever of an appeal to the courts.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before the bill is, in fact, read the third time, I want to associate myself with the concern expressed by Senator Nurgitz on the question of tanker tests. He knows that I share his concern. I have nothing further to say about that matter, except, of course, that it is a test that the United States has decided to conduct. I can see the reason for his concern and why he has associated it with what is here, a co-operative scheme to avoid the possible consequences of that kind of thing.

On the question of the regulations, he knows I share his views also about the danger and the difficulty of finding that balance between discretion that needs to be exercised for fast action on the one hand, and the danger in a set of criteria so exacting that the process can bog down. To find that balance is, I think, one of the difficulties we face in trying to respond legislatively to problems such as that of acid rain.

I wanted to put that on the record. I appreciate his comments and those of Senator Godfrey on the subjects raised.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

December 17, 1980

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Julien Chouinard, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 17th day of December, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 4, the debate on the motion of Senator Hicks, for the second reading of Bill S-17, to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the sponsor of this bill, Honourable Senator Hicks, introduced it by saying that he introduced a similar bill earlier this year. This makes him something of an expert on taxation. I am not, and therefore my remarks will be very brief.

I appreciate Senator Hicks' explanation, which was clear and concise, and I thank him for it.

The conventions outlined in Bill S-17 are similar in nature to those conventions or treaties negotiated with other countries. I believe there are something like 24 nations with which we have similar treaties now.

Senator Hicks: There are now 34 such countries.

Senator Phillips: Thank you for the correction, Senator Hicks. The number keeps increasing almost as fast as the national debt.

The treaties provide for a 15 per cent tax on dividends levied by the country of origin. The interest earned is also subject to the same rate of taxation. As one would expect to find in a taxation bill, every aspect of taxation is covered. The subjects covered include alienation of immovable and movable property, directors' fees, athletes' remuneration, pensions and annuities. I find the use of the word "alienation" rather intriguing and perhaps a word of explanation is in order. For lawyers, "alienation" means "transfer of ownership", and for the rest of us, who say what we mean, it means "sale".

The source country retains the right to tax capital gains on the sale of real property and shares in a real estate corporation. Senator Grosart, who has often spoken on bills of this nature, raised two favourite topics, the first of which was in connection with the section dealing with the regulations, and the use of the phrase "such regulations as are necessary." He appears to have been successful in making this phrase standard terminology, as it is included in this bill.

The second point often raised by Senator Grosart dealt with the supplementary conventions and their approval by Parliament. The rather complicated procedure for debate and consideration in either house found in previous treaties is repeated in Bill S-17. I am not going to go through the procedure, but I merely repeat the question that has often been raised in the past: If the order in council stands without approval of either house, then why insert it in the bill?

The sponsor of the bill pointed out that pensions and annuities are taxable by the country in which the recipient resides. Canada retains its right to tax pensions paid to citizens in New Zealand and Australia. In the case of New Zealand, two partial exemptions are provided. The New Zealand pensions will be taxed only when they exceed $10,000. A protocol attached to the New Zealand agreement—and I point out, honourable senators, that there is a protocol to the New Zealand agreement but not to the Australian agreement—states in paragraph 3:

> —it is understood that pensions paid by, or out of funds created by, the government of New Zealand, or a political subdivision thereof to any individual in respect of services rendered to the government of New Zealand or subdivision thereof, shall be taxable only in New Zealand.

This would appear, honourable senators, to cover all the pensions paid to New Zealand public servants, members of the armed forces, and, indeed, it may even include the social security pensions paid by that country.

● (1530)

I would like the sponsor of the bill to give us a further explanation about the protocol.

The treaties are retroactive to January, 1976 in the case of Canada, and April in the case of New Zealand and Australia. A number of Canadian companies, particularly mining and exploration companies, have commenced operations in our fellow Commonwealth countries.

The first item in the protocol with New Zealand refers to articles 6 and 13, which appear to deal mostly with mining corporations. Perhaps the sponsor would be kind enough to explain why a definition was included in the protocol in addition to the one included in the treaty.

The sponsor made no mention of referral of this item to committee. My understanding is that in the past these have always been referred to committee, and perhaps when he closes the debate, he will speak to that.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator's intervention will close the debate.

Senator Hicks: I congratulate my friend and colleague, Senator Phillips who, though he humbly admits that he is not a lawyer, nevertheless shows a very real understanding of the nature of these conventions, or treaties, or agreements.

I had contemplated the point which Senator Grosart had raised in the past about the ratification. Perhaps it might be worth reading into the record, as briefly as I can, the situation as it is related to us by Gotlieb, in Canadian Treaty-Making, written in 1968. On page 14 the author writes:

> Under the Canadian constitutional system, derived from the British, the ratification—in the international sense—of all types of agreements is, like the negotiation and signing of instruments, a prerogative act authorized by the Governor-General on the advice of Canadian ministers. Ratification is an "international act", usually consisting of a deposit of an instrument of ratification or the exchange of such instruments.
> There is no legal requirement for the legislature, the Parliament of Canada, to "ratify" (in the internal sense) or approve any international agreement, whether it is termed a "treaty" or called by any other title or name. According to an official statement of Canadian treaty practice, sent to the United Nations in 1952, "there is no law imposing any obligation on the Government of Canada to refer treaties or other international agreements to the Parliament of Canada for approval prior to ratification. International obligations are entered into in many instances without reference to Parliament. The negotiation and conclusion of a treaty or other international agreement is an executive act.

Opposed to that, on the next page of the book, he says:

> However, as a matter of principle and practice the Government of Canada does seek the approval of Parliament of certain types of important treaties before ratification is authorized by the Governor-in-Council. In this way, Parliament may receive a certain measure of control over the exercise of the treaty-making power by the Crown which is over and beyond the indirect control which Parliament may exercise through the normal functioning of the Parliamentary system.

Then there is a rather interesting quotation from the late Prime Minister Mackenzie King, made in 1928, many years before the official statement was passed on to the United Nations, in which Mr. King says:

> I might say to my honourable friend first with respect to the course of procedure that is being adopted of having parliament approve this convention, that that course is in accordance with the principle underlying a resolution of this house which was introduced by myself a year or two ago and at the time unanimously adopted. The resolution provided, so far as Canada is concerned, that important treaties should be approved in the first instance by this parliament. That is the reason why this convention, which to all intents and purposes is in the nature of a treaty between different countries, is being submitted to parliament. The purpose is to secure in the last analysis the control of parliament over any agreements of international significance which may bind the people of this Dominion.

Later, in the same debate, he added:

> I submit that the day has passed—

This was in 1928:

> —when any government or executive should feel that they should take it upon themselves without the approval of parliament to commit a country to obligations involving any considerable financial outlays or active undertakings. In all cases where obligations of such a character are being assumed internationally, parliament itself should be assured of having the full right of approving what is done before binding commitments are made. I would not confine parliamentary approval only to those matters which involve military sanctions and the like. I feel parliamen> tary approval should apply where there are involved matters of large expenditure or political considerations of a far-reaching character . . . I say that this is a wise doctrine to follow in regard to all treaties irrespective of their particular character wherever they involve large national obligations.

So while that was stated by the Prime Minister in 1928 to be the practice in Canada, in theory our officials were still telling the United Nations in 1952 that technically speaking the ratification of a treaty was an executive act did not have to be brought to Parliament. I am glad to observe that the modern practice is to refer them to Parliament, although I wish that sometimes this process did not take so long.

As some honourable senators may have noticed, in the previous treaties, dealt with in Bill S-2, four were actually signed in 1976, and the one with Italy in 1977. We are only getting around to ratifying them in December 1980. I hope that we will do better in respect of these treaties with Australia and New Zealand.

I may say that if this bill receives second reading now, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I know again that Senator Grosart has made the argument sometimes that since these are treaty matters dealing with foreign countries, they should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. However, the Banking committee has dealt with them, and my motion, in any event—although the Senate can direct as it wishes—will be that the bill be referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to Senator Hicks? He quoted Gotlieb as an authority, stating that Bill S-17 did not have to be approved by Parliament. If he shares that view, would he consider withdrawing the bill rather than referring it to committee?

Senator Hicks: On the contrary, honourable senators. While Gotlieb may be technically correct, I do not know whether he is or not. I read from his book because I considered it to be interesting. I am inclined to the view that Mr. Mackenzie King expounded many years before, and I believe they should come to Parliament. I would not encourage the present government, or any other government, to try to insist upon a practice of ratification without reference to Parliament.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question stemming from the one asked by Senator Phillips. Does the honourable senator suggest that the thesis of Mr. Gotlieb could be applicable when the treaty really amends legislation such as in the present case? After all, it amends income tax legislation. Does he think that he could dispense with the approval of Parliament?

Senator Hicks: I do not think so. I do not think that the ratification of a treaty by the executive alone could result in implementing a treaty, if indeed legislative changes were required, which they often are.

[Senator Hicks.]

Senator Murray: Is the scholar by the name of Gotlieb, whom Senator Hicks has quoted, the present undersecretary of State for External Affairs?

Senator Hicks: He was at one time.

Senator Murray: I believe he still is.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, January 13, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

According to my information, it is now clear that the Commons will be adjourning on Friday next until January 12, 1981. My information also is that we are not likely to have any legislation from the other place that week. Of course, the business of the Senate is not limited to legislation. I discussed this with the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, but I don't intend to say that I have his support—

Senator Flynn: You informed me.

Senator Frith: I informed him of my intention. Honourable senators, there are arguments for recalling the Senate on January 13, which is a day after the return of the Commons, and there are arguments for not coming back until January 20, a week later. One argument in favour of not returning until January 20 is that we will probably not receive any legislation from the other place before that date. Nevertheless, there are things for us to attend to. There are substantial items on our order paper that we can direct our attention to, and that is one reason for coming back at the same time as the Commons. Another reason is that some of our colleagues have to be here to attend meetings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, and we could be here to give them personal and moral support.

I believe that those two reasons, plus the fact that some committees could take advantage of that extra week to get a head start on their work, justify tipping the scales in favour of our coming back on January 13. For those reasons we have decided to ask honourable senators to come back on January 13, or earlier in the case of those who will be sitting on committees.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Frith has mentioned my views. The reason I thought it would be more logical to come back on January 20 is that we are not likely to have any legislation from the other place, and there is nothing urgent on our order paper.

The second argument which I failed to mention to Senator Frith, and which is of some importance, is that I think on both sides we need a rest from each other, and I am not sure that adjourning to January 13 will be long enough.

Senator Frith: I just cannot support my honourable friend in that. I do not think I can stay away longer than two or three weeks; I would miss my association with my colleagues on both sides. Senator Langlois tells me that I must have acquired a new addiction to be able to say that.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1620)

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Julien Chouinard, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code.

An Act to implement conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and the Republic of Austria, Canada and Italy, Canada and the Republic of Korea, Canada and the Socialist Republic of Romania and Canada and the Republic of Indonesia and agreements between Canada and Malaysia, Canada and Jamaica and Canada and Barbados and a convention between Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

An Act to amend the Clean Air Act.

An Act respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild.

An Act to amend and repeal An Act to Incorporate General Security Insurance Company of Canada.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I take the liberty for a minute or two to wish you all the very best of good wishes in this festive season, and in doing so I include those opposite. I am grateful to them for having made my life interesting in the last few months. They have always been courteous and intelligent; quite often they have been cocky and sometimes out of order but, nevertheless, I appreciate all of that.

For once, honourable senators, I think we can all agree that 1980 has been a turbulent year for Canada. I think, too, from what I know about the attitude of all honourable senators, that this chamber, will be in the forefront of finding solutions to Canada's problems in 1981.

May God bless you and your families at Christmas. I wish you happiness and prosperity in 1981.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I imagine it is up to me to answer Senator Olson. I must tell him that we appreciated both his replies and, quite often, his evasiveness when he avoided giving an answer.

The year 1980 was a remarkable year; I am not saying a good year but a remarkable year. I hope 1981 will be much better. In any event, the year 1980 saw the transfer of responsibilities from one party to the other in the Senate; but, as there is a bright side to everything, we will now watch you closely and see what you will do. Be that as it may, I feel the atmosphere in this chamber, setting aside the odd circumstance when things get a bit rowdy, a bit vehement, is, all things considered, really excellent. Relations between senators are such that I believe the public interest and the good of the people come first and foremost.

We are now about to take leave of one another. As I said previously, I feel it is absolutely necessary to part from time to time, to forget one another, to go our different ways for a while; but, irrespective of that, I do believe we have considerable respect and feelings of friendship for one another. In that spirit, then, we on this side of the Senate extend to you our very best wishes for Christmas and the New Year; you know that we do so with a sincere heart.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment, I want to add just one word concerning the remarks of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, and my colleague, Senator Olson, not only to thank him for his co-operation—though perhaps not without exception at least very much exceptional—during my on-the-job training which started this year.

I also join in the wishes that have been extended to all.

On that preamble, I move, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn.

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I appreciate the remarks of Senator Olson. Unfortunately, I had some difficulty with my leader's remarks for the simple reason there is no interpretation provided tonight, and I do not know whose French is better—Senator Flynn's or mine. No doubt due to the fact that he had his head turned the other way, I did not get everything he said. However, I want to say to Senator Olson and all other senators that I appreciate the expression of good will, and, of course, we on this side wish you all the best not only during the holidays but, strangely enough—and from our point of view this is unfortunate—during all of 1981, because in doing that we are also wishing Canada all the best and, naturally, we wish Canada all the best.

I would like to refer to a conversation I had earlier today with one of your supporters, Senator Olson. We were discussing the Question Period respecting which you made some snide remarks, and we came up with a new solution for you. We are going to give you five answers before Question Period, and then five questions; if you match them, we will be happy. I hope, Senator Olson, that we can then shorten the Question Period in the New Year.

All the best to everyone over the holidays.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I take this opportunity to express our appreciation of the work done by our supporting staff—the Clerk, the Assistant Clerk, the pages, the stenographers and all the Hansard reporters and editors who have worked so well on our behalf and without whom we would make a very poor showing. To bring it right down to the ground, we wish you all a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, not to take away from the good will of the occasion, but as one member of this honourable house who has often smarted under the ridicule of some members of the other place, and just for the record, I would like to draw attention to the good attendance here and the fact that the Commons had the audacity to appear before the Bar of this chamber today without a quorum.

The Hon. the Speaker: Before I put the motion to adjourn I should like to extend best wishes to all honourable senators for an enjoyable Christmas and a Happy New Year. I learned something during 1980, namely, that everyone in this house and the other place can break the rules except the Speaker. However, I have enjoyed the experience, and I thank you for your co-operation.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I thank you very much for your co-operation despite some failures which were at times disastrous. You were generous enough not to insist on these failures which, I hope, were only temporary.

I congratulate Senator Frith who speaks French without any accent, and Senator Flynn who speaks English without any accent, which means that our country is exactly what we want it to be.

On motion of Senator Frith, the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 13, 1981, at 8 p.m.

THE HON. ALLISTER GROSART, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON APPOINTMENT TO PRIVY COUNCIL

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before proceeding with our deliberations I am pleased to inform the Senate that the Honourable Allister Grosart, my predecessor in the Chair of the Senate, has been appointed to the Privy Council. Honourable senators will undoubtedly be glad to join me in extending our most sincere congratulations.

[English]

Honourable senators, Senator Grosart is now a member of the Privy Council.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Later]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of government supporters in this chamber, I should like to offer the warmest congratulations to our distinguished former Speaker, Allister Grosart, the newest member of The Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

The appointment has a great deal of merit. In his new role, the government hopes that it can turn regularly to Senator Grosart for advice.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to join with the Leader of the Government in expressing pleasure at the appointment of our former Speaker to the Privy Council. Senator Grosart has had a distinguished career in this place. He was not in the Chair for a long time, but it was long enough for him to demonstrate his capabilities in and his great qualifications for that position.

I am pleased that the government has followed the practice in conferring upon him this honour, just as was done in the case of his predecessor, Senator Lapointe.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT AMENDMENTS TO PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR JOINT ADDRESS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before I put my question to the Leader of the Government—I keep him waiting because I know he must be nervous—may I say that I was pleased to be away from this place for four weeks? I would have been happy to stay away even a little longer, but if we have to be here we are prepared to work and to offer the government our co-operation, at the same time hoping that it will recognize the rights of the opposition to express its views in all circumstances, especially when the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution comes before us.

• (2010)

My question to the Leader of the Government is in connection with the amendments proposed by the Minister of Justice.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have here the French version of the news release on the statement of the Minister of Justice concerning the amendments to the resolution on the Constitution:

> I made a careful study of both written documents and testimonies—meaning the evidence and the documents tabled before the committee—and, of course, I took into account the opinions expressed by the members of the committee.

So stated the minister.

> The government has indeed been listening to the views of all Canadians.

Yet, it seems to me that nothing in the government proposals reflects the objections of the provincial premiers or the attorneys general. Am I then to understand that neither the premiers nor the attorneys general of the provinces are Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it should be made clear at the outset that the proposed amendments presented last evening by the Honourable Jean Chrétien do not necessarily constitute the final number of amendments which the government may be prepared to support.

The special joint committee is now in the process of considering the proposed bill clause by clause. Indeed, some members of this place are active and outstanding participants in this vital process of analyzing in detail the proposed constitutional measures. During that process, there may well be additional amendments brought forward by the government which may alleviate some of the concerns expressed by the Leader of the Opposition.

REFERENCES TO APPEAL COURTS BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to return to a point that I raised on a couple of occasions when I addressed questions to the Leader of the Government with respect to the policy of the government in the matter of appeals to Canadian courts on the constitutionality of the government's proposal. I have asked the leader on previous occasions to tell us whether it would be the policy of the government to press ahead with the proposed Joint Address and send it to London, if nothing else stands in the way, before the Canadian courts have ruled on the propriety of the enterprise.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice, but the last information I had on the subject indicated that the government would proceed on its announced schedule regardless of appeals to the courts. However, further information will be sought on the point.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for this interim reply, and I hope that he will be able to give me a firm statement on the matter soon, because if he is telling the house that the government deems it appropriate to proceed with its proposal when the constitutional propriety is under question before the Canadian courts, I think he is opening up a large area of debate in which I am sure there will be considerable public interest.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I wish to put a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

On looking at the latest Canadian labour force figures, I noted that youth unemployment increased a full percentage point in December and that there are now almost 100,000 Canadians between the ages of 20 and 24 out of work. That is a terrifying number. Could the minister tell us what new policies or programs the Government of Canada has in mind to try to correct this rather tragic situation?

• (2015)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the government has certain plans, some of which have already been announced, with respect to the particular sector of the labour force to which the honourable senator has referred. The details of those plans and policies will, of course, be made known from time to time directly by the minister responsible.

When the honourable senator was looking over the statistics he should have noted that there were approximately 240,000 new jobs created in 1980, as well as the fact that the total level of employment in the past year has been at a very high percentage rate.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable minister for his answer. I did indeed note the number of new jobs that have been created. However, I doubt that that is any consolation to the almost 100,000 people between the ages of 20 and 24 who are currently out of work.

Perhaps what is even more alarming than the numbers that have been quoted is the increase in the number of people, particularly in Newfoundland, Ontario and British Columbia, who are now called "discouraged workers." These are people who have given up hope and are no longer looking for jobs. I understand that there are something in the order of 75,000 to 80,000 formerly employed Canadians who have now dropped out of the labour force. They are no longer counted as being unemployed because they are not looking for work. Does the government have any plans or policies in mind to try to correct this situation?

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, it does. There was an announcement made that $350 million was being allocated for some industrial adjustment activities that need to be addressed. As I said a few moments ago, specific programs to try to alleviate that situation, as best we can, will be announced, perhaps relatively soon. There are also, of course, some other activities that are taking place in the country that we hope will lead to some relief from the situation that has been described.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable minister for his reply. I hope that we will be able to get a more specific description of those programs in the near future.

I have one final supplementary. Perhaps it is worthy of note that in the same statistics that bellwether of the economy, the construction industry, reports an employment loss of 33,000 people over the past year, while employment in public administration was up by 82,000.

Is it government policy now to hire more public servants, while the construction industry is allowed to decrease in value in the economy?

Senator Olson: The short answer is no.

Senator Doody: Perhaps there will be a long answer later.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ALLOCATION OF DEPARTMENTAL BUDGET

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of State for Economic Development to which departmental budget the sum of $350 million for industrial adjustment has been allocated.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The Minister of Finance announced, at the time of the budget, that $175 million would go to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and that $175 million would go to the Department of Employment and Immigration.

Senator Murray: I realize that the money has been allocated, but will the minister confirm that no programs have yet been developed or announced, pursuant to that allocation, by either of the ministers to whose departments the allocation went?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think I said that about two minutes ago.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA AND PRESIDENT-ELECT OF THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question arises out of statements made by General Haig to the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate that he attaches a great deal of priority to solving the irritants that face both Canada and the United States, with particular emphasis on the fisheries treaty.

Can the Leader of the Government inform the Senate as to whether an early meeting has been arranged between President-Elect Reagan and the Prime Minister of Canada?

• (2020)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government, of course, places great importance upon relations between this nation and the United States of America. At the same time as the Prime Minister extended congratulations on behalf of all Canadians to President-Elect Reagan, on the morning after the election, the Prime Minister also invited the President-Elect to visit Canada early in the New Year. A response was elicited very quickly from Mr. Reagan's staff and office, and it was proposed that they meet on January 9. However, this date conflicted with Mr. Trudeau's previously announced commitment to visit a number of important countries in the world, including Third World countries, in preparation for summit meetings later this year.

Senator Roblin: Austria, Algeria—

Senator Perrault: Yes, those are some of the nations.

Our ambassador in Washington is working closely with Mr. Reagan's staff to arrange a meeting in the near future between Mr. Reagan and Mr. Trudeau. Mr. Reagan's staff have agreed in principle that President-Elect Reagan should visit Canada as soon as possible after the inauguration.

Senator Flynn: Well said.

TRADEMARKS AND UNFAIR COMPETITION

REINTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. On February 6, 1979, a new trademarks bill, introduced by the government, received first reading in this house. On February 13 I moved second reading, and on March 22, in answer to a question from Senator Grosart, I said that the government did not want to go ahead with the bill at that time but would consider the representations that had resulted from a series of meetings on the bill between officials of the department and interested persons across the country. They would then consider these representations over the summer and reintroduce the bill in the fall. It is nearly two years since that bill was first introduced in the Senate. It is a highly technical bill and the kind of bill that the Senate is particularly well equipped to handle in committee, and will probably take a long time dealing with in committee.

My question is: When does the government expect to get around to reintroducing that measure?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I want to confirm the facts that Senator Godfrey has stated with respect to the dates. It is the intention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to reintroduce that legislation, but I am sorry I cannot give him any specific date at this time.

ENERGY

PACIFIC COASTAL SHELF—EXPLORATION ACTIVITY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government that relates to the question of the possibility of increasing exploration activity for hydrocarbons on the Pacific coastal shelf. There have been some stories appearing that the government has been undertaking environmental studies and that it may soon be in a position to ensure environmentally safe offshore drilling activity on the Pacific coast. Can the government leader advise us as to whether new consideration is being given to offshore drilling exploration, and as to when these environmental studies might be available?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL ENERGY NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Economic Council of Canada, among others, has made the obvious point that economic growth in Canada could be materially assisted by an energy sector that was performing up to its potential. The minister will be aware that one of the reasons it is not is the stall in negotiations between the federal government and the producing provinces.

In view of that fact, could the Minister of State for Economic Development, in that capacity and in his capacity as Alberta's representative in the federal cabinet, inform us whether he is taking, or intends to take, a personal hand in these negotiations?

[Senator Godfrey.]

• (2025)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Economic Council, as well as several other groups and individuals, has expressed the view that a great deal of economic benefit could accrue to Canada if that sector were performing at a higher level and if indeed the projections with respect to the dates when some of those projects would get underway were more certain than they are at present.

I wish to say, however, that I do not think that anyone has expressed a more intense desire to get a number of those projects underway than has the federal government, and, indeed, there is public manifestation of some of the offers that we have made through the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with respect to several of them, and particularly those which we regard as having the highest potential for bringing on new supplies, namely, the tar sands, the heavy oil projects, and so on.

Therefore, I am only repeating myself, and repeating what other members of the government have said, in saying that we would hope that this could go ahead—and the sooner the better. We hope also that, with the condition that Alberta has attached to giving its consent or its endorsation, the other component parts in the whole energy package will be agreed to. We agree that it is a high priority. I suppose we have to take into account the fact that the Premier of Alberta has said that it may take a few days—indeed, I believe he said it may take a few weeks—for them to do a re-analysis of the figures used by both the Alberta government and the federal government to determine the results that would flow from a number of the component parts in the national energy package. Certainly, we hope that that will be expedited so that we can reach a negotiated agreement so that all those things can go forward.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the same point that I should like to address to my honourable friend. He spoke of certain offers made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to various folk, presumably in the private sector, and perhaps to the Government of Alberta. Would he be so kind as to provide us with copies of the offers that were made. While I have been following the matter closely, I am not aware of any significant changes in the government's position, and I would be pleased to be informed.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I thought it was a matter of fairly widely held common knowledge that the Government of Canada had offered $38 per barrel plus escalation to Syncrude—and indeed to some other processes in which extraction from sand is required—recognizing, of course, that a much higher cost of production is involved. That is what I was particularly referring to.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should say to my honourable friend what he already knows, which is that I know what he has just told me because he told it to me on another occasion, but he also knows that it is a deal that so far has not been accepted by anyone. If that is what he is referring to, I am pleased to be informed, but I would point out to him that it does not appear to be working.

Senator Olson: That is how it may appear to the honourable senator. Perhaps he is suggesting that we should raise the offer even beyond that level. If that is his opinion, he is welcome to it. We believe, on information that was given to us by the participants in September, that an offer at that level would be sufficient provided that the other permits and authorizations by the producing provinces would be sufficient to enable them to get under way.

There are some subsequent indications that that may not be enough. I am not sure about that, but certainly we were sincerely analyzing the suggestions that had been made as to what would be enough. We were then of the opinion that it would be enough, but that is not the reason at the moment, apparently, for Alberta's withholding its approval, so there are other components that they are concerned about.

● (2030)

We are also somewhat concerned that none of the pieces—and the tar sands is one of them—can go forward without all of them being agreed. We regret this, but at the same time discussions are going on between the two governments, as has been announced, at the level of the officials, and I believe it has been stated by the Government of Alberta, or at least by its leader, that that may be a more useful and fruitful way to carry on the discussions for a while. After all, the discussions between the two governments prior to that were reported in the press quite regularly over 16 or 18 months, and that did not lead to any agreement. Therefore, it might be useful to try some other approach.

Senator Roblin: I wish I could share my honourable friend's optimism that he is going to get anywhere on this particular issue without a substantial rethinking of the entire federal position. Anyway, we will wait and see.

SASKATCHEWAN—UNECONOMIC OIL PRODUCTION—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT STANCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish now to refer to a situation reported from the Province of Saskatchewan where, we are told, it has now become uneconomic for certain producers to continue to produce oil—in fact, it appears that they lose money on each barrel pumped. This is particularly significant, because it has to do with the smaller wells of the province, and with getting out the last drop of oil. It appears, from statements made by ministers in the Saskatchewan government, that they feel adversely affected because they are going to have to stop pumping oil. In fact, a number of small wells have already stopped producing in that province.

What is the position of the federal government with respect to that problem?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): My honourable friend will know, of course, that some of the costs related to those very low production wells are not related to, or, in fact, determined by, federal government policy. It is our hope that some rearrangement can be made so that all of that oil is brought to the surface and put into the consumer stream when we need it. Of course, we need it now; there is no question about that. My friend, naturally, will recognize that changes in the areas to which he is referring are not entirely within the federal jurisdiction.

Senator Roblin: I apologize for referring to the matter once more, but that is not the position of the Government of Saskatchewan. They have clearly ascribed the problem to the policies of the federal government.

Senator Olson: So what else is new?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend says, "What else is new?" That is a typical attitude that we have come to expect from my honourable friend, and from others on the government side, namely, whatever the problem, it is not their fault.

Senator Perrault: The federal government gets no credit for anything it does.

Senator Roblin: I think the Government of Saskatchewan gave a lot of credit on that 50-50 deal with regard to the shipment of oil across the border to the United States, and my friend knows about that. He got more credit than he was entitled to.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend, of course, can repeat, and, if he wishes, agree or disagree with statements made by provincial governments, but if he examines carefully my reply to him of a moment ago he will find that I do not agree with the statement.

Senator Roblin: What is your policy? That is what I am asking. I want your policy, not your opinion.

Senator Olson: I am sure my friend would not like me to enunciate a policy on behalf of the federal government that encroached upon provincial jurisdiction.

Senator Roblin: No.

FINANCE

SMALL BUSINESS—AVAILABILITY OF LOW INTEREST BONDS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

There seems to be some confusion in the business community concerning the availability of small business low interest bonds. Has the minister received any complaints in that regard and, if so, what is he planning to do about it to clarify the situation?

● (2035)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think I should take that question as notice. I could give a very brief reply now, but I think I will take the question as notice so I can give a better reply tomorrow or the next day.

TAXATION OF CAPITAL GAINS—DEFINITION OF CANADIAN-CONTROLLED PUBLIC COMPANIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers to questions. With the permission of the house, I shall identify the questions and ask that the answers be taken as read.

I would like to respond to a question raised on December 2 by Senator Murray which concerned EMR's definition of a Canadian-controlled public company, and I would also like to send Senator Murray a copy of a first draft proposal that was put out respecting this, if he does not already have it. At any rate, I will send him one.

I would like to inform the honourable senator that on November 21, the Chairman of the Petroleum Monitoring Agency released a position paper entitled: "Measurement and Determination for Canadian Ownership and Control." This document, prepared in response to initiatives announced on October 28 in respect of the National Energy Program, outlines the PMA's present views on the principles and methodology to be used in determining Canadian Ownership Rates (COR) and the determination of Canadian control in the petroleum industry. Since the formula for calculating the COR is rather lengthy and technical, I would like to give my honourable friend a copy of the aforementioned position paper, which clearly defines Canadian Ownership Rates. He will note that on page iii of the Introduction it is stated:

> An applicant must be able to establish a specified level of Canadian ownership and to demonstrate that it is Canadian controlled in order to qualify for certain programs announced in the N.E.P.

I should also point out that FIRA and the PMA employ the same formula in identifying a Canadian-controlled company. In fact, where a decision has already been made by FIRA with respect to the control status of an applicant the PMA would accept the FIRA decision.

ENERGY

SELF-SUFFICIENCY PROGRAM—IMPACT OF PREDICTED INTERNATIONAL OIL SHORTAGE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to answer a question—perhaps I should use the word "respond" because when I say "answer" sometimes my friends do not agree it is an answer. However, I have a reply, at least, to a question raised on December 3 by Senator Smith which concerned the impact of a predicted international oil shortage.

(The answer follows:)

> The Chairman of Petro-Canada, Mr. Hopper, in his address of December 1, to the Canadian Club of Montreal, remarked on the question of international oil supply and demand and its impact on Canada and stated:
>
> A short supply situation in 1981 could again be followed by more than adequate supply in 1982 if Iraq and Iran resume exports. However, by the mid to late 1980's permanent supply shortages may occur.
>
> The National Energy Program document acknowledges that the oil outlook for the next decade is not encouraging. The International Energy Agency has forecasted that oil "shortfalls" would occur in 1985 and 1990, despite what may be optimistic expectations of production from Saudi Arabia and Iran. The IEA forecast also assumes oil demand growth rates that are modest by historical standards, and which could (without strong conservation efforts) be exceeded under more reasonable economic growth conditions than have prevailed since the mid-1970's.
> The international market may experience short-term shortages during which emergency storage and sharing arrangements of the IEA will have to be deployed. But the market will eventually force supply and demand into balance. The real issue is related to pricing of oil and given the historic behaviour of OPEC and its capacity to raise prices almost at will, any country with the potential to disassociate itself from the world oil market of the 1980's should do so, and Canada is one of a fortunate few that has the capability of becoming self-sufficient by 1990. The federal government's National Energy Program is the vehicle through which this goal will be achieved.

OIL—INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—REDUCTION IN DEMAND—DOMESTIC STOCKS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to a question raised on December 9 by Senator Balfour which concerned reduction in oil demand and the status of our domestic stocks.

(The answer follows:)

> With reference to Senator Balfour's question regarding the effort to reduce demand, in Paris on December 9 IEA Ministers agreed to a number of collective actions, including drawing on stocks as necessary and discouraging undesirable purchases of oil at price levels which increase market pressures. The IEA Secretariat estimated that the result of these actions would be to reduce total IEA demand for oil on the world market by about 10 per cent in the first quarter of 1981. Thus, the IEA commitment is on a collective, rather than an individual country basis. Canada will of course contribute to this IEA commitment.
> Insofar as Senator Balfour's questions concern the status of our domestic stocks I am able to inform him that actual stocks of crude oil and main petroleum products (motor gasoline, middle distillates and heavy fuel oil) in Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces as of the beginning of November amounted to 79.7 million barrels as compared to 66.5 million barrels last year. Projections based on National Energy Board demand estimates for the fourth quarter indicate that total stocks as of the beginning of 1981 will be approximately 77.0 million barrels. In the case of the two more critical product categories, motor gasoline and middle distillate, opening 1981 useable stocks are forecast to be about 41 and 62 days of supply respectively. This is above desired average historical inventory levels for this time of year.

Normal stocks levels generally provide some cushion for contingencies and there is some ability to draw on stocks in the short-term. It might be noted in this regard that refiners' preliminary programs for the first quarter of 1981 provide for a stock draw in the range of 11.0 to 13.0 million barrels of crude and product. However, more recent estimates by refiners have initially indicated that product demand this winter, particularly for heating oil, could also be considerably less than originally anticipated.

While a number of factors may account for this, certainly conservation (insulation, etc.) and substitution to natural gas and electricity are important. This reduced demand could contribute to lower crude oil requirements thereby allowing for both reduced imports and inventory draw.

THE ECONOMY

FACTORS RESULTING IN FAVOURABLE BALANCE OF TRADE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I would like also to respond to a question raised on November 20 by Senator Bosa which concerned the balance of trade.

(The answer follows:)

The Canadian merchandise trade surplus for the first nine months of 1980 was $5,107 million, or more than double the surplus of $2,378 million in the same period in 1979. For 1980 as a whole I am informed that it is reasonable to expect that Canada will attain a record high trade surplus of over $6 billion. This will compare with the previous peak of about $4 billion realized in 1979.

The reasons for the surplus are varied. Despite the recession in the United States, we have done exceptionally well in sales to other major industrial areas. Canadian exports to countries other than the U.S. were up by about 35 per cent in the first nine months of 1980.

The lower exchange value of the Canadian dollar has helped to improve our competitive position. In addition, our wage levels in manufacturing, when expressed in U.S. dollars, are significantly lower at present than those prevailing in many major OECD countries.

We are fortunate among major industrial countries in having a present export surplus in trade in all forms of energy combined, even though we have deficit in trade in petroleum.

Our shipments of wheat are up sharply. One of the reasons is that we were able to clear up some of the transportation bottlenecks in the movement of grain. As well, our exports of copper and nickel were sharply higher in 1980 compared with 1979 levels because in 1979 there were major strikes affecting production and shipments. Our exports of precious metals have significantly increased reflecting price appreciation.

These are a few of the factors which have contributed to Canada's favourable trade balance for the first three quarters of 1980.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INVESTMENT IN CANADIAN OIL STOCKS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to another question raised on December 9 by Senator Bosa concerning the investment of Canada Pension Plan funds.

I am informed that financing of the Canada Pension Plan is now under review by federal and provincial finance officials. When this review is completed in 1981, the federal government will determine its preferred position regarding possible arrangements for investment of CPP excess funds. If necessary, the Minister of Finance will then seek provincial concurrence on any financing changes. It might be noted, however, that the possibility of investing some of the excess funds from the Canada Pension Plan in the private sector has been raised by several recent studies on pensions. Both the Federal Task Force on Retirement Income Policy and the Economic Council of Canada have made recommendations in this regard. But again, the federal position will be determined only after the review of CPP financing has been completed.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on December 16 by Senator Doody concerning Canada's policy on interest rates.

(The answer follows:)

This government has no complaints that the U.S. government and the Federal Reserve Bank want to pursue a policy of controlling inflation by tightly restraining the growth of the money supply. The Bank of Canada is also following a policy of monetary restraint. The Minister of Finance, in his Budget Speech, gave his commitment to support the Bank of Canada in its pursuit of a monetary policy that will not accommodate inflation. We continue to believe that monetary restraint is an important ingredient of an anti-inflation policy. What this government is concerned about is the extreme volatility of U.S. short-term interest rates of the type exhibited during 1980. We have seen short-term interest rates in the U.S. first shooting up in the spring of 1980 to historically high levels, then plunging in the summer to very low levels before beginning their second steep ascent in the later part of the year to record levels, with the prime rate even going above 20 per cent. This volatility of short-term interest rates in the U.S. places a major burden on the Canadian economy. It also puts a severe constraint on the operation of monetary policy in this country.

The Canadian and U.S. capital markets are highly integrated. This fact puts our country in a dilemma in the face of rapidly rising U.S. interest rates. Regardless of the method selected to deal with this situation, the Canadian economy suffers certain costs. We can let the Canadian dollar fall, or initiate matching increases in our interest rates by amounts matching those in the U.S. This would maintain the value of the Canadian dollar but would depress Canadian economic activity further. The alternative of letting the Canadian dollar slide even more by resisting interest rate increases can make our already serious inflation problem even more severe by increasing the prices of imported and exported goods in line with a falling dollar. Canada, as a member of a community of large trading nations cannot insulate itself from what happens across the border.

On the question of what can be done to alleviate the impact of high interest rates, I would refer the honourable senator to the new budget introduced by this government. The budget does not make an effort to provide quick-fix solutions to our problems. Rather, it establishes a strategy to effectively deal with the underlying causes of our problems. Interest rates can only come down on a sustained basis if inflation is brought under control. Therefore, we need measures which can bring inflation down. The new budget has provided these measures. It envisages policies of tightly controlling the growth of expenditures, a steady reduction in budget deficits and financial requirements, avoidance of tax increases insofar as possible, and restraining the growth of the money supply. These policies, designed with the express objective of reducing the rate of inflation, would ultimately bring down interest rates. In addition to these policies the government has decided to extend the provisions of the Small Business Development Bond to March 31, 1981. Interest payments on these bonds are treated as dividends which are non-taxable to the lender. This offsets the impact of high interest rates on small business to a considerable extent.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS—RENEGOTIATION OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Honourable Senator Murray on December 3 of 1980. It concerned federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

[Senator Olson.]

Although the Established Programs Financing Arrangements in Part VI of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977 have no expiry date, it is open to the federal government to modify the arrangements as necessary at the end of the current fiscal arrangements period on March 31, 1982.

The EPF arrangements will be reviewed with the provinces prior to that date in the context of the overall review of fiscal arrangements which take place every five years. Indeed, discussions began yesterday at the federal-provincial meeting of Ministers of Finance. Because the current fiscal arrangements period has some 15 months to run, there will be ample time for full discussions among all interested parties.

This chamber will have an opportunity to debate legislation which the government may introduce to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977.

FINANCE

FLUCTUATIONS IN INTEREST RATES—REACTION BY CANADIAN BANKING SYSTEM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator McElman asked a question on December 16 concerning fluctuations in interest rates and the reaction by Canadian banks. Reference was also made to other financial institutions and to the profitability of the banks.

The current volatility of interest rates and the uncertainties surrounding their future levels make it extremely difficult for the financial institutions to adjust their rates so as to maintain the differentials ruling in more stable circumstances. I have been advised there will, of necessity, be variations in the spreads. The basic policy of this government has been to avoid direct intervention in the detailed price-setting mechanisms of individual industries such as the banks, but rather to rely upon policies to ensure competitive conditions in the markets. It should be noted that the Canadian banks, the trust and loan companies, the credit unions and caisses populaires are highly competitive, and this competitiveness is the surest way of keeping these institutions efficient and interest margins as low as possible.

NATIONAL REVENUE

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Question No. 7 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. How many jobs were created in each province under the Employment Tax Credit Act since its inception?

2. How many businesses received subsidies in each province under the Employment Tax Credit Act since its inception?

Reply by the President of the Privy Council:

I am informed by the Departments of Employment and Immigration and National Revenue as follows:

1. Between its inception on March 8, 1978 and March 31, 1980, there have been 67,617 jobs created under the Employment Tax Credit Program. The number of jobs created by province were:

Province	Jobs created
Newfoundland	872
Prince Edward Island	471
Nova Scotia	1,493
New Brunswick	2,030
Quebec	27,061
Ontario	22,856
Manitoba	1,584
Saskatchewan	999
Alberta—N.W.T.	2,107
British Columbia—Yukon	8,144
	67,617

2. The most recent information available on the number of businesses claiming an Employment Tax Credit is for the 1978 taxation year. As the credit can be claimed by any business, incorporated or unincorporated, the statistics provided are compiled from individual and corporate tax returns.

For 1978, 559 individuals claimed an Employment Tax Credit. A breakdown by province is not available.

For corporations with fiscal years ending in 1978, the number claiming an Employment Tax Credit is 697, by province as follows:

Province	Number of Corporations with an Employment Tax Credit
Newfoundland	26
Prince Edward Island	13
Nova Scotia	25
New Brunswick	43
Quebec	290
Ontario	176
Manitoba	22
Saskatchewan	26
Alberta	22
British Columbia	54
Yukon, N.W.T.	—
Total	697

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

NEWFOUNDLAND—FISH HOIST INSTALLATIONS

Question No. 28 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

What are the locations, by federal district, of all fish hoist installations provided in the Province of Newfoundland in the fiscal years 1978/79 and 1979/80?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans:

The following list documents the locations of the fish hoist installations completed on the west coast of Newfoundland during the fiscal year 1978-79 and 1979-80 under the Newfoundland Fish Handling Program:

Parsons Pond (Cape Onion)	Blue Cove	Trout River
Ship Cove	Brig Bay	Cox's Cove
Cooks Harbour	Reefs Harbour	Littleport
Green Island Cove	Shoal Cove	Fox Island River
Sandy Cove	New Ferolle	Blue Beach
Flowers Cove	Bartletts Harbour	Stephenville
Anchor Point	Cow Head	St. George's
Black Duck Cove	St. Pauls	St. Davids
Forresters Point	Rocky Harbour	Codroy

VETERANS AFFAIRS

NEW DISTRICT OFFICES

Question No. 41 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. What are the locations of new district offices established across Canada by the Department of Veterans Affairs since January 1, 1980?

2. Give the (a) date each office was opened and (b) the function and case workload of each office since opening.

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

1. There have been no new district offices established by the Department of Veterans Affairs since January 1, 1980.

2. N/A.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, may I ask leave that Inquiry No. 1, standing in the name of Senator Lamontagne, be called immediately after Order No. 2, which stands in my name and which I will yield to Senator Croll.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies entitled: "Retirement Without Tears", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Croll.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I feel I owe the house an explanation as to why this item has remained on the order paper since April 22. I have been waiting for the report on the pension study which is being made by the Province of Ontario. It has been two years in the making and was supposed to be ready last fall; however, it was not. The press reports that it is now ready, and I thought I should see it before making my final comments.

That is not to say that the report we made has been lost sight of. Indeed, the matter of age has been picked up and is now part of the Bill of Rights. That is rather important. Moreover, a landmark decision on compulsory retirement has recently been handed down in Manitoba, and the government has said that it will propose the setting up of a pension committee composed of representatives of the province and the people involved, which is something that has been badly needed.

However, I thought that before I spoke to the Senate committee report I should see the Ontario report, because it should be most interesting.

I therefore move the adjournment of this debate until February 17.

On motion of Senator Croll, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—DEBATE

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, November 26, 1980:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on 26th November, 1980.

He said: First of all, honourable senators, I should like to congratulate Senator Grosart on the honour recently bestowed on him. I remember very well that, when we were in a different league, Senator Grosart authored a pamphlet called "The Conservative Facts," and I answered with another entitled "The Liberal Truth."

Senator Flynn: Oh, gee whiz! That was the best joke you ever made.

Senator Lamontagne: That was a long time ago. It is still true, though.

Senator Flynn: It is still "Trudeau"!

Senator Lamontagne: I will also long remember my association with Senator Grosart in his capacity as minority leader in the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy. He was at that time most co-operative and was of great assistance to me. [Translation]

Now, honourable senators, I would like to refer to the Orders of the Day and I am sorry that the full activities of the Joint Committee on the Constitution led to a delay in discussing the report that Senator Goldenberg tabled in the house in late November 1980.

In launching this debate tonight I must warn honourable senators that I have very little to add to the contents of the report and that to a large extent I will restrict my comments to the major points.

First of all I want to express my gratitude to the members of the subcommittee, particularly to Senator Neiman and to Senator Stanbury, as well as to the other senators on the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and especially its Chairman, Senator Goldenberg. I also want to thank the Honourable Eugene Forsey, Mr. R. L. du Plessis, our law clerk and parliamentary counsel, and the research branch of the Parliamentary Library.

As honourable senators are already aware, the substance of this report was unanimously approved by the committee members before the federal-provincial conference of September 8 last. We could enlarge on it but I think that that conclusion became a matter of record when we held our hearings.

As we all know many things have happened since. To get back to the initial stage I would like to recall one of the main reasons which prompted me to move the motion I did in this house last June.

In recent years several proposals had been made to replace the Senate. In 1978 the government itself had advocated the creation of a House of Federation in its Bill C-60. That formula has since been rejected outright and the Prime Minister referred to it last September 8 at the federal-provincial conference calling it "the ill-fated Bill C-60".

On the other hand even last June there seemed to be a certain consensus about a House of the Provinces as suggested by the Government of British Columbia, the Pepin-Robarts Task Force and other organizations as important as the Canadian Bar Association. This new chamber, which would have replaced the Senate, would have been composed exclusively of provincial representatives who could have been replaced at will by the provinces and would have been compelled to vote as a block, according to the instructions of the provincial premiers.

On June 12 last, speaking in this house about those proposals I said this in the other official language:

• (2050)

[English]

They are not compatible with federalism. They would replace federal tutorship by provincial tutorship. They would introduce a confederal chamber into a federal Parliament. They would introduce into a legislative body, the Canadian Parliament, a second chamber composed exclusively of representatives of the executive branch of another sphere of government.

[Translation]

Therefore last summer I presented my motion mainly because I was strongly opposed to these proposals and I was convinced at the time that their chances of being accepted were increasing rapidly. I humbly believe that the arguments I put forward in my speech of June 12 against the House of the Provinces have been accepted in some official circles. At any rate in the so-called "best effort" document prepared by the ministerial committee last summer there was a recommendation to set up a Council of the Provinces with three members from each province. In spite of the support of British Columbia this document was given a rather cold reception at the federal-provincial conference last September. As soon as the discussion on the Senate started the Prime Minister of Canada then raised the three following points and I quote, even if it is a rather lengthy quotation:

[English]

First, we are, as you are, committed to reform of the Senate as a crucial aspect of the constitutional reform. Second, we believe that such a revision must strengthen the voice of Canada's distinct and varied regions in the national capital. In other words, the Senate should perform a role of representing the regions. The third point, I think, is one on which we will disagree, at least for the time being, and it is the question of how does the Senate speak for the regions in the national capital or at the level of the national parliament? Should the Senate represent the provincial governments or should it represent the people of the provinces? I think that is a very important distinction. There have been reforms, and I believe British Columbia has tended in that direction, which suggest that the Upper House, the Senate, should be the place where the provinces, the provincial governments as such can speak, and, of course, one calls to mind immediately the Bonn system of government of the Federal Republic of Germany, but one also has to remember that goes with a division of power wherein the Federal Republic of Germany, the national government, has practically all the areas of jurisdiction.

[Translation]

Recently, in a speech he made in Toronto on November 5, the Prime Minister once again rejected the proposed House of the Provinces, when he said:

[English]

Parliament would be like the American Congress, presenting measures to be vetoed or approved by a President—with the Council of Provinces filling the role of President.

[Translation]

The immediate danger that I foresaw in June when I moved my motion therefore seems to have been avoided. On the other hand, while the proposal for a second legislative chamber made up solely of provincial government representatives, seems to have been definitely rejected, this does not resolve the grievance of the provinces which we underline in our report and which goes back to 1867 when, in accordance with the wishes of Sir John A. Macdonald, our Constitution subordinated in many areas the provincial legislatures to the central Parliament. This subordination is still characterized by the allocation to the federal level of government of extraordinary powers which transcend the distribution of constitutional jurisdictions. We state in the first part of our report that some of these federal powers, such as the power of disallowance and of reservation over provincial legislation, are now outdated, but that others, such as the power to spend and the emergency power, while they should be maintained, should no longer be used unilaterally by the federal Parliament, at least as concerns some of their aspects.

We recommend that, from now on, these powers be invoked only with the preliminary approval of a certain number of provinces representing the majority of the Canadian population. This recommendation is not really revolutionary since it reflects a practice and a custom which are well-established in our country. We would simply like this practice to become official and be entrenched in the Constitution.

We also recommend that the well-established institution of first ministers' conferences be recognized in the Constitution under the name of Federal-Provincial Council and that the functions of this institution include being responsible for approving the use of extraordinary powers by the federal government, such as the power to spend for provincial purposes under the cost-sharing program and the use of emergency power in peacetime.

Once again, this is not such a revolutionary recommendation in view of our present practice, but it would still establish in our Constitution a truer federation than that of 1867 and would constitute an important step towards a renewed federalism.

I would like to underline this last point by quoting the comments of two Canadian experts who wrote to me about our report. First of all, we have the comments of Professor Richard Simeon, head of the Intergovernmental Relations Institute at Queen's University, about this aspect of our report. His letter reads as follows:

[English]

I believe it is a very valuable contribution, and that in particular you have for the first time correctly stated the best way of representing provincial interests in Ottawa. I have, as you know, been a supporter of the "Federal Council" or "House of the Provinces," but I always thought of it as growing out of the intergovernmental mode, as an institutionalization of federal-provincial relations. I believe it was a serious political and conceptual error to see such a council as a "new Senate", or indeed as part of Parliament at all. I think all these proposals have been groping towards the model your committee has set forth.

[Translation]

I should also like to mention the comments of Professor McWhinney, of Simon Fraser University, who has this to say about our report:

● (2100)

[English]

It is cogently argued and lucidly presented—the only really solid piece of thinking we have had to date, on the matter of Senate reform, from any of the mass of Parliamentary special committees, Task Forces, or other Commissions on the Constitution (public or private) in the past few years.

I think you have successfully demonstrated the inherent absurdity of the foreign Bundesrat model for Senate reform, and the intellectual confusions between the legislative review function and the executive federalism functions involved in its sponsoring by various strangely assorted political and lobbyist groups.

[Translation]

In view of last September's events and present circumstances, I doubt that our recommendations concerning the surpervisory role, the "overseeing role" which the First Ministers Conference should play has much of a chance of being accepted, at this time.

Like Senators Croll, Hayden and doubtless many others here in the Senate, I have observed throughout my life that good ideas are not always accepted immediately and without a fight. Perhaps it is unfortunate; on the other hand, it might perhaps otherwise be too pleasant to launch into the fray.

I should like to give here a few examples of that truth as I have lived it. I developed, for the first time, a specific equalization formula in the summer of 1955, but it was not without a bitter fight that it was accepted in 1957. Only today, in 1981, is consideration given to enshrining its principle in the Constitution. The National Arts Council was suggested in 1951; it was not set up until 1957.

I suggested a general option formula for cost-sharing programs in the fall of 1961, yet it was not applied until 1965. When here, in the Senate—and Senator Grosart can vouch for that—we undertook our study on a science policy in 1968, several people thought it was an exercise in futility; still, over 60 of the 85 recommendations we made throughout the years have been implemented.

In the light of my own experiences and yours, I therefore remind those of you who might be pessimistic at this point, of the well-known and wise advice given once by Lafontaine:

Patience and time will achieve more than force and frenzy.

[Senator Lamontagne.]

For my part, I am convinced that is one very important aspect of renewed federalism, and I surely intend to continue advocating it.

The Prime Minister has already announced, on October 16 last, that if the Canada Act were proclaimed on July 1st, 1981, the federal-provincial negotiations on the sharing of powers and other aspects of the constitutional reform would start as soon as July 2. I hope that our positions concerning the federal-provincial conference or a federal-provincial council and its future responsibilities will then get all the attention they deserve.

[English]

I now come to the second part of our report. It attempts to answer the following question: Since the idea of a confederal chamber, composed exclusively of representatives of provincial governments seems to have been abandoned, should we continue to have in Canada a bicameral Parliament, and if so, should the Senate, envisaged as a genuine federal chamber, be elected or appointed?

The case for a bicameral Parliament, especially in a federal system that we are presenting in our report, is based partly on the experience of other countries and on the past record of this chamber. Basically, we claim that Canadians need an upper house not to duplicate what the House of Commons is mainly intended to do and can do efficiently, but to complement it and to correct its deficiencies. We indicate in our report five main reasons why an upper house, properly constituted, can complement the House of Commons.

First, a second chamber, less subjected to party discipline and more independent from the cabinet, can offer a guarantee against arbitrary decisions and for a more detached consideration of legislation.

Senator Flynn: Is that the case?

Senator Lamontagne: Yes.

Secondly, as the Senate is assisted by less partisan and more independent committees and is less preoccupied with the daily obligations of politics, it can devote more time and expertise to the detailed consideration of legislation.

Thirdly, a second chamber, having more time to scrutinize legislative proposals, is in a better position to consider the particular impact of legislation on regions, minorities and individuals, and to exercise a watchdog role in those respects—

Senator Flynn: It should, but it does not.

Senator Lamontagne: —if it is properly designed for that purpose.

Fourthly, a second chamber, with greater stability and continuity in its membership, can compensate for the inevitably high turnover of the Commons.

Finally, a second chamber, with the particular features that I have mentioned, can place a much higher priority on long-term investigation of complex issues, and, on this basis, improve existing government programs and inspire new policy initiatives. This has been proven over the years in this chamber.

These five main reasons which, in our view, justify a bicameral Parliament with two complementary houses, especially in a federal system, have also led us to the conclusion that the second chamber should be appointed rather than elected. Indeed, we state in the report:

> The choice between an elected and an appointed Senate is straightforward: either Canadians want a second chamber as a replica of the House of Commons with the same powers, in which case the Senate should be elective, or they want a complementary and largely advisory second chamber, in which case an appointed Senate seems preferable. The ideal situation, in our view, would be to have an appointed Senate with only suspensive veto powers.

As to the future functions of the Senate, we believe that its legislative and investigative roles should, of course, be continued, but we put great emphasis on what we think should be its new and specific responsibilities as a protector of regions and minorities, including linguistic groups and human rights.

I do not intend to list all the recommendations we make to reform the Senate, but I wish to refer to those that appear to me as the most important. We propose that the number of senators be increased from 104 to 126 mainly to improve representation from western Canada. We believe that all appointments should continue to be made by the federal government, but that every second appointment should be made from a list of names submitted by the government of the province concerned. We recommend that in the future senators be appointed for a fixed term of ten years, renewable for further terms of five years, upon the recommendation arrived at by secret ballot of a Senate committee set up for that purpose.

● (2110)

We also claim that, within an appointed Senate, the elected members of the House of Commons should have supremacy in the last resort in our democratic system. That is why we believe that the Senate should not have an absolute veto. The six-month suspensive veto would give it all the power it needs.

Senator Flynn: Like section 44.

Senator Lamontagne: I do hope that honourable senators will carefully consider all of the other comprehensive recommendations contained in that report.

Before concluding, I wish to raise a point about the inconsistencies that may exist between our report and the content of the resolution which is now being considered by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Honourable senators will undoubtedly wish to refer to these matters during the course of this debate. However, I do not intend to discuss them until the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution has been presented, together with any amendments to the resolution that that committee may decide to recommend.

In my concluding note, I should like to express my conviction that the implementation of Part II of our report would go a long way towards making the Senate a more efficient chamber and a better complement to the House of Commons, for the benefit of all Canadians. As we say in our report:

> The reform of the Senate has been discussed for too long. The time has now come for action.

I hope that the Leader of the Government, after proper consultation with the Leader of the Opposition, and with the government when required, will soon initiate the changes that the Senate can bring about by its own action.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted a question.

The report recommends that the Senate maintain only a suspensive veto power. Does that include only a suspensive veto over constitutional matters?

Senator Lamontagne: As the committee accepted this proposal, it covered all matters, including constitutional matters.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might put a couple of questions to Senator Lamontagne.

One of the reforms you mentioned as being most important for the Senate was that every second appointment would be from a list provided by the provinces. Would you still be agreeable to that if a certain province were to submit a short list comprised of three cabinet ministers?

Senator Lamontagne: We were not writing the Constitution, and we were not endeavouring to define the number that such a list would include. To my mind, this would be a subject of discussion. In any event, I would presume that there would be more than three names on the list.

Senator Thompson: My second question relates to the secret ballot by members of the Senate concerning the continuity of a senator after a 10-year period.

Do you feel that there could be a situation where perhaps, with a small opposition in the Senate, some effective opposition member, or perhaps even an opposition member, might find he is not getting the continuity because of the interest on the government side in not seeing him there?

Senator Lamontagne: We tried to cope with this problem, and we certainly did not have any partisan view in arriving at this particular recommendation. There were some members of the committee who wanted to go much further, but the general feeling was that the Senate, in a non-partisan way, would be in a better position to recommend renewal for a second term than would the Prime Minister.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask one more question of Senator Lamontagne.

In advocating the retention of an appointive Senate as opposed to an elective Senate, you state the former would be less partisan, more independent. Are you talking about the Senate as it is today; or by what means would you make it less partisan and more independent through your recommendations?

Senator Lamontagne: We considered the proposals for an elected Senate. If we had an elected Senate based on the model proposed by Senator Roblin, we would have lists of candidates for election to the Senate, which lists would be set by each party. We discussed that proposal, and the feeling was that such lists would make honourable senators much more dependent on their respective leaders than would the proposal calling for 10-year appointments.

If we want to opt for the American system, which is one of direct election of senators, we would, in my view, reproduce the main weaknesses of that system.

Senator Flynn: It is a choice of weaknesses.

Senator Lamontagne: Yes. There is no ideal system.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might address a question to Senator Lamontagne arising out of what I took to be a reference to a once rather well-known pamphlet, the authorship of which he attributed to me and to which he made a distinguished reply in another pamphlet.

Would the honourable senator not agree with me that the title was not, as he suggested, "The Conservative Facts", but "Here Are The Facts"?

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Lamontagne has given us a most erudite and fascinating address on a subject of great moment to us. The dilemma that I constantly come back to, representing as I do a part of Canada that does not have representation in the government party in the House of Commons, is that I am constantly being asked, and indeed challenged, to represent my regional interests, the interests of the people of British Columbia, in this federal parliamentary process.

Senator Flynn: Why not.

Senator Austin: At the same time as I endeavour to do so—not always with the agreement, I am sure, of the Leader of the Opposition—I find that my mandate—

Senator Donahoe: Not always with the approval of the Leader of the Government.

• (2120)

Senator Austin: I would hope that would be the case also. If I may come back to my thesis—

Senator Grosart: Your question.

Senator Austin: —I find that my mandate to do so as a member of this chamber is constantly being challenged by members of all parties in the House of Commons wherever my view of regional interest conflicts with theirs. I have endeavoured, Senator Lamontagne, to consider whether any appointive process simpliciter would ever provide the degree of mandate required to support those responsibilities, which are regional in nature, in terms of the role of senators in this chamber. That led me to the consideration of the possibility of some form of proportional election.

You have referred quite often in your answers this evening to direct election, and I would ask you whether, in your consideration of a form of proportional election, you gave thought to this question of regional representation and its authority in the Senate and in the entire federal process?

Senator Lamontagne: Well, of course, we did not envisage reform of the House of Commons. I think proportional representation, if it ever comes to this country, should be decided there. As far as we as a committee were concerned, we considered the possibility of increasing the proportion of representation from the western provinces, and we also added the additional condition, in order to provide for a better representation of political parties in this house, that every other appointment in the Senate should be made on the basis of a list provided by provincial governments, so that there would be a more realistic representation in this house.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of October 1980, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT AMENDMENTS TO PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR JOINT ADDRESS—RESULTS OF GALLUP POLL

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last evening the Leader of the Government stated:

> —the proposed amendments presented last evening by the Honourable Jean Chrétien do not necessarily constitute the final number of amendments which the government may be prepared to support.

We were very comforted by this statement which followed a question relating to Mr. Chrétien's statement that the government was listening to all Canadians.

In today's Ottawa Citizen the results of a Gallup poll are shown. Part of this article reads as follows:

> Only 22 per cent support the process Trudeau is advocating of having the Charter of Rights entrenched by the British Parliament before the Constitution is brought home.

It goes on to state that:

> —64 per cent of Canadians support simple patriation but are opposed to asking the British Parliament to add a Charter of Rights to the British North America Act before it is returned to Canada.

Bearing in mind the fact that the Minister of Justice stated that the government has been listening to all Canadians, and the fact that 64 per cent of Canadians support simple patriation, is the government prepared to accept the views of those Canadians, who represent a large majority of the population?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): This question is, of course, not totally unexpected. The publicity given to this Gallup poll has been quite extensive. However, I should like to remind honourable senators that the question asked was:

> As you may know, the federal government, under Prime Minister Trudeau, is planning to ask the British Parliament to pass legislation bringing the British North America Act—that is, the Canadian Constitution—to Canada.
> Which of these alternatives would you prefer to see?

The replies given were in response to that question.

I ask honourable senators to consider what kind of response would have been elicited from the Canadian people had the wording been something like this:

> As you may know, the federal government, under Prime Minister Trudeau, is attempting to patriate the Canadian Constitution after 53 years of deadlock, frustration and failure to obtain agreement from the provinces. Do you support action now on patriating the Constitution?

May I suggest, honourable senators, that the answer overwhelmingly would have been that they do want the Constitution patriated.

Senator Grosart: Of course.

Senator Perrault: The people would say they want it in this country.

• (1410)

With the kind of background it has—53 years of attempts to negotiate with the provinces—I am certain the people would support the method the government has chosen to undertake this very important task. Furthermore, I reiterate what I said last evening, that the government is prepared to consider further amendments to make these constitutional proposals acceptable to Canadians.

Senator Flynn: Quite apart from the irrelevant comments of the Leader of the Government with respect to the polls, do I understand that he is telling us that the Prime Minister has changed his mind and is not prepared to look at these polls in the same fashion as he suggested before Christmas—that being that polls are for dogs?

Senator Olson: No, it is a crooked question.

Senator Perrault: Of course the attitudes of Canadians are always given careful and serious attention by this government, and supporters of this government, but, honourable senators, I suggest that a government is abdicating its responsibility if its actions are going to be dictated solely by polls which are produced from time to time by survey organizations. The government has a much higher responsibility than to be guided by polls.

Senator Grosart: Or referenda?

Senator Flynn: I suggest to the Leader of the Government that the majority in Parliament should not be led by the fancies of one man.

Senator Olson: That has never happened with this government.

Senator Perrault: I say to the Leader of the Opposition that that is not the case. To suggest that somehow this constitutional package has been developed by one person is clearly ludicrous. It represents a consensus developed across the country.

Senator Flynn: Over 53 years?

Senator Perrault: It is interesting to note that the Canadian Civil Liberties Association now supports these amendments. We have had support from the Honourable Richard B. Hatfield, the distinguished Conservative Premier of New Brunswick. The Leader of the Opposition should confer more frequently with his Conservative friend in New Brunswick to determine the many reasons why he, the premier of that province, is so supportive of these proposals.

The amendments are now supported by the Canadian Bar Association—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Perrault: —of which the distinguished Leader of the Opposition is a member.

Senator Flynn: I disagree entirely.

Senator Perrault: You may disagree with the Canadian Bar Association, but I suggest—

Senator Flynn: No, I disagree with your interpretation.

Senator Perrault: I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition read the statement issued last night by that organization.

Senator Flynn: I was at the meeting of the special joint committee when the Canadian Bar Association presented its brief, and that association did not have the courage to say whether the method employed by the government was legal or otherwise. They simply discussed the Charter of Rights, saying that it was a good thing—and, of course, it would be a good thing if the provinces agreed—but on the unilateralism of the action of the federal government, the Canadian Bar Association withheld its support. They did not have the courage to criticize it, but certainly they did not support it.

Senator Perrault: You are attacking the Canadian Bar Association?

Senator Flynn: They did not support it, and I deny the statement by the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator may choose to carve out any position in the political spectrum that he may wish, but I suggest that he is going to find himself in a very lonely position standing in opposition to these great advances in human rights.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Flynn: That, of course, is the strategy of the Canadian government—to tell the Canadian people that we in the Progressive Conservative Party are opposed to the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. That is not the problem. There is the Canadian Bill of Rights, and each of the provinces has a bill of rights. The question is whether, when it comes to the question of entrenching those rights, it is only the federal government that is going to say what is going to be in the Constitution. That is where the government is wrong, and that is where the Leader of the Government, and those who support the government, are wrong.

Senator Perrault: The action of the Minister of Justice the other evening in bringing forward a whole panoply of suggested amendments to the constitutional package indicates that the government is listening to the Canadian people.

Senator Frith: And to the provinces.

Senator Perrault: I remind the Leader of the Opposition that the late great Prime Minister, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, as he may well recall, had hoped to extend his Bill of Rights into some more entrenched form. The Leader of the Opposition may well remember the frustrations Mr. Diefenbaker experienced at that time, and the frustrations that he, as a member of that cabinet, experienced at that time.

Surely there should be some recognition given to the fact that we now have a Prime Minister who is willing to proceed, with substantial support from the Canadian people across the country, to give meaning and substance to many of Mr. Diefenbaker's visions.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government speaks of substantial support across the country. Given that 64 per cent of Canadians oppose the method chosen by the present administration and the present Prime Minister, I suggest to him that he is certainly off base in that regard.

Senator Perrault: His own leader said just a few months ago that the only poll that is really important is the poll taken on election day.

Senator Donahoe: That is the next election.

Senator Flynn: Yes. It will come in due course.

• (1415)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I be permitted a supplementary? I was extremely interested in the statement by the minister a moment ago that the government is still open to amendments. Am I to take it then that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister was misquoted in today's newspapers where he is reported to have told journalists on his aircraft that the government has gone as far as it can go and would probably not be accepting further changes?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am reflecting the view of the government that further amendments will be considered if they clearly appear to be in the public and national interest. I have not seen a transcript of the Prime Minister's reply, and I would like to have the total transcript—the question he was asked and his reply—before commenting further.

Senator Murray: Does the leader think there is room for further amendments?

Senator Perrault: There is always room for further amendments in the considerations of this government which has demonstrated its great flexibility on matters of this kind.

Senator Murray: Then the minister does not believe that the government has gone as far as it can go with this project?

Senator Perrault: The expression "as far as it can go" should be reworded. The government will consider amendments if they serve the national interest. It is not a matter of adopting a negotiating position which somehow is going to achieve an immediate strategic advantage.

TRANSPORT

DOUBLE TRACKING OF RAILWAYS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday in my home city, Winnipeg, the Minister of Transport told the Manitoba Farm Bureau that if nothing is done about railway losses the Canadian Pacific main line to Vancouver will become overburdened by late 1983 or 1984, and that traffic rationing will become necessary. So that the government will perhaps avoid what could be a serious problem of rationing of track space, can the Leader of the Government tell us how close we are at this time to the implementation of the double tracking?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is an obvious need for increased Canadian rail capacity. The western economy, despite the adverse economic climate in the world generally, is doing very well in many of its phases of activity. Of course, there will have to be an increase in double tracking. The CPR at the present time is planning the construction of, I think, four or five new tunnels in the Rocky Mountains to accommodate increased activity on the line. However, I have not seen the complete text of the minister's speech. Perhaps one of my colleagues will wish to add any information he has on this subject. It is certainly no mystery that, largely because of policies adopted by this government, the economy out west is booming these days and we are going to need more rail capacity.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Well, if ever I heard an outrageous inaccuracy, that has to be it. How can I sit here and listen to this?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Well, we have no choice. We should be used to it by now.

GRAIN

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I am happy to see him present in the chamber.

Senator Donahoe: A novelty.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I am glad to be here.

Senator Bielish: Is it still the government's policy to compensate grain farmers for the period during which Canada participated in the embargo of the Soviet Union? Would the minister responsible for the Wheat Board indicate when we can anticipate an announcement of those compensation payments?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the question of compensation for the loss that took place because of Prime Minister Clark's going along with the partial embargo—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): And you accepted it subsequently.

Senator Argue: No, we got rid of it subsequently and removed—

Senator Flynn: You took some time.

Senator Argue: —the albatross that a western Conservative had hung around the necks of the western producers. So the Canadian Wheat Board has gone over to the Soviet Union and recovered the situation and put another—

Senator Flynn: But there is no loss.

Senator Argue: —$500 million into the pockets of western farmers. So it has been a wonderful success.

• (1420)

Regarding the question of compensation—I do not want to get on to something else, but I welcome the interruption from my distinguished friend, the Leader of the Opposition—the matter is under very active consideration. It is being considered and, so far as I am concerned, there is a substantial case to be made for compensation; but I have to say that a final decision has yet to be made.

ENERGY

OIL—SUSPENSION OF SYNCRUDE PLANT EXPANSION—DOMESTIC PRICING POLICY IN WORLD PRICES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a couple of questions, one of which is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development and relates to the government's so successful economic policies in western Canada that the Leader of the Opposition—

An Hon. Senator: The Leader of the Government.

Senator Roblin: Well, he should be in the opposition—that the Leader of the Government had brought to our notice. As my honourable friend probably expects me to say, I am referring to the announcement that the Syncrude plant expansion is now to be suspended.

I draw my honourable friend's attention to the statement he made yesterday about the government's policy of pricing oil from these unconventional sources at $38 per barrel plus an amount tied to the CPI, and our exchange of views as to the effectiveness of this policy.

It is now perfectly clear, if we need any more demonstration, that for the third time we have a major unconventional oil producing source placed in the deep freeze because of the economics of the present government, the oil economics of the national energy policy. I ask my honourable friend what proposals he has to break this log jam.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is a matter of repeating over and over again what needs to happen to break this log jam; that is, to come to an agreement with another government in this country that has a great deal of jurisdiction in this regard.

My honourable friend is trying to do something that, in my view, he should not try to do, which is to specifically identify the price of $38 per barrel plus escalation as the reason why it is not going forward. I believe that, on reflection, he will agree with me that it is a pretty narrow view, almost to the point of misleading as to what is the real difficulty in holding up those mega-projects which this country needs so badly in order to bring on more supplies from inside Canada.

I should draw to the honourable senator's attention that if he is now suggesting that the price should be something in excess of $38 per barrel plus escalation, then, of course, he is not in tune with the people involved in it, because, for his information, the world price has not yet reached that point.

He is suggesting to me that whatever increases there may be over $38 will not be as rapid as OPEC-led price increases. The honourable senator can rest assured that this government meant it when it said that we would have "made in Canada" prices based on costs in Canada.

We can have some argument about whether or not it should be the CPI inflator or some other, but if he is suggesting that $38 plus an escalator is insufficient, then he is also continuing to say that we will rely on someone outside of this country to set the basic framework for our energy prices, and we do not agree with that.

Senator Roblin: On the contrary, I am saying that I am not relying on someone outside of this country to set the price; I am relying on the government to set the price. What does he think they are there for, with their national economic policy? They said they are going to set the price. My honourable friend accuses me of misleading the house, or coming close to an inaccurate statement in this matter. It is not my statement; it is the statement of the Syncrude people, and I shall read it to my honourable friend. It says:

> The new reference price of $38 a barrel, plus indexation with the consumer price index and other budget measures such as the new tax on revenue, have made the expansion uneconomic,

My honourable friend tells me that he is going to sit there and let that situation cook, I presume, until such time as he feels he is ready to do something about it. Meanwhile, the evidence that has been adduced before the National Energy Board hearings indicates that the cost of the present policy has been to set back the development of these major oil projects by two years, with a loss of 200 million barrels of production, at an additional cost to Canadians of $18 billion to cover the increased volume of imports of foreign oil that are necessary to meet domestic demands.

● (1425)

I am not saying that I endorse those figures without question, because they are not my figures; but I am saying to my honourable friend that, whether he accepts them dollar for dollar or barrel for barrel, or not, they still reflect the truth and accuracy of the matter, that my honourable friend's policies are disastrous for this country, and I ask him what he is going to do about that.

Senator Olson: Well, my honourable friend can raise all the steam he wants. He is now moving into another area, and he knows very well that it is against the rules of this chamber to ask whether or not a statement made in the press is accurate.

Senator Flynn: Where is that?

Senator Olson: That is clear. Well, do you want me to read chapter and verse to you?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Olson: I can understand why my honourable friend wants me to do that, because it has been clearly demonstrated that there are a whole lot of people on his side of the house who need to read the rules, since they violate, in particular, the rules with regard to Question Period all the time.

To get back to the substance of what is involved—

Senator Flynn: Read it.

Senator Olson: I can do that; that's no problem. We will have the quotation here in a minute.

Senator Flynn: No, no. Those are not our rules.

Senator Olson: I will identify this very clearly. It is Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, the Fifth Edition, at page 130. Citation 357 says:

> "A question oral or written must not: . . .
>
> (e) inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are true.

Senator Roblin: A point of order, honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: Give the date.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I never asked my honourable friend whether those statements were true. He is flogging a dead horse. I never asked him that. I told him that I did not accept the accuracy of those statements. He is the one who raised that point. This is typical of the technique employed by the gentlemen opposite. If you cannot win the argument on the facts, produce some straw man and knock the hell out of it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend is trying to use the tactic he used a couple of minutes ago. I can, however, tell him in advance that it is not going to succeed. I am not intimidated by that kind of action. If the honourable senator does not accept the thought expressed in the press statement to which he referred, and if at the same time he is not asking whether it is true or not, why is he bringing it up at all? He can have it one way or the other, but not both, and if that is the status of what is in the report that he read, he has no business taking our time with it at all.

Senator Roblin: I do not think, really, that my honourable friend's argument is worth my answering it. I merely say to him—

Senator Olson: Why don't you obey the rules?

Senator Roblin: I have been paying as much attention to the rules as my honourable friend ever does, and perhaps a good deal more. Let me tell him that.

In any case, my honourable friend has given me the answer—or, at least, has failed to give me the answer—that deals with the question at issue, which is: What is the policy of the government with respect to these major oil projects in western Canada which are stymied?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the answer to this has been given over and over again. As my honourable friend knows, we have offered, for those kinds of projects, a price that is equal to, or more than, the world price of oil now, followed by escalation at least by the CPI. It is negotiable whether we use that or the cost of construction index. My honourable friend knows that. It has been said a dozen times in here.

Now, however, the honourable senator is coming along and reading something out of a newspaper for which he will take no responsibility, not even to the extent that he will agree with it, and is saying that it is not enough, and is asking what we are going to do about it. That is a pretty stupid question, in my judgment.

Senator Flynn: If that is so, it's only because it matches your answers.

Senator Roblin: My friend, in his usual interesting way, has put words in my mouth which I am really not inclined to swallow. What I am saying to him is that he has a policy; he says he has told us what the policy is; but the policy does not work. He is, I suppose, going to sit there and stonewall this question until the cows come home.

However, while this is obviously a matter of concern to international oil companies—which, I have to admit, are quite big enough to look after themselves without any assistance from me—what does my friend have to say about those aspects of government policy which affect the small Canadian-owned oil companies? The president of the organization known as the Independent Petroleum Association, speaking in this city to the Canadian Club the other day, made it perfectly clear that in his opinion, at any rate, the impact of government policy is tougher on the small Canadian-owned oil companies than it is on the multinationals. I have to ask my honourable friend if he is willing to invite Mr. Earl Joudrie, the President of the Independent Petroleum Association, into his office and discuss these matters with him, because obviously, if his policy is no good on the big projects and is no good on the small projects, it leaves something to be desired.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I am way ahead of my honourable friend, because I did meet with Mr. Earl Joudrie in my office at 8 o'clock this morning for an hour and a half, at which time we went over a number of those things.

• (1430)

I can tell my honourable friend that we never claim to be perfect, but we are substantially better than the members opposite and their colleagues when they are in office. That is clear, and the Canadian people agree with us on that. We said, when the policy was announced on October 28, and in subsequent explanations that were given, that we were open to negotiation. What we also indicated was that this policy and some of the details of administration, including the regulations, were negotiable. As a matter of fact, there is a committee in Calgary, an Alberta technical advisory committee, reporting to me, and another one reporting to EMR, which are going over the program very carefully and making suggestions to us with respect to the question of application insofar as the regulations are concerned. It is very important that that happen because, of course, those are the people who have to live with the practicalities of what comes out of the policies and the regulations that are part of that administration. So, we are doing that all the time, but there may be some additional adjustments to be made.

I find it rather interesting, honourable senators, that the honourable member went down the other road until he ran into the difficulty that we had a few minutes ago, and then he changed course. But what he failed to do was state the obvious, and that is that it has been stated by the Premier of Alberta that he does not intend to proceed with any of those mega-projects until the totality of the energy package is put together. If that is not the whole reason, it is the major reason, and it has been stated. That is why I was criticizing him for trying to drag this red herring in, that the $38 plus inflation is the reason, when he knows, as well as I do, that it is not true.

Senator Roblin: The reason that the matters are not going ahead in western Canada is very simple. It is the government's policy. That is what has brought about the whole problem with the industry and Alberta. It is simple. It is the government's policy, and until my honourable friend is willing to change his policies, he has to accept responsibility for the result of that policy.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Last evening I asked the minister a question in this regard. I asked whether he, personally, was going to take a hand in the negotiations with the producing provinces, in view of the importance of the energy sector to our national economic growth and in view of his position as Alberta's representative in the federal cabinet. I was very interested to hear him say a few minutes ago that he had met with Mr. Joudrie, the President of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada. That being the case, I wonder whether he would now answer the question that I put to him last night, and to which he responded at considerable length without answering it: Is he, personally, going to take a hand in negotiations with the producing provinces?

I have another question in this general area arising from something the minister said a moment ago to the effect that the world price had not yet reached $38 a barrel.

Senator Olson: Yes, for some of our imports, that is right.

Senator Murray: "For some of our imports," he now says. I wonder whether the minister would state what the world price is at the moment, including the premiums that are imposed by almost every one of the oil-exporting countries and which, according to some authoritative estimates, have brought the average price, certainly of a barrel of OPEC oil, to $39 U.S.

● (1435)

Senator Olson: My honourable friend will know that he has almost answered his own question by saying that it is an average of $39 a barrel. Obviously, there is some over, and there must be some under as well.

I guess the only answer I can give to him is that I will try to obtain a list of the various prices that are charged for imported oil. He can then run it up and take out some averages. However, he ought to be a little careful when he takes out those averages, and not just simply add up ten different prices and divide the total by ten. That may not be the average—

Senator Roblin: Well, you do it.

Senator Olson: That may not be the average, because we do have different volumes coming in at those various prices. At any rate, I will have a look at that.

I should like to get back to the first part of the question, however, and assure him and others that I have taken a keen interest in the energy program and the representations made by interested people in the industry, such as IPAC, CPA, and a whole raft of others, and I can assure him and those others that I will continue to do so.

It is not a question of the Minister of Economic Development having no interest in the matter; but I can tell him that the Minister of Economic Development does not presume that he is the Minister of Energy either.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

NON-FUNDED LIABILITY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The last report of the Canada Pension Plan, for the year 1978, projected that by 1985 the costs would exceed the contributions. The Auditor General, in his report, has stated that the Canada Pension Plan has a non-funded liability of approximately $100 billion.

What action does the government propose to take in order to put the Canada Pension Plan on a sound actuarial basis?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senator, the question will be taken as notice.

[Senator Murray.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—CRISIS—PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government. Has he had the opportunity of holding any talks with the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs with regard to a review or study of Canadian foreign policy, in particular as it pertains to the Polish crisis?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators, I have not. Senator van Roggen is not here this week. I have been talking to him by telephone, but we have not really explored that question. I hope the three of us will be able to discuss the matter on Senator van Roggen's return next week.

Senator Haidasz: In such discussions could the deputy leader arrange for a briefing perhaps—in camera, if necessary—of any senators interested in the Polish crisis? If there is such a briefing, perhaps it could be made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think it would be appropriate, especially in view of the ominous visit to Warsaw yesterday of Soviet Marshal Viktor Kulikov, Commander-in-Chief of the Warsaw Pact forces.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will see that those comments are brought to the attention of the committee chairman, Senator van Roggen.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It is reported that the Chrysler Corporation has told the government that it cannot meet its planned investment commitments in Canada. Would the minister indicate whether his government regards the package negotiated with Chrysler last year as unalterable, or is the government, as reported, prepared to change the provisions of that agreement?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, that matter is now under consideration by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. With respect to whether that package is unalterable, the fact is that conditions have apparently changed rather significantly in the United States vis-à-vis the parent company. In other words, the level of financing and the timeframe needed to revive the company, if "revive" is the word, or put it on a firm financial footing for the future have now changed, and my honourable friend will therefore know that negotiations are and have been underway. It is quite likely that the Chrysler Loan Review Board, as I believe it is called in the United States, will hand in a decision tomorrow which may change even that part of the package.

Whether or not it is unalterable, it seems to me we must look at the changing conditions. I shall not go farther than that now, except to say that we do have to take all of those things into account. Certainly, we believe the kind of proportionality involved in the first offer is as valid today as it was then, but there may be some changes.

My honourable friend will also realize, of course, that that offer was made because there had been no drawdown and there would not be for some time with respect to the offer that was made.

● (1440)

Senator Donahoe: Having discovered that "unalterable" does not necessarily mean "unalterable" and that certain aspects of this agreement are, because of changed conditions, to be subjected to change, is the government determined—no matter what else it may change—to insist on holding Chrysler to the fulfilment of all of the investment commitments contained in the loan guarantee agreement?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not believe I can add very much to what I have already said. I probably answered the question before the honourable senator asked it.

THE ECONOMY

IMPORTATION OF AUTOMOTIVE PARTS—TRADE DEFICIT

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, could the Minister of Economic Development tell us why there has been a drop in vehicle parts imports which has resulted in the narrowing of Canada's auto trade deficit with the United States by as much as $761 million in the first seven months of 1980?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I thank the honourable senator for giving me notice that he intended to ask a question of this nature.

It is true that the trade deficit for the first eleven months of 1980 has decreased by approximately $800 million or perhaps some $700 million. I am informed that one of the reasons for this improved trade picture relates to the kind of automobiles Canadians are now producing. Our manufacturers are concentrating more on producing trucks and passenger cars. These vehicles are more adaptable to the U.S. market, as the increase in the surplus of trade illustrates. In fact, our overall assembled vehicle surplus stood at $557.4 million for the first eleven months. Of course, the depressed state of the U.S. market has meant that our total trade with them has declined from $23 billion to about $19 billion, so that the U.S. has undergone cutbacks in their production resulting in fewer of their cars being exported. Although it is difficult to predict, this trend seems to be continuing. The decrease in our auto trade deficit for the 12 months of 1980 could reach about $1 billion.

THE CONSTITUTION

MINORITY GROUPS—SUPPORT OF GOVERNMENT AMENDMENTS TO PROPOSED RESOLUTION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Is the Leader of the Government aware of the enthusiastic support with which the constitutional amendments have been received by the minority groups with respect to the inclusion in those amendments of a reference to multiculturalism?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): A number of representations have been received from people in minority groups indicating their great enthusiasm for the changes.

The honourable senator may have received other messages which he may wish to communicate to the Senate concerning the enthusiastic support coming from the multicultural community.

Senator Bosa: Perhaps I will mention them in my next speech.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE AUTOMOTIVE MANUFACTURERS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question which I had hoped to address to the Minister of State for Economic Development following my earlier questions but, unfortunately, Senator Bosa intervened.

Is it the government's view that in making concessions to Ford last week it has placed itself in a position of having to reconsider the terms which it extracted from Chrysler in exchange for the loan guarantees given to that company?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that part of the question as notice and refer it to the minister directly responsible.

As I tried to explain—and I probably answered the question before it was asked—when there is a very significant change in certain conditions, this government is flexible and intelligent enough to recognize that those changes exist and must at least be looked at. No decision has been made as to what amendments may be made.

I believe it would be better if I answered the question after we know whether the United States Loan Board and Chrysler Corporation International are going to change some of the terms or conditions.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

EDUCATION OF INDIANS IN SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA—REPORTS OF AUDIT SERVICES BUREAU

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In December a newspaper article appeared dealing with a report prepared by the government's Audit Services Bureau which, I understand, is a branch of the Department of Supply and Services. The Audit Services Bureau produced a scathing report against the Department of Indian Affairs, dealing with Indian education in the province of Saskatchewan.

I understand further that a report in almost identical form is about to be brought down in connection with the province of Manitoba, dealing with the same criticisms, such as quality of education being totally ignored, 80 per cent absenteeism, and excessive drop-out rates.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate what, if anything, is being done by the government to deal with these sorts of criticisms?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have the detailed information requested by the honourable senator and, therefore, the question will be taken as notice.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—EFFECT OF DEFERRAL OF COLD LAKE AND ALSANDS PROJECTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have four delayed answers to questions.

On December 4, Senator Doody asked a question regarding budget provisions in the light of Alsands' announcement that the pricing policy offered by the government in its energy package is insufficient to ensure continuation of the project.

I have a rather long reply from the Honourable Marc Lalonde, and I would ask that this be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

(The answer follows:)

> On December 4, the Honourable Marc Lalonde explained that the federal government is fully committed to the Alsands project but that he could not give absolute assurance that satisfactory negotiations would be completed to ensure that the project would proceed, simply because he could not speak for the government of Alberta. However, he reminded the House that the record showed that the federal government has always been very forthcoming and ready to make sure that oil sands and heavy oil projects will take place. In this context, honourable members will recall that the federal government took the initiative in February 1975 to save the Syncrude project. At that time the governments of Alberta and Ontario, and the three private participants responded, and the project went ahead on schedule.
> Examination of the recently issued report on the National Energy Program will show the emphasis being placed on oil sands and heavy oil development through such measures as the maintenance of the depletion allowance, the provision of special tax incentives for heavy oil upgrading plants, and the application of reference prices at or close to international prices to encourage the opening up of these resources.
>
> The government will continue to welcome constructive comments on all aspects of the National Energy Program and will give each one careful consideration. At the same time, we will be issuing Discussion Papers and guidelines on the various incentives including the Petroleum Incentives Program to assist in the policy dialogue.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Many constructive comments have been received to date and they will all assist in the implementation of an effective program to the benefit of Canadians in all regions of the country.

I must stress the importance of getting further oil sands and heavy oil into production to ensure adequacy of oil supply for all Canadians. The Alsands project is an important element in the energy supply plan for this country in this decade. Canadians are relying on a fair and reasonable response on the part of the government of Alberta in support of this highly important resource development project.

With regard to the supplementary question raised by Senator Doody, as to whether the government's estimates of self-sufficiency by 1990 will be met in view of the Cold Lake and Alsands deferral, we have every confidence that these projects will be back on schedule within a period of time that will ensure achievement of the self-sufficiency objective. That objective depends on steady progress in conservation, in substituting away from oil, and in active resource programs in western Canada, the oil sands, the Arctic, and off the east coast. The National Energy Program is strongly supportive of all of these initiatives.

HOME HEATING—CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I also have a reply to a question asked by Senator Muir on December 4 asking for an indication as to how soon provisions respecting conversion grants would become effective, and as to how long they would remain in effect.

This answer is in the same detailed category as the previous delayed answer, and I would also ask that this be incorporated in today's record of proceedings.

(The answer follows:)

> The Canadian Oil Substitution Program (COSP) is designed to reduce oil consumption by 1990 to 10 per cent of our total energy requirement in the residential, commercial and industrial sectors of our economy.
> COSP is a long-term program which will be in effect until the end of 1990. It will consist of grants to consumers to help cover the costs of converting their homes from heating oil to natural gas, electricity, propane and renewable sources of energy, such as solar and wood. Consumers will be eligible for grants of 50 per cent of their conversion costs, up to a maximum grant of $800.
>
> This conversion program will be administered in cooperation with provincial and territorial governments or designated authorities such as provincial Crown Corporations. It will take several months for full details of the program to be developed. However, consumers who convert their heating systems after October 28, the announcement date of the program, should save their receipts as they will be eligible for assistance once payments commence, as long as they meet the criteria set out in the program.

Federal and provincial officials are currently conducting discussions with respect to specific details of the program's application in each province. It is hoped that all provinces will participate, and the program is being designed flexibly to make that possible. For example, special provisions have been made for Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, provinces which do not currently have access to natural gas. In these provinces COSP will apply to renewable energy sources such as solar and wood, and as an alternative to conversion the federal government will permit consumers to receive a taxable grant of 50 per cent, up to $800, of expenditures resulting in lower heating oil consumption such as upgrading oil furnaces and home insulation. Entitlements under ongoing energy-savings programs are not affected by this grant.

I would like to assure the Senate that full details of this exciting new program will be widely available once agreements are reached with provincial governments.

HOME HEATING—APPLICATION OF CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I also have a reply to a question asked by Senator Phillips on December 4 asking if the government had, for the third time, altered its position on conversion grants under the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, as applied to electricity generated by oil burning plants.

Honourable senators, the reply is rather lengthy, so I would ask that it be taken as read.

(The answer follows:)

In recognition of the fact that the Atlantic region of Canada is totally dependent on offshore oil supplies, the National Energy Program provides this area with a variety of special measures, over and above those available to Canada as a whole, to ensure that a resolute shift to more abundant fuels will be made within the next decade.

For example, the federal government is prepared to act to resolve regulatory issues in an expeditious manner so that construction of the natural gas pipeline may begin as soon as possible.

With reference to the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, grants will be provided for conversion or replacement of oil-fired heating systems to enable homes and businesses to utilize natural gas, propane, wood, solar or other regionally appropriate fuels. However, the National Energy Program initially excludes conversion to electricity, as so much of this energy source is generated by oil.

Some 140,000 homes in New Brunswick are currently oil-heated. The program target is to convert a maximum of 114,000 homes by 1990. While encouraging conversion from oil, the NEP will provide increased support for the upgrading of home insulation. Since its inception in 1977, the Canadian Home Insulation Program (CHIP) has made available approximately $10 million to 24,000 households in New Brunswick.

Since oil is the source of 63 per cent of the electricity generated by utilities in New Brunswick, in an effort to reduce this oil dependency, this province will be eligible for a share of $175 million in federal funds which will help finance the conversion of oil-fired electrical generating plants to coal. To this end, the maritime provinces will share in the benefits of a $4 million expanded program of research to support development of regional coal resources. New Brunswick will be eligible for a share of $150 million in federal funds for the demonstration of improved coal-use conducive to the utilization of coals with a high sulphur content, but with minimal environmental impact.

With various regionally-specific measures, the federal government has shown that it is particularly sensitive to the energy problems facing Canada's maritime region. It cannot be cited for dereliction of responsibility because it has placed a temporary moratorium on providing electrical conversion grants to households in New Brunswick until a shift from oil-generated to less costly and more abundant energy sources takes place in the production of electricity.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY GENERAL OF NATO

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a brief answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on December 16. I would advise the members of the chamber that on January 12, the Polish Ambassador presented, on behalf of his government, several specific requests for economic assistance from Canada. Honourable senators, that was only two days ago. I can report that these requests will be given prompt and serious consideration by the Canadian government.

ENERGY

SASKATCHEWAN—OIL PRODUCTION—FEDERAL EXPORT TAX

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last evening Senator Roblin asked the minister a question regarding Saskatchewan heavy oil and the problems associated with that. At that time I thought he was referring to the price increase instituted by the National Energy Board. I see now that he was not.

As the minister is aware, there has been serious reaction in Saskatchewan to a ruling of the National Energy Board that increased the federal export tax by $6 a barrel on Saskatchewan oil going to a United States customer located in Minnesota which is able to process that particular grade of heavy oil.

Because of that ruling, that industry, Koch Industries of Minnesota, has cut its imports of medium and heavy Saskatchewan crude oil by 25,000 barrels a day from the normal winter level of about 90,000 barrels a day.

The Province of Saskatchewan, of course, is quite irate about this and has stated that it was not involved in any prior consultations. It has been indicated that the National Energy Board's policy branch is trying to find a new buyer for the shut-in Saskatchewan oil, and that it hopes to have something done on this by Friday.

My question is as to whether in fact something has been done. I have heard rumours to the effect that something has been done, that there has been a reversal of this situation, so I wonder whether the minister would look into this matter and report back to the Senate, because it is a matter of real concern to the economy of Saskatchewan.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that specific question as notice and try to answer it later this day. I wish also to say that, having read the question raised by Senator Roblin last evening, while he may have intimated that it ought to be, it did not contain that specific matter. I certainly will look into that with respect to both questions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I was not addressing myself to that particular point. I was addressing myself to a broader point.

Senator Olson: The low production.

Senator Roblin: That is right. I was not addressing myself to the Koch deal which my honourable friend is talking about.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege which has just come to my notice. It is a matter of correction.

When Senator Lamontagne was speaking yesterday, in his introductory remarks he said:

> As honourable senators are already aware, the substance of this report—

That is the report on the future of the Senate.

> —was unanimously approved by the committee members before the federal-provincial conference of September 8 last.

Speaking for myself, I emphatically did not lend my approbation to the state of affairs of September 8, nor do I now. Therefore, I wish to disassociate myself from that unanimity.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: I should like to add that we had our more-or-less final meeting of the committee at the beginning of September but, unfortunately, Senator Roblin was not present. A motion was moved in due form and it was carried unanimously, and that, as I said yesterday, is contained in the report of the committee.

I know that at an earlier meeting Senator Roblin had expressed some objections to the general orientation of the report but, unfortunately, when that motion was put to the committee he was not present.

● (1450)

Senator Roblin: I should like to make it clear that, while I was not there on the particular date mentioned, I was there before and after, and both before and after that date I expressed my consent to some important features of this report. While I can understand my honourable friend's explanation, it is important to me, at any rate, that I record what I believe to be the facts.

[Translation]

Senator Lamontagne: I should like to add simply that unfortunately, under the circumstances, those who are absent are always wrong.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We should get things straight however. As far as I am concerned, I do not know to which committee meeting Senator Lamontagne is referring when he speaks of unanimity. I do know that at a given time it was agreed that the report would be tabled but that no one was bound by it and that everyone would be free to criticize any aspect of the report. That was the decision taken at the time. Was another decision reached in the absence of opposition senators, I do not know. But, in my opinion, those were the conditions under which the report was to be submitted to the Senate.

Senator Lamontagne: As I said, I believe that Senator Flynn was at the meeting when the motion was put to the committee. If my memory serves me well, that motion was moved by Senator Smith. At that time we agreed to give unanimous consent to the motion because no objections were raised concerning the substance of the report. As a matter of fact, this sentence appears at the very beginning of the report itself.

Therefore, all the committee members had the opportunity to read this introduction before the report was published and no objections were raised at that time.

[English]

Senator Roblin: I just cannot agree with that, because I was there on one occasion when Senator Smith moved a motion to approve some activities of the committee. I most specifically reserved my position, and that was understood by the members of the committee and, I think, by my honourable friend. I think that fact should be recorded.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I think that I also should say that I disagree with the statement made by Senator Lamontagne. It is true that the substance of the report was agreed upon before the First Ministers' Conference, and I understood that there would be no changes except in the actual drafting.

At the last meeting held some time after that, two recommendations that I thought to be of considerable importance were deleted from the report. I had no warning prior to the meeting that the committee would be considering deleting those two matters, two matters I was very much in favour of. I objected to that procedure at the time and said that if it was intended to consider changing the substance of the report which had been agreed upon, then all members of the committee should be given prior warning and an opportunity to be present, but they were not given that opportunity.

As I said, at that meeting these two recommendations were deleted and I objected strenuously at the time not only to the procedure but to the deletions, and I still object strenuously.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I hope not to add difficulty to this matter but to straighten it out. However, I find myself agreeing with both sides. I was present at the meetings and remember clearly that we agreed to the substance of the report. We did not attempt to define what "substance" meant, but certainly there were various ideas put forward as to what "substance" might mean. It is also true that each individual was left with the right to pick any particular part of the report with which he or she disagreed. When the report was presented in the Senate every senator, notwithstanding that he or she had signed the report and supported its substance, reserved the right to disagree with parts of it.

Incidentally, while dealing with this, I hope, because of the importance of this report to us in particular, that every senator will make an intervention in the debate on this inquiry, be it short, be it substantial, be it nitpicking, or be it disagreement with phrasing. The Senate should benefit from the report of this committee and, therefore, I think every senator will try to make some intervention on it and, no doubt, in the course of that, will exercise the rights that we have been talking about.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I must object to my honourable friend's statement that there was agreement in substance, because that covers a lot of territory. I made what I thought was a well reasoned and relatively short intervention in connection with the way in which the Senate was constituted. My views on that subject are known. How could I agree with the substance of a report which reaffirms its interest in an appointed Senate, to say nothing of the right of senators to reappoint themselves when their term is up? How could I be said to agree in substance with the whole report containing that clause when, manifestly, by the words from my own mouth in the committee, I did not? So, I must say that the agreement in substance was not in question at all. It was just not there.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I recall it, that is precisely what happened and the very reservation Senator Roblin is making was made by Senator Smith himself when he moved the motion, namely, that everyone have the right to disagree with parts of the report.

Senator Roblin: How do you get unanimous approval out of that?

Senator Frith: I did not speak to that; I spoke to the agreement in principle.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 3, 1980, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Argue calling the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular:

1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;

2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;

3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;

4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and

5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in participating in this debate let me remind you, as an opener, of the wording of the inquiry. It is in five parts, and I propose to speak to two of them. The inquiry of Senator Argue calls the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular:

1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;

2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;

3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;

4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and

5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.

By way of further introduction, I think it important to say that I regard this policy as being well named, and that it depends on a return of attention to its title for an understanding of its substance. It is called the National Energy Program—and I underline those words, because I do not think it purports to be a national oil policy exclusively, or a provincial energy policy, or a local energy policy in any respect. For that reason, it must, as do all great pan-Canadian programs introduced by this or any other government, reflect, and naturally reflect, the tensions, the regional interests and the diversities that make up Canada—those things that make it a difficult country to govern and a great country to live in.

Parts 1 through 3 of the inquiry were, in my opinion, well and thoroughly dealt with by Senator Argue. I should like to deal with parts 4 and 5 of the inquiry, being the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation and the advantage of other aspects of the policy. In conservation aspects I include renewable energy, improving the efficiency of crude oil use, and conversion programs.

With reference to other aspects of the policy—and that, in effect, will comprise the second part of my remarks addressed to the Senate today—I will outline some of the impacts of this program on the province of Ontario, the province which I, along with some other honourable senators, represent in this chamber.

Senator Argue outlined—I thought very well and persuasively—the advantages of Canadianization and the need for a reasonable distribution of wealth in Canada. In that way Canadianization was a part of another program, one which I have always conceived to be a fundamental program and policy of the Liberal Party, and particularly of its present leader—the need and wish to distribute the benefits of living in this country as widely as possible among Canadians.

Senator Argue also spoke of the incentives for the industry, which are now greater than before, whether companies in that industry are foreign-owned or Canadian-owned.

I have before me a table which sets out in three columns, respectively headed "Canadian", "Foreign" and "Previous Plan", a breakdown of exploration costs by incentive, tax savings, and net cost. It can be seen that under the previous plan the net cost was 37 cents, whereas under the present plan it is 28 cents for foreign companies and 7 cents for Canadian companies. So, clearly there is an advantage to both Canadian and foreign-owned companies, with a very substantial and deliberate margin in favour of Canadian companies.

I ask the permission of honourable senators to have this table form part of today's record.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows:)

	Canadian	Foreign	Previous Plan
Explorations costs—
Incentive	80 ¢	25 ¢
Tax savings	13 ¢	47 ¢	63 ¢
Net cost	7 ¢	28 ¢	37 ¢

Senator Frith: All regions of Canada, we feel, will benefit from this plan, with the lion's share of the benefit still, and rightly, going to the producing provinces.

I have another table which I ask permission to include in today's record. This table sets out National Energy Program initiatives from 1980 to 1983, and the gross and per capita benefit to each of the provinces in millions of dollars. It supports the statement I just made to the effect that the lion's share goes, as it should, to the producing provinces—Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows:)

NEP initiatives 1980-83—Federal Spending*

	Millions		Per Capita
N.B.	$ 290		$ 400
N.S.	$ 330	$ 954	$ 400
Nfld.	$ 300		$ 550
PEI	$ 34		$ 279*
Alta	$2300		$1130
B.C.	$ 550	$3340	$ 200*
Sask.	$ 490	producing	$ 500
Man.	$ 67*	provinces	—
Ont.	$ 925	$2725	—
Que.	$1800		$ 280
Total	$7086 million

*Research, conservation, industry incentives, etc.

Senator Frith: The total is $7.086 billion. This is federal spending by way of research, conservation, industry incentives, and so on. The table divides that amount as follows: to the Atlantic provinces, $954 million; to the producing provinces, $3.340 billion; and to Ontario and Quebec, $2.725 billion.

Honourable senators, we have had some interesting and, I think, edifying interventions already in this debate on Senator Argue's inquiry, and I thank him for having brought this subject to our attention. I take it we will have the opportunity, in due course, of considering particular pieces of legislation arising out of the National Energy Program, but through this inquiry we have had a chance to take a run at this national energy policy in advance. As a result of this inquiry, we had the intervention by Senator Argue, as well as interventions by Senator Murray and Senator Balfour.

Senator Murray's main point, it seemed to me, was that the government could not achieve its goals without increasing supply and that the supply would have to be increased principally, though not entirely, by pricing mechanisms. That, of course, is where Senator Murray and the Liberal government disagree on this energy policy. In essence, it seems to me that Senator Murray and other critics of the program are saying to the government, "You cannot make it work your way, so stop trying and do it our way,"—essentially, by way of price increases.

That is, if I may say so—and I do not say it in any patronizing, or sarcastic way—

Senator Murray: Or through taxation.

Senator Frith: That is correct. That view of Senator Murray's is, in my opinion, perfectly respectable. It is not nonsense. It is not, to use one of Senator Murray's words, huckstering—that is, his view is not huckstering. It is a responsible point of view. However, it is one with which we on this side disagree. The government is determined to achieve its goals through other methods, and the principal one that I wish to talk about is that of a reduction in demand.

The way by which we hope to achieve that reduction in demand—and I believe we will achieve it—is, first, by the energy conversion program; secondly, by expanded conservation efforts; thirdly, by improving the efficiency of crude oil use; and fourthly, by renewable energy programs.

We wish to combine these various elements to achieve the three main objectives of the National Energy Program, those being security of supply, self-sufficiency, and Canadianization of the industry. Security, opportunity, and fairness are the touchstones of this program.

Keeping in mind the interventions of Senator Murray, Senator Balfour, and others, can we on the government side say, with the same conviction, with the same determination and certainty, that it will be easy? The answer is: No. Is this program an ambitious program? Yes. Senator Murray would say it is overly ambitious. We say it is not. Is it a Canadian program? Yes. Is it a difficult program? Yes.

• (1510)

But, honourable senators, it seems to me that everything we have achieved in this country has been characterized by being uniquely "Canadianly" difficult. The very putting together of the country seemed like madness. If there had been a Senate at that time—that is, before 1867—I suggest that in it, in the House of Commons and in the newspapers there would have been eloquent and strong arguments that it would be madness to try to put this country together, even the part that was being put together in 1867 before the western provinces entered Confederation. Even at that time, any objective observer would have said, "You are really trying to put together and pull together into some homogeneous whole regions that are too heterogeneous. The maritime provinces, Quebec and Ontario are sufficiently different regions that you cannot make one country out of them. Are you really serious in trying to do it also with two languages?" You can imagine the speeches that could have been made against trying to continue with that difficult undertaking.

Would we have built the transcontinental railways if we had looked only for the easy way? The same question can be asked with respect to the trans-Canada pipeline, bilingualism, and so on. When I was a member of the B and B Commission, Canadians, as well as people from other countries, said to us, "You know, this is a noble experiment, but you are really out of your minds. Do you not realize that the easy way to run a country is to have one language, even a small country, let alone a huge country like this?" There is no question that they were right. We on the Commission never tried to persuade anyone that establishing bilingualism, and dealing with majority-minority relations by giving attention to language rights, was the easy way to run a country, and people told us that at our hearings. They said, "Do it the United States way. Have a nice melting pot, have lots of multiculturalism, but one language. You Canadians are crazy. Why do you insist on trying to do difficult things?" We did insist and we succeeded, as we have with all other undertakings of that kind.

I respectfully suggest that as long as we are trying to achieve national objectives it will be difficult, because of the very nature of the country, and it will always require effort to reconcile regional differences with national differences and inter-regional differences. That is why this difficult program is, in my view, a characteristically great Canadian undertaking. As the minister said today, there will have to be adjustments, but the outlines, objectives and ambitions are noble and worthy of the Canadian nation.

I come now to the last two points which are the particular ones that I want to deal with. The first is the elements of the conversion program. Here, too, we must have the kind of national support that is necessary to make this kind of undertaking work.

I want to refer, honourable senators, although I know you have all seen it, to the program itself, and in some cases I will be referring to particular pages in this program because I do not want to read at length from it. Those of you who are interested in the background of, and the technical basis for, the statements that I am making will find them here. As Billy Graham and others would say, "It's in the Book." You might even call it the Gospel according to Saint Marc.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Or Saint Peter.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the elements of the conversion program, I shall deal first with amount. Remember, the context is that this is a part of a National Energy Program, not just a local oil program. The oil part, of course, is of vital importance but it is not the only part. In the elements of the conversion program, which totals $1.62 billion, there are consumer grants of up to $800 to cover 50 per cent of the cost of conversion to gas, electricity or renewable energy sources. That is in the book at page 56.

Senator Flynn: It is not working.

Senator Frith: You don't have anything working right the minute it is launched. A program of this size never works immediately. Take, for example, the building of a railway. We would say, "We have just started construction. You cannot travel to Vancouver today because it is going to take three years to complete." It is a long range program.

Other elements of the conversion program are:

—No federal financial assistance to new oil-heated homes.

—Off-oil conversion of federal buildings.

Those two are at page 57.

—Attractive national gas pricing regime.

—Federal financial assistance for new gas transmission facilities.

—Market-development bonuses to gas distribution companies and extensions to electricity and propane.

—Grants of up to $400 a vehicle for conversion of commercial fleets to propane.

—Conversion of 8,000 federal vehicles to propane within five years.

—Federal assistance to develop and demonstrate other alternatives to gasoline, such as compressed natural gas.

Then come expanded conservation efforts which amount to $1,075 million. So we have conversion and conservation.

—Increased funding for CHIP.

—Restrictions on federal financial assistance to new homes not meeting energy efficiency standards after July 1, 1981.

—Demonstration of super-efficient residential housing.

—Development of energy-efficiency standards for construction in the north.

—An enhanced conservation program in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and the Territories to provide up to $800 grant covering 50 per cent of eligible costs.

—Federal building retrofit.

That is on page 68.

—Expanded industrial conservation.

—Tougher automobile fuel-efficiency standards.

—A municipal energy management program to combine the goals of job creation and energy conservation.

—A small projects fund.

Improving the efficiency of crude oil use—$310 million. This program includes refinery modifications to reduce output of heavy fuel oil, a 75,000 barrel-a-day reduction in heavy fuel oil by agreement with Petrosar, Suncor, Imperial Oil and Ultramar.

—Petro-Canada is studying an 80,000 barrel-a-day heavy fuel oil upgrader in Montreal.

—Saskatchewan heavy crude oil upgrader: price and tax incentives should lead to increased production of heavy crude; joint Canada-Saskatchewan venture to build heavy crude oil upgrader in Saskatchewan (I imagine that is in the Lloydminster field on the border of Alberta and Saskatchewan); and the cost-of-service related to incentive for upgrading.

—Minimizing the expansion of oil-based petrochemicals.

Those, honourable senators, are perhaps the less frequently dealt with aspects of this policy—the conversion program, the expanded conservation efforts and the improvement of efficiency in crude oil use. I understand them to be those aspects of the program that are referred to in part 4 of Senator Argue's inquiry.

● (1520)

The program deals also with renewable energy, which is $75 million. Conversions to renewables are eligible for federal grants, as are solar water heating demonstrations covering 1,000 homes and demonstrations of renewable energy options in a remote northern community.

The reason I am mentioning them seriatim is because none of them, taken individually, is as gigantic as some of the problems that I admit exist with reference to oil, but, taking them together, they are part of this National Energy Program dealing with all forms of energy. Seeking the objectives we have talked about and putting them all together, they constitute these first steps that every long trip has to start with. So, to reiterate, in renewable energy there are the conversions to renewables, solar water heating demonstrations, and the demonstration of renewable energy option in a remote northern commuity. There is also the expansion of fire—that is, forest industries renewable energy—to include organic materials other than wood, to apply to all establishments in all areas, and the removal of the upper limit on grants that exist at the time. There is then the establishment of Enertech Canada, a subsidiary of PetroCan, that is to deal with and support the production of renewable energy equipment.

Honourable senators, I move now to the next branch of my submissions, which is the impact of the energy program on Ontario. The program recently announced by the government, contains material of special interest to each province.

With reference to prices, the National Energy Program's "made in Canada" oil price provides for increases in the wellhead price of conventional oil. We have been discussing that today, so I shall not go into the detail of prices. Under this policy the consuming regions will pay substantially less for oil than they would have under the previously proposed policy linking oil prices to the world oil price. The program will limit the adverse impact on economic growth in those regions and will soften the inflationary impact.

The new federal energy initiatives under the NEP in Ontario, including reserve expenditures, will total $925 million over the next four years. Annual fuel expenditures in 1984 by the typical household in Ontario will be substantially less under the National Energy Program than they would be if international prices prevailed.

I have available figures showing the breakdown of home heating by oil and gas, and also motor gasoline, under such headings as "At International Prices" and "National Energy Program", and indicating the total saving—

Hon. Lowell Murray: International prices are not at issue. We were talking about 75 per cent in one case and 85 per cent in another.

Senator Frith: I understand that; but if you are taking a percentage of something, then that something is an issue. That is the bench mark. I do not suggest—

Senator Murray: Does your chart show 75 per cent of the international price, or does it show 100 per cent?

Senator Frith: It is an easy computation as to whether you make the 75 per cent. I understand quite clearly that the opposition—at least, Senator Murray and Senator Balfour—at no time suggested that the increases in prices should follow slavishly the OPEC prices. That was never suggested, I agree.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: But the difference that exists concerns whether the prices are based on or are related to prices made by a cartel that makes them for different purposes, and whether the prices are simply discounts of those prices or whether they are "made in Canada" prices. That is the difference that exists between the two parties on the issue.

Senator Flynn: The main difference is that between the price of your so-called energy price policy and ours.

Senator Frith: I am sorry, I did not hear the first part.

Senator Flynn: I said that the main point is the difference between the price that we suggested and the price that you are suggesting; that is all. Give us the difference between the two. That is the only relevant factor.

Senator Frith: That is the difference that exists between us—exactly; I appreciate that.

Senator Flynn: Tell us what it is.

Senator Frith: You did not have your price set, and neither did we, but we are trying to negotiate a price that is based on a "made in Canada" price. Therefore the principle, or the difference between us, is the basis upon which it is computed.

Senator Flynn: I do not care about the principle. I want to know what the difference is in cents.

Senator Frith: I cannot tell you what the difference is in cents, and neither can you tell me, because we are not yet dealing with certainties.

Senator Flynn: I know, for instance, that we are paying 28½ cents more per gallon this year than we did last year. Tell us what our price would have been.

Senator Frith: Whatever that is, the difference that exists between the two parties on the question of price is a difference as to computation and as to the price that is eventually negotiated. The figures I am presenting here are the international price, the National Energy Program price, and the saving. I am not raising the matter of the difference that exists between your price, whatever it was, and our price, whatever that might be.

Senator Flynn: The impression you tried to give during the campaign was that it would be much lower. Prove to us that you are right.

Senator Frith: First, I do not know what impression might have been given during the campaign; secondly, I am not at present talking about the campaign; and, thirdly, I am talking about the National Energy Program. The part of the program that I am talking about is its impact on Ontario; and the price issue that I was talking about, including the chart to which I was referring, dealt with international prices and was not about campaigns or about the Conservative or Liberal price. It is the National Energy Program price, and there is a 25 per cent saving as a result of the expanded CHIP, and a 20 per cent saving as a result of improved fuel efficiency. They do not deal with Conservative versus Liberal prices.

When the Leader of the Opposition makes his intervention, as I hope he will, if he wants to talk about campaign matters, he can do so; but I am not talking about them at the moment.

Concerning the conversion from oil, the goal is that through the national conversion program oil will provide no more than 10 per cent of Canada's non-transportation energy needs within a decade. In Ontario, oil accounts for 36 per cent of the energy consumed in residences, 23 per cent consumed in commercial buildings, and 18 per cent consumed by industry.

Under the National Energy Program, grants will be provided for conversion or replacement of oil-fired heating systems to enable homes and businesses to use natural gas, electricity, propane, wood, solar or other regionally appropriate fuels.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing new there.

Senator Frith: The taxable grants of 50 per cent of conversion costs, up to a maximum grant of $800, will be payable for conversions made from October 28, 1980. Some one million homes in Ontario are currently oil heated. The program target is conversion of at least 700,000 homes by 1990.

In recent years the movement away from residential oil heating has been accelerated. Twenty-eight per cent of the new houses in Ontario are electrically heated, and 70 per cent are heated by gas. In 1979 an estimated 2,000 units converted to electric space heating and approximately 23,000 converted to natural gas. An additional 50,000 conversions were projected for 1980.

In the transportation sector grants of $400 per vehicle will be available to commercial fleet operators to assist in the conversion of motor vehicles from gasoline to propane.

Concerning conservation by way of home insulation, $139 million has been provided for about 407,000 Ontario households.

Regarding distribution, under a federal-provincial agreement Ontario will be eligible for funding which the federal government will make available over four years to assist in the financing of expanded distribution systems for natural gas and electricity.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator a question. Regarding home insulation, you said that $139 million has been spent. On how many homes?

Senator Frith: Under the Canadian Home Insulation Program (CHIP), established in 1977, $139 million has been provided for 407,000 Ontario households.

Senator Thompson: Thank you.

Senator Frith: Consideration is also being given to providing financial assistance for propane distribution or storage facilities where that would facilitate the conversion program. Remember that I am dealing particularly with the conversion program as it concerns savings and conservation, as distinct from the aspect of the inquiries that have been particularly raised by other senators on this point. The impact of that program on Ontario is significant and beneficial.

• (1530)

I would now like to respond to more of the points raised in the interventions by Senator Balfour and Senator Murray. In particular, I have been looking at revenue sharing. It seemed to me that when Senator Murray pointed out that the new split in revenue ignored the petroleum compensation charge and the natural gas tax, he was ignoring the fact that provincial revenues will accrue significantly as a result of the national government's concessions on indirect taxation. If I accept, as I do, a substantial difference of opinion between Senator Murray, Senator Balfour and myself on this entire program, I still have some difficulty in understanding why Senator Murray would find an advertising program that attempts to support a position of that kind of huckstering, or, to quote other words that he used, as trying to deceive, hoodwink, mislead or brainwash. He may have felt that he was unable to agree with some of the allegations that were made, and of course he disagrees with the program itself; but I know that he, in his time, has subscribed to and supported national policies that he felt were for the benefit of the country, and has not found himself unable to see the advantage of attempting to explain such a program by means of advertising.

Generally, I found that Senator Murray was uncharacteristically intemperate and hyperbolic in his attacks on this policy, a policy whose goals I am sure both he and Senator Balfour support, and one with so many qualities that I thought would attract particularly Senator Murray's natural enthusiasm for programs that, like this one, are bold, imaginative, comprehensive, challenging and Canadian.

Senator Flynn: You are worse than the Prime Minister and Marc Lalonde.

Senator Frith: As I have said, like so many important Canadian undertakings, this program will be difficult, and it will call on all Canadians to join in a co-operative and supportive national effort.

Senators Murray and Balfour, and other critics, have underlined the difficulties of the program and have warned of its problems. I think we should be grateful for their analysis but, having studied their negative predictions and weighed their caveats, I urge the Senate to add its support to this great Canadian undertaking.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Deputy Leader of the Government a question.

The details of the conservation program are not really very much at issue between us. In fact, most of that program was worked out in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources during the period when my party had the honour to be in government, and it may well be, as I said when I spoke earlier, that the substitution and conservation measures will succeed, as Mr. Lalonde says they will, in reducing demand very considerably.

My question is, however: Reducing it from what? The Deputy Leader of the Government has not addressed himself to the question I raised in my speech as to what the base demand projections are. The government, in the National Energy Program, has reduced the base demand projections by about 200,000 barrels of oil per day from its previous projections. I would like to know why they have reduced those base projections by that amount. If the deputy leader does not have the answer to that question today, I would hope that he, or one of his colleagues, might obtain the rationale and place it before us at a later stage of the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if the details of the conservation program were worked out by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources during the time of the Conservative administration, then I congratulate that department, and if they were accepted by the Conservative administration, I congratulate them also.

With regard to the question of the basis upon which the reduction was made, my understanding is that, as is often the case with regard to such programs, it was necessary to make a prediction. If the question is as to on what exact arithmetical and statistical base that prediction was made, I will have to try to get that information, since I do not have those facts available to me at the present time.

Senator Thompson: I wonder if I could ask the deputy leader a question. He may not have the details at his fingertips.

I was interested to hear him say that 36 per cent of the heating of Ontario residences is done by means of oil. The projected figures the deputy leader gave were to the effect that by 1990, 700,000 of these residences will have converted either to electricity or gas. I am wondering how he arrived at the $800 that would be the maximum for conversion from an oil furnace to one operated by gas. I ask that as a result of my own experience in asking for estimates of the cost of converting a home from oil to gas. I think there will be a number of people that even $800 will not help a great deal.

On another point, I had no idea that CHIP had spent $139 million in Ontario, or that 407,000 homes had had better insulation installed through CHIP. In my experience, there is a certain amount of apprehension on the part of some people with regard to both the materials that are sometimes installed—

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Thompson: —in the process of insulation, and secondly, with regard to the contractors who are going around telling people that they can get a government grant for this.

I would hope, when the government is putting more money into CHIP, that they will at the same time insist on setting up standards that must be adhered to by the contractors who will be carrying out the installation of the materials.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will try to find out how the $800 figure was arrived at. I do know that the last time I checked, which was some time ago, the demands for conversion from oil to gas were ahead of the ability to fulfil them. The gas companies, in many concentrated areas, are having trouble keeping up with the number of requests they are receiving.

With regard to the other part of Senator Thompson's question, I do not think I am asked to do more, really, than pass on to the department, and those who are administering the program, the concerns the honourable senator has expressed, both as to the quality and reliability of the materials being used and as to the grants that would be received.

● (1540)

Senator Murray: If I may be permitted one more question, the Deputy Leader of the Government referred to a table and some information that I placed on the record when I spoke on December 3, in which I included the petroleum compensation charge and the natural gas tax and came up with a new revenue distribution as between the industry, the federal government and the producing provinces—a distribution which shows that in 1983 the federal government would be getting 45 per cent of the revenues, the producing provinces 31 per cent, and the industry 24 per cent. I presume that the Deputy Leader of the Government does not quarrel with that information. The criticism he made of my table was that I had not attempted to calculate the benefits of indirect taxation to the provincial treasuries.

Senator Frith: The concessions.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Can the Deputy Leader of the Government say whether the government has calculated that, and, if so, would he bring in, or have one of his colleagues bring in, the result of those calculations?

Senator Frith: Yes. The answer, briefly, is no and yes.

On motion of Senator Charbonneau, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, the 20th of January, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have no objection because it was expected, obviously. But could the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us whether we will receive any legislation? What will be before the Senate next week? We had a very interesting week with the famous speech that Senator Frith gave yesterday, but I doubt that another speech like it justifies our coming back next week.

Senator Frith: I agree about the justification. However, according to the information we have so far, we cannot expect any legislation from the other place next week. That means we shall pursue the debate on the matters now before us and which, I believe, are important enough to justify our presence here next week—although I must express my regrets regarding my own attendance next week. I am acting as counsel in an appeal before the Ontario Court of Appeal and I shall have to appear before it next week. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition is deeply disappointed to hear that.

Senator Flynn: That is reason enough for us not to be here next week. It seems to me that in the circumstances the deputy leader should amend his motion to say that we will not come back before the 27th.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable senator moving an amendment?

Senator Flynn: No; it is not for me to say whether he must stay away or not.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY

OIL—REDUCTION IN EXPLORATION ACTIVITY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to continue the discussion initiated yesterday between myself and the Honourable Minister of State for Economic Development in connection with the oil industry. Yesterday we had an exchange about the large oil companies followed by an exchange about the smaller Canadian oil companies and the government's policy with respect to them. I now ask my honourable friend if he is acquainted with the latest report of the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors, which reviewed the situation that is facing their industry, and whether he has any statement to make with respect to it.

● (1410)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not have a statement, as such, to make about it. I know there is some apprehension concerning the exploratory and development program later on in 1981, but we have been attempting to obtain some better statistics on, or make an analysis of, the activity that is now going on, and indeed there is some disagreement from people who are directly involved in it as to the number of rigs operating and how long they will be operating.

Senator Roblin: I could perhaps help my honourable friend by reminding him of the allegations, if he wants to put them on that basis, made by the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors, that 43 drilling rigs have been removed to the United States in the last 43 days, and that 174 other rigs simply went out of service in Canada. They give their view that this has already resulted in the loss of almost 10,000 jobs, both directly and on a downstream basis. They also provide their forecast as to what will happen by the end of March, when they say a total of nearly 40,000 jobs will have disappeared from the Canadian economy as a result of the government's activities.

I should like to know if the minister is willing to monitor this situation and bring a report to the house on where we stand at the present time, and if he will also give the forecast that the government would like to present with respect to the future of this industry, so that we may at least have the opinion of the government on which to assess their policies.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, to put this matter in perspective, I should perhaps refer to my notes. I would draw to the attention of the members of this chamber this analysis of active drilling rigs for the period from 1978 to 1980. One of the figures that I have was taken in mid-December, 1980, and is as close as we can get. In mid-December 1978, there were 388 what are described as "active drilling rigs" in Canada; in 1979, on the same date, there were 461; and in 1980 there were 512.

We have to take into account the variation in statistical reporting within the industry, and I wish to do that because some of the figures I am about to give were taken from Oilweek which I believe is a highly respected publication within the industry, and some were provided by the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors.

These figures are for mid-December 1980, when it is estimated that there were 512 active drilling rigs—the same figure that I gave a few moments ago. There were also 46 rigs idle on that date, for a total of 558. According to the drilling contractors there were 462 active rigs and 96 idle rigs, so there is no disagreement on the total number.

As we look at those figures, whether we agree with one or the other, there is no question but that there were more rigs actively operating in mid-December 1980 than at that time the year before and the year before that. So the other conclusion that the honourable senator reached—that there has been some unemployment created, and so on—many have arisen from some anticipation. There is certainly no decrease in the situation from what it was a year ago.

I know, however, that there is some apprehension as to what may happen to exploration budgets later on in the year, after they get through the winter drilling program. Of course, in some of the topography—muskeg areas and so on—those programs can be more effectively carried out in the winter, when the ground is frozen. However, we come back to the same difficulty that we have talked about a number of times in this chamber, and that is that an agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government is obviously highly desirable, so that we can remove the uncertainties, and so that these rigs can be active during the rest of 1981 and even beyond. Until we come to the point of having that agreement, however, there is going to be uncertainty in that business.

• (1415)

Senator Roblin: I would certainly agree with the last statement, that there is a good deal of uncertainty. The problem, as I see it, is that the industry is unanimous in its opinion that government policy is not producing the results that are hoped for. The large companies are saying that, the Canadian companies are saying that, and the oil well industry is saying that.

I have some figures here from the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors, and although they do not quite agree with what the minister has said, and there is no point in trying to reconcile them here, I am saying to the minister that three important segments of the oil industry are looking to the federal government for action. They are looking for adjustment and change in the policy. Is my honourable friend prepared to give any undertaking that such adjustment and change will take place?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is not a question of giving any new undertaking that there will be some adjustment. The spokesmen for the government—the Minister of Energy and the Minister of Finance—began, even as far back as the budget, to indicate that what was in the budget and the national energy policy was put there in the absence of an agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government. It was said then, and has been repeated many times, that we are willing to negotiate.

Some modifications have already been effected, as a matter of fact. There was an announcement on December 23, 1980, I believe, respecting some of the tax deductions in connection with drilling activity, and so on. It is, therefore, not a matter of giving a new undertaking that something will be done. We have already indicated that we are ready, willing and anxious to negotiate and come to an agreement, so that the uncertainty can be removed, and so that the total capability of the industry can be applied to self-sufficiency as soon as possible. This is what we want to do.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to pursue the matter any further, because the honourable minister keeps telling me that the government is getting on quite all right, thank you very much, though I think that all the evidence shows that that is not the case.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would like to address a question to the Honourable the Minister of State for the Wheat Board. This concerns the Crowsnest rates. Perhaps my honourable friend can furnish me with a little information.

Speaking recently in Winnipeg, the Minister of Transport referred to the "battle of the giants", to use his phraseology, in the cabinet, with respect to the policy that should be followed with regard to the Crowsnest rates. I think he was referring particularly to the clash between certain elements of the grain industry that had opposing views. I am not going to ask him who the giants are. I am sure he was expecting the question but I shall refrain from asking it.

Senator Phillips: Perhaps the expression "battle of the pygmies" might be more appropriate.

Senator Roblin: Well, I hesitate to endorse that suggestion, because I am such a warm friend of the minister.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I did not hear the suggestion.

Senator Roblin: It is perhaps just as well that you did not hear it. I am not going to repeat it.

Anyway, with regard to the remarks of the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin in Winnipeg, the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, January 14, 1981, reports as follows:

> He said the federal Government has no magic plan to resolve the issue and asked Western farmers to reach a consensus on how to end the dilemma.

I quite agree that the federal government has no magic plan to deal with the Crowsnest rates. What I want to know is, have they any plan at all, and if so, what is it?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I gather from the honourable senator's question that he feels that dealing with the Crow at this time is a matter of great urgency, and that it is something that should be attended to in a matter of weeks or days.

The whole question of policy with regard to the Crow itself has been under discussion for a very long time, and I am not at all sure when another step in that discussion, or that process, will take place. I have not read all the reports on the matter.

With regard to the question of the battle of giants in the cabinet, and eastern interests, and so on, I really do not know what that is all about, but I can tell my honourable friend that if and when there is an announcement to be made with regard to any further procedures in the matter of the Crow rate, it will be given in due course.

Senator Roblin: I thank my friend for that very helpful response. If he wants to know about the battle of the giants why does he not ask his colleague, since he is the one that used the expression and alerted us to the problem. Perhaps my honourable friend can tell us on another occasion what his colleague meant by that remark.

Senator Guay: One of those giants is a good friend of the Honourable Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: I have a giant for a friend, it seems. I am not just sure who he is, or where he is. I will be happy to be told about it later, but what I am getting at is this: It was the Minister of Agriculture who told us that we were going to get a decision on the Crow before the end of this fiscal year, and now my honourable friend seems to indicate that that is no longer the policy of the government. Is it not the policy of the government to give us a decision on the Crow by the end of this fiscal year?

Senator Argue: Well, I did not know that that was the policy in the first place, if it was stated. I do not know that there has been a decision of any kind as to dates or precise policies or anything else about the Crow rate. As far as I am concerned, I am not convinced that things in the mind of my honourable friend with regard to the Crow rate are necessarily correct. I think the transportation system is coming along very well. I think it is adequate to move the grain. There is consideration being given to future expansion of the railways and double tracking in the mountains, but I am not going to try to help my honourable friend in this chamber interpret what Mr. Pepin is alleged to have said by the press.

Senator Roblin: Well, so much for collegiality and cabinet solidarity, when the Minister of State for the Wheat Board cannot tell me what his colleagues mean when they announce government policy with respect to the Crow.

Senator Argue: I do not know that the policies were announced. That is my point.

Senator Roblin: Well, they are on the record, and my honourable friend can look them up. The quotation from the Honourable Eugene Whelan is on the record in this house, and if he disputes what I quoted with respect to the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, he can satisfy himself as to accuracy of that easily enough. Obviously, he has nothing on his mind with respect to the Crow.

Senator Argue: Who hasn't?

Senator Roblin: You. That is the impression I get.

Senator Olson: That is Tory talk.

Senator Roblin: That is Tory talk, is it? Well, I would like to get a little information from the minister as to when we are going to deal with this matter of the Crow, because he leaves me with the impression that he does not regard it as a matter of any urgency and he does not intend to deal with it at the present time. Can he give us any idea of what the policy of the government will be with respect to reaching a decision?

Senator Argue: I can give my honourable friend no indication as to date. I can give my honourable friend no indication as to any refinement of policy. The question of the Crow rate is being considered on a continuing basis, and was so considered by the former administration. One of the first briefing sessions I ever attended showed the almost hundreds of pounds of technical material on the Crow rate that had accumulated over many, many years. The Conservative administration took no great action on the Crow rate, as far as I know.

Senator Roblin: So that excuses us.

Senator Argue: Well, I think there is much to be said in favour of the Crow rate and the obligation of the Canadian nation to provide that rate to the producers. The whole question is still under consideration. I am sure that if and when Mr. Pepin has something material to announce, he will do it within hours.

Senator Perrault: Certainly.

ENERGY

EASTERN CANADA—SECURITY OF SUPPLY

Hon. C. William Doody: I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, while my colleagues are digesting that mound of information on the Crowsnest rates. The energy situation in eastern Canada is a matter of some concern at this point, for various reasons. I know that we have been assured that there will be no energy shortage this winter, but complications have arisen since that assurance. I think of the unusually cold winter in parts of eastern Canada, the difference of opinion, perhaps, on the exodus of oil rigs from Canada, the closedown and mothballing of various new sources of alternative supplies in western Canada and, more recently, perhaps, and just as ominous, the disruption in supply of the Mexican contracts. Could the honourable senator tell us what alternative plans have been made with respect to the security of supply arrangements for eastern Canada? Perhaps he could give us an update on the situation as it now exists.

• (1425)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will be glad to have my officials prepare a detailed answer for such an update. It would be helpful, I think, if we could know what is of concern to my honourable friend, rather than just addressing ourselves to his general concern that there may not be sufficient supplies.

All I can do is repeat the answer I gave some time ago, the validity of which I believe he acknowledged, namely, that we have already given the assurance that there will be adequate supplies for the rest of this winter season. If something has arisen, which he knows about and on which we ought really to focus, I would like to hear what it is.

Senator Doody: I would not want the honourable senator to suppose for one minute that I think his assurances are not completely well founded. I have always had good reason to believe every word the honourable senator has ever uttered; but some people, who are somewhat more cynical than I, feel that changing circumstances may well have changed the security of supply situation with respect to eastern Canada. Perhaps that is not so, but, if the absence of supply from Mexico does not make any difference, maybe we should not be involved in that contract at all. I don't know. I simply ask our more knowledgeable colleague, the Honourable Senator Olson, to bring us up to date when he has the opportunity.

THE ECONOMY

STATUS OF ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Honourable Senator Olson. I will be pleasantly surprised if his answer is immediately forthcoming, because I rather suspect he will take it as notice.

Shortly after the creation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion an advisory body known as the Atlantic Development Council was formed, through the Parliament of Canada, to advise and report to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Its mandate was to report on the programs and policies of the department and on their impact on Atlantic Canada and on economic conditions generally in that part of the country. It was a good, non-partisan organization which represented the various provinces in Atlantic Canada. The council had a good range of representation. In addition to people from the business community, there were three union members on that council, and there was other representation as well.

To the best of my knowledge, that board has not met for quite a long period of time, perhaps a matter of years. Although the dedicated and capable staff is still in St. John's, they are without direction because at the present time there is no president of the council, and as a result they have not had the opportunity to do the work they were set up for; consequently, the board has ceased to function.

In view of the fact that it is a legislated body which does have a function under law, would the minister look into the matter and report on it to the Senate?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice, specifically with respect to that board. I can advise my honourable friend, however, that last week I had meetings with a number of businessmen and some labour union officials, as well as with the Governments of both Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick; and, as soon as the arrangements can be confirmed, I intend to have meetings with the Governments of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia as well.

Perhaps as part of the report I will bring back to the chamber I could include some indication of what came out of those meetings and, indeed, the assessment of the economic situation in that part of Canada.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

THE CONSTITUTION

ONTARIO—BILINGUALISM

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government, because the Standing Orders do not allow me to direct it to the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, although it deals with what I would call the need to recognize the French fact in Canada. So that my English-speaking colleagues may better understand, I shall put it in English.

• (1430)

[English]

Honourable senators, my question arises from a headline in the Montreal Gazette of this morning and an article published in Le Devoir which states that four M.P.s from Quebec have decided to try to meet with the Premier of Ontario in order to see if the premier will live up to a commitment he made last year at the time of the referendum in the province of Quebec. Apparently, at that time and at some other time, he stated that he was prepared to have section 133, as it applies to the rights of French-speaking people in Ontario, recognized.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate use his good offices in discussion with the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate to ascertain whether some of his colleagues—English-speaking colleagues, especially—in this house and from the other place wish to join with these four M.P.s in waiting on Mr. Davis to have him change his mind?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Certainly, the matter will be considered, honourable senator.

Hon. Lowell Murray: By way of a supplementary, would the leader agree that a far more effective course to take would be to get the first ministers back to the negotiating table?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if the opposition party in this chamber believes that it has some influence with Premier William Davis—who, after all, is the Conservative premier of the largest province in Canada—it seems to me that a constructive action would be for them to make their views known directly to the Premier of Ontario. Certainly, the official opposition in this chamber is in a unique position to advance its views on this subject of language rights.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On a point of order, I think it is quite clear where our party stands, and I am quite sure that Mr. Davis knows this.

Senator Perrault: May I urge the Leader of the Opposition to re-emphasize the views of his party on the subject? There seems to be a substantial difference of opinion between two outstanding Conservative premiers, Mr. Hatfield of New Brunswick and Mr. Davis of Ontario, and perhaps the representatives in this chamber of the great Conservative Party can eliminate all doubt in their minds by scheduling a meeting with Mr. Davis.

Senator Flynn: In any event, still on the point of order, it was the government and Mr. Trudeau who agreed not to impose section 133 on Mr. Davis in order to get his support.

Senator Perrault: I take it, then, that the Leader of the Opposition is proposing that language rights be imposed on every province in Canada, which is, again, a position at variance with the representations made by Conservative representatives on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Senator Flynn: I am only pursuing the matter raised by Senator Thériault. The Leader of the Government should not try to stand on both sides of the question. He can speak from both sides of his mouth, but he cannot defend both sides of the same issue.

Senator Perrault: The Conservative Party has been quite successful in speaking on both sides of this question.

Senator Flynn: Wrong again.

[Senator Thériault.]

Senator Perrault: When one looks at the pronouncements made by Mr. Hatfield and Mr. Davis, and at statements made on one side or the other by certain other Conservative premiers in this nation—

Senator Flynn: The federal Conservative Party speaks with one voice.

Senator Perrault: I am on my feet, and the honourable senator should have learned the rules by now. One does not rise, as one would on a Friday night at the fights, in an attempt to engage in combat when another senator is on his feet.

The senator's question was asked in perfectly good faith. He has a point of view which he would like to see advanced in certain political chambers in this country—specifically, in this case, in the office of the Honourable William Davis.

The Leader of the Opposition is a Conservative, and a passionate Conservative at that. Surely, he must feel he has certain rights with respect to Mr. Davis, and communication with Mr. Davis may be of some interest to that premier.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, I think the Leader of the Government is again confused and is seeking to confuse others. The Conservative Party of Ontario speaks for itself; the federal Conservative Party speaks for itself; Mr. Trudeau speaks as the leader of the federal Liberal Party; and Mr. Ryan, the leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec, does not share the views expressed by Mr. Trudeau.

When I speak for the federal Conservative Party I speak only for that party. Mr. Davis can take whatever stance he wants; that is his own business. Mr. Hatfield can do the same; Mr. Ryan can do the same, except that he does not have the courage to come out cleanly against the constitutional package presented by the government.

• (1435)

Senator Perrault: Let the Leader of the Opposition be fair, and let him be frank. The leader of the Liberal Party of the province of Quebec suggested that it would be wrong to impose those language requirements on any Canadian province. The Government of Canada stated that it regretted very much the Province of Ontario reversing its position on this matter, but stated that it was not prepared at this time to impose language requirements on any Canadian province.

Senator Flynn: On Quebec.

Senator Perrault: In the case of the province of New Brunswick, the premier of that province stated emphatically that he wanted this language requirement entrenched.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am learning every day what a point of order is in this chamber, by listening to the Leader of the Opposition. However, I have a supplementary question to put to the Leader of the Government, based on the answers that I expected this house to receive through the Leader of the Opposition.

I was really hoping that the senator from Ontario who sits in this house—who has been a resident of New Brunswick for three years and knows what importance the French-speaking people of New Brunswick and Quebec attach to this question—might use his good offices, as a senator from Ontario, to approach the Premier of Ontario on this matter.

Senator Murray: It is suggested that the Government of Canada get the provincial premiers back to the negotiating table, and I feel that that is a far more effective course than sending four backbenchers to Toronto airport to ambush the Premier of Ontario, or anybody else.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That's a terrible comment.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that truly is a dreadful comment to be made by one of the leading strategists of the Conservative Party of Canada whose mentor is Mr. Joseph Clark, the leader of the Conservative Party.

Senator Flynn: Why do you say that?

Senator Perrault: This mentor certainly would be offended by a statement of that kind. Those four members are not being sent to Toronto by any level of government. They are acting as members of a parliament, in their own right, who have decided to make representations to one of the provincial premiers. For the honourable senator to frame his remarks in that style is really most destructive and not to his credit.

Senator Flynn: They are being sent by the Liberal caucus because it is unhappy with the present situation.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I have a question to put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I wonder if he, Senator Thériault and other supporters interested in bilingualism in Ontario would call on the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice to persuade them to include this in the legislation. After all, it is the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice who are introducing this legislation in this Parliament; it is not the Premier of Ontario.

Senator Perrault: The position of the government is clear: the government will not impose it. May I suggest to the honourable senator that he use his persuasive abilities to encourage Conservative representatives on the special joint committee to be more forthcoming, and, furthermore, that he contact the Premier of Ontario, who is one of his great Conservative allies, to see if he can convince him to live up to the commitment he made a few months ago?

Senator Phillips: I have been using my persuasive powers on the Leader of the Government in the Senate for some time, with very little effect. I do not think I have any persuasive powers left to use on the Premier of Ontario.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I was going to ask a question on another matter, but if Senator Roblin has a supplementary, I will defer to him.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of this house to the nature of the government's policy on this matter, because I think it requires some explanation. We were told by the Minister of Justice yesterday that it was not the policy of the government to impose section 133 on the Province of Ontario. He went on to challenge the committee, by their action, to impose section 133 on the Province of Ontario. He stated that if the committee did so he would support it.

I ask honourable senators what the government's policy is in this respect. That is what the Minister of Justice told us yesterday. He does not want to be regarded as the person committing the act, but apparently he is willing to be regarded as an accessory after the fact. That is the situation that was presented to us in the committee the other day, and you can see the headlines in the newspapers which reflect that. The minister said, "I won't do it"; but he said to the committee, "You should do it, and if you do, I will support it."

• (1440)

Now, what is the government policy in that respect?

Senator Perrault: Well, of course, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition is again engaging in unparliamentary language.

Senator Flynn: Oh!

Senator Perrault: To attack a minister for a statement made in a joint committee without the statement being available to all members of this place in its entirety, and without the minister being here to defend himself, is most unparliamentary. It flies in the face of a ruling which was made on November 13, as follows:

> A question, oral or written must not seek information about proceedings in a committee which has not yet made its report to the House.

We are getting into a statement made by the minister to that committee. You have ascribed to him what I suggest are incorrect motives, and you have construed that statement in a style which is totally contrary to what the minister was attempting to say.

Senator Flynn: How do you know? You haven't got the text in front of you.

Senator Perrault: There is no mystery about the position that the government is taking on this.

Senator Flynn: You do not have the text—

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, would you mind sitting down.

Senator Flynn: Come on; that's enough!

Senator Perrault: Would you sit down.

For the Conservative Party, which has placed itself in a very dishonourable position in this entire issue—

Senator Flynn: You are in no position to speak of anyone else's being dishonourable—

Senator Perrault: —to attempt to place blame for this position on the government—

Senator Flynn: You are misleading the house.

Senator Perrault: —is most unworthy of that great party, and is certainly unparliamentary.

The fact is that this government commended the Government of Ontario months ago for stating that, voluntarily, they would subscribe to the notion that language rights be enshrined in the courts and in these other matters. The Province of Ontario, for policy reasons known to itself, has changed its position, and the government states that it is not going to impose this on the Province of Ontario.

If there were an attempt by the Government of Canada to impose these language requirements on the Province of Ontario, the opposition would be up on their feet screaming about unilateral action by a national government contrary to the interests of provincial governments, and so on.

Here is the opposition, which in recent weeks has interminably been stating that provincial rights are not being taken into account, that there is an attempt by the national government to circumvent the legitimate rights of provincial governments, today asking, "Why doesn't the national government impose this on the Province of Ontario?"

Senator Flynn: Senator Thériault said that. Stop distorting everything.

Senator Perrault: This is what the substance of—Senator Flynn: You are completely out of order. I rise on a point of order.

Senator Perrault: Sit down.

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down.

Senator Flynn: You are making a speech, and this is not the proper time to make it. You are making a speech, and you are entirely out of order.

Senator Perrault: That is not a point of order at all.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order—

Senator Flynn: There is one point of order already before His Honour the Speaker. Once that is disposed of, you can then rise on your point of order.

Senator Thériault: Who said there was a point of order?

Senator Flynn: I rose on a point of order, and I want His Honour the Speaker to decide whether the comments made by the Leader of the Government are proper at this time. If you have a point of order, you can raise it afterwards.

Senator Thériault: I rise on a point of order with respect to a statement you made in your point of order. You got up and said that I stated something which I did not state. That is my point of order.

Senator Flynn: When I rose on my point of order, I criticized only what the Leader of the Government was saying, not what you said.

Senator Thériault: Look at the record.

Senator Flynn: You can look at the record.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would like things to come back to normal. If you want to know, according to my estimates, our rules have been disregarded at least 15 times since this discussion was initiated. In any case, I will not rule on this point of order and I would like us to go on in a more proper manner.

[English]

Senator Roblin: A quiet and humble word in self-defence, honourable senators. My honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, I think on reflection and on reading Hansard, will agree with me—

Senator Perrault: Leader of the Government.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry, the Leader of the Government. I apologize. The wish is father to the thought. That is obvious enough. I think that once he reads in Hansard what I said, he will agree with me that I really did not propose the unilateral imposition of language rights on the Province of Ontario, or on anybody else. I did not propose that, and I think that on looking over Hansard he might agree that that is so.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps I am confused, then. Mr. John Fraser, the member of Parliament from British Columbia, advanced that idea of imposition, then. I could be wrong.

Senator Flynn: Irrelevant again.

Senator Roblin: It is perfectly true that various members had various things to say, but I happen to be speaking for myself.

As to my friend's point that I indulged in dishonourable conduct—I think that was his expression—I am not going to challenge that as being unparliamentary. If my honourable friend wishes to think that, it is no use my trying to disabuse him of that notion. I certainly do not intend to act in a dishonourable manner. However, I would say to my honourable friend that if he will take the trouble to read the committee proceedings tomorrow, I think he will find that my description of what went on there is not inaccurate. While it may be that in the heat of the committee proceedings the minister said things that he perhaps would like to change later on—and he has the right to do so—he did leave that impression with me, and I think if my honourable friend will read the committee proceedings he will find that I am not too far off the mark.

So, in that respect I think I have given the Senate correct information on the matter, and I would not like to be accused of improper conduct in that respect.

Senator Perrault: The point that I think is rather essential here is that it is improper for members of this chamber to discuss deliberations in the other place to which we have not had direct access, and to ascribe motives to a minister when he is not here to defend himself. I suggest that that is unparliamentary.

Senator Flynn: There are no motives.

Senator Perrault: The ruling that we received on November 13, when a question was asked about the limits of discussion on this matter in the Senate—and perhaps I should quote again the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. It was as follows:

> Honourable senators, now that we are blessed with the presence of Senator Hays, the Joint Chairman of what I suppose I can call the Constitution Committee, I wonder if I could ask him to inform the Senate of the main decisions taken at this morning's meeting, and whether they are positive or negative.

This is similar. This is a discussion about what transpired in that joint committee yesterday.

I quote from the Speaker's ruling of November 13:

> Whereupon the Honourable Senator Frith raised a point of order based on citation 357, paragraph (1) subparagraph (hh) of Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, found at page 130, which reads as follows:
>
> > A question, oral or written must not seek information about proceedings in a committee which has not yet made its report to the House.

Senator Flynn: Look at the decision given by the Speaker. Look at it!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, you have conducted yourself like a third-rate carnival barker this afternoon—

Senator Flynn: But in your company, it doesn't show.

Senator Perrault: Would you please maintain your decorum. I urge you to do so.

May I suggest that on page 1216 there are words which should be helpful to all of us on the question of how appropriate it is to discuss the events in a committee—

Senator Phillips: I am sure that the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate will realize that the rules apply to him, too. I am thinking of his reference to the remarks made by the Honourable John Fraser.

GRAIN

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question that is in order in the most classic sense. I am going to ask the Minister of State for the Wheat Board to clarify the government's policy with regard to the payment of compensation to grain farmers for the period during which Canada participated in the embargo on sales to the U.S.S.R.

Senator Bielish asked yesterday whether it is still the government's policy to compensate grain farmers for that period, and the minister said that the matter is "under very active consideration," and he went on to say:

> —and, so far as I am concerned, there is a substantial case to be made for compensation; but I have to say that a final decision has yet to be made.

On January 13, in the other place, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, in making a statement on behalf of the government, said:

> —the government has one outstanding commitment in this regard, and that is with respect to the level of compensation to be paid to producers for losses attributable to the policy of export restraints.

And a little later in the same statement, the Parliamentary Secretary said:

> —let me point out that the government remains committed to compensation and expects to be able to make an announcement very soon.

I got the impression from the minister yesterday that no decision had yet been made on the principle of compensation.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Well, I believe, along with the parliamentary secretary, that that commitment has been made. The whole question of compensation is under active study, and I am not sure when a decision will be made, but my impression is that it will be fairly soon.

● (1450)

Senator Murray: To clarify that, the only decision that remains to be made is the amount of compensation that will be paid, is that correct?

Senator Argue: I would trust that is correct.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator speaks on behalf of the government in this place. He is the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, and while it is nice to know that he trusts that that is the case, I am asking him whether in fact the statement made by the parliamentary secretary is correct, that the government remains committed to compensation and that only the amount remains to be determined.

Senator Argue: I believe that statement is correct.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—LABOUR REPRESENTATIVE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development that has occupied the attention of many of us for quite a number of years.

Is the government contemplating appointing a labour representative to the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, and, if so, how soon will he or she be appointed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will have to take that question as notice.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development. The president of Chrysler Canada has announced that his company will cut its investment by 40 per cent, to $600 million, from the $1 billion agreed to last year with the government. Mr. Closs, the president of Chrysler, mentioned that if the government withdraws its loan guarantee the future of the company's Windsor plant could be affected.

What is the government's position as to maintaining or altering the loan guarantee in light of these developments?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe I answered a question similar to that earlier this week, but I regret to say that it was not a complete answer because the matter was under negotiation, and when I answered that question, of course, the Loan Board had not made a decision with respect to the additional $400 million that Chrysler Corporation was seeking there. I do not have it officially, but I have heard that that has been approved. Obviously, that was part of the whole picture that had to be known before any further negotiations would take place with Canada. I will take the question as notice, but I think that at this point in time it is safe to say that any amendments to the terms and conditions of the first undertaking have not been made as of this date.

Senator Charbonneau: Is the minister telling us, then, that all the concessions that were won from the Chrysler Corporation are now up in the air? In other words, the government will just follow what the United States government is going to do?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to leave that impression. What I said the other day, and what I am now seeking clarification on for my honourable friend and others who have asked questions on this subject, is that circumstances have changed, apparently, so that the Chrysler Corporation in the United States has gone back to the Loan Board asking for an additional $400 million. When that is so, certainly it has to be known whether they are going to proceed with that.

In addition to the statement that my honourable friend read about some assertion by the president of Chrysler in Canada, and so on, if that changes the commitments, then we at least have to look at them, discuss them and negotiate them before we can modify them. What I am saying to him is that that process, whatever the discussion on it, has not reached the stage of any modification as of today, but I will try to get an answer as soon as I can concerning what Chrysler Canada is trying to negotiate respecting terms and conditions.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND—DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on December 17, 1980, concerning the development of hydro-electric power and discussions between Quebec and Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, I can only reiterate my original answer to the senator that the route of a negotiated solution is still the preferred option for the federal government. If the two provinces, namely, Quebec and Newfoundland, cannot find a basis for such negotiation, then some form of federal intervention may be appropriate. Several options are being actively considered but, hopefully, federal intervention will not be necessary.

FINANCE

SMALL BUSINESS—AVAILABILITY OF LOW INTEREST BONDS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on January 13, 1981 by Senator Bosa concerning the availability of low interest bonds.

The honourable senator might want to refer to a lengthy answer tabled Tuesday evening which outlined the government's monetary policy insofar as interest rates are concerned. He will, no doubt, be pleased to learn that the government has decided to extend the provisions of the Small Business Development Bond to March 31, 1981. Interest payments on these bonds are treated as dividends which are non-taxable to the lender. This will offset the impact of high interest rates on small business to a considerable extent.

ENERGY

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—ENERGY CONSERVATION PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on December 17, 1980 by Senator Roblin.

(The answer follows:)

The Auditor General's report recognizes the very effective efforts of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the area of energy conservation and notes that significant progress has been made in the implementation of measures to economize on energy use and that, due to the dedication of EMR's staff, there is growing appreciation of the importance of energy conservation.

The report recommended that EMR provide strong leadership and co-ordination to the Internal Energy Conservation Program. I am informed the department has already taken positive steps in this direction by hiring a program manager at the Director level, and is currently in the process of hiring four additional professional engineers. EMR has also expanded the scope of "Save 10" by committing almost $150 million to projects designed to make crown-owned properties more energy efficient, and to facilitate the use of fuels other than oil in such properties.

Both EMR and the Auditor General agree that the government, including DND, has saved approximately $100 million since the "Save 10" Program began. The only disagreement stems from the fact that the Auditor General has employed a different method of calculating the per cent saving than that used by EMR.

EMR has not attempted to disguise the fact that in its annual reports on the Internal Energy Conservation Program, a large part of the energy savings were realized by the application of conservation efforts by DND in the period 1973-75. It is appropriate that a base year be established that represents a pre-conservation level of consumption—in DND's case, that year was 1973-74, and for other departments, agencies and crown corporations it was 1975-76. Were the year 1975-76 also applied to DND, it would disguise the very effective conservation effort mounted by that department.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—GULF FERRY SERVICE

Question No. 26 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. What are the names of the ships operating the Gulf ferry service to the Province of Newfoundland?

2. What is the classification of the ships as to (a) ownership charter, (b) crew, and (c) cost per day?

3. What is the disposition of the ships owned and operated by CNR?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

1. Marine Atlantica

Marine Nautica

Stena Nordica (summer only)

Frederick Carter

Sir Robert Bond (relief vessel)

2. Operating costs include all costs for crew wages, overheads, fuel, maintenance costs, supplies, charter costs and depreciation.

a) M.V. Marine Atlantica owned by Roylease Limited, Montreal Port of registry Nassau, Bahamas, Bahamian flag.

b) Canadian crew—83 summer—66 winter

c) operating costs $28,600/day

M.V. Marine Nautica

a) owned by Roylease Limited, Montreal Port of registry—Nassau, Bahamas, Bahamian flag.

b) Canadian crew—83 summer—66 winter

c) operating cost $28,600/day.

M.V. Stena Nordica (summer only)

a) owned by Stena Line A/B, Goteborg, Sweden, Swedish flag.

b) Canadian crew—76

c) operating cost $39,600/day.

The Stena Nordica's operating cost is significantly higher due to high charter costs for a summer only charter. This, however, is much cheaper than chartering the ship for the entire year.

M.V. Frederick Carter

a) owned by CN Marine Inc., Moncton, N.B. Port of registry St. John's, Newfoundland Canadian flag.

b) Canadian crew—43

c) operating cost $17,000/day.

M.V. Sir Robert Bond—(relief vessel)

a) owned by CN Marine Inc., Moncton, N.B. Port of registry—Ottawa, Ontario Canadian flag.

b) Canadian crew—46

c) operating cost $19,564/day.

3. No vessels owned by the CNR are operated on the Gulf ferry service to Newfoundland, but vessels owned by C.N. Marine Inc. are deployed as noted in Part 1 of the question, namely, the M.V. Frederick Carter and the M.V. Sir Robert Bond.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 12, 1980, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Smith calling the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (The British Columbia Reference case, (1967)), Supreme Court Reports, 792 and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submitting that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, let us begin, as we did yesterday on another inquiry, by refreshing our memories on the nature of this inquiry. It is an inquiry by which Senator Smith calls the attention of the Senate to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case entitled Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights, commonly referred to as the British Columbia Reference case, reported in (1967) Supreme Court Reports, beginning at page 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), beginning at page 353, and submits—this is the important part—that it does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

This is the second part of an inquiry introduced by Senator Smith on this whole question of the ownership of Nova Scotia's offshore resources.

His inquiry might be referred to as: The case for Nova Scotia's ownership of offshore resources. I suppose that in that sense my intervention could be called: Offshore resources—the case against Nova Scotia and for federal ownership of those resources.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Are you speaking on behalf of the government there?

Senator Frith: No, I am making a case for the government, I hope, and for the federal interest—and if it were a Conservative government, or any other government, it would not matter.

It is not a party question, but a question of federal ownership versus provincial ownership.

I should also say that further research has convinced me that my earlier intervention on this subject was too generous to provincial rights in this matter, and in case of any inconsistency I prefer and stand by the position that I am taking today.

Honourable senators, the essence of the question is the application of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in (1967) S.C.R., 792 (The British Columbia Reference case) to Nova Scotia's claim to ownership of its offshore resources. In that judgment the Supreme Court of Canada found that British Columbia had no rights to the resources off its shores, and that the same belonged to the Crown in right of Canada.

● (1500)

The essence of Senator Smith's position is that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, in the British Columbia Reference case, does not apply to Nova Scotia because of differences in the constitutional history of Nova Scotia and British Columbia. I agree that there are those differences.

The essence of my position is that despite such differences, the legal principles, enunciated and adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada and applied to British Columbia's facts, when applied to Nova Scotia conclusively defeat Nova Scotia's claim to ownership of or jurisdiction over its offshore resources.

To paraphrase the court in another famous case—the trial of the Knave of Hearts in Alice in Wonderland—let us begin at the beginning, which is the British Columbia Reference case. We should know something about that case in order to analyze its application to Nova Scotia's claim.

The first point is that it is a reference. In other words, it concerns answered questions that were put to it pursuant to an order in council. It was not what is called a lis between two parties, but, rather, a reference.

The legal effect of such a reference, because it is advisory in character, is, as I understand it, that the said reference procedure prevents the ensuing opinion from having any conclusive binding results for other provinces. I believe the former Minister of Justice will agree with that. I do not recall that he referred any cases during his administration, but I think it is accepted in principle—

Senator Flynn: I was not there long enough.

Senator Frith: —that a reference would not have a binding effect on other provinces. So the mere fact that the Supreme Court of Canada decided against British Columbia does not automatically settle the rights of any other province.

But that does not mean that the principle and logic of that opinion cannot apply equally well with respect to other provincial claims to offshore resource ownership and jurisdiction. That is exactly what we are trying to determine with regard to Nova Scotia's claim.

The second point is that it dealt with offshore resources. The reason I underline that is because it seems to me that to understand the judgment we must have a picture of the geography that we are talking about; we cannot understand the application of these legal principles if we do not have a picture of the geography concerned. Therefore, let us start far away from the sea and talk about the actual land territories of a province. As I understand it, there is no doubt whatsoever that they belong to the province.

Moving a little more closely to the water, and dealing with what are called the inland waters—the bays, estuaries, and so on—according to my understanding there is no doubt that they belong to the province.

Moving a little further away from the shore, from the low water mark to a distance of 12 miles out—I will explain later why the 12 miles is important—that is known as the territorial waters. Then beyond the 12 miles we move to the continental shelf.

Those are the four basic areas that are of concern with respect to ownership of resources.

Senator Flynn: Is there any difference between the three-mile limit and the 12-mile limit?

Senator Frith: I do not think so, because of the amendment. There could be a distinction in historical terms, but the distance of three miles established by section 3 of chapter T-7, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, was extended to 12 miles by chapter 45 of the 1st Supplement, and I believe that is generally recognized internationally. I shall have a few words to say about that later.

We are talking now not about the resources within the territorial boundaries of the province—they clearly belong to the province—nor about the inland waterways. That is the last time that we shall have to deal with those, because we are concerned with the other two. However, it is important to note the distinction between the territorial waters—that is, 12 miles out from the low-water mark—and the continental shelf.

The next point, as we proceed to deal with the judgment, is to remember that pursuant to an order in council under the authority of section 55 of the Supreme Court Act, the court was asked to answer two questions, which were:

> 1. In respect of the lands, including the mineral and other natural resources, of the sea bed and subsoil seaward from the ordinary low-water mark on the coast of the mainland and the several islands of British Columbia, outside the harbours, bays, estuaries and other similar inland waters,—

Already we have those two distinctions with reference to inland waters:

> —to the outer limits of the territorial sea of Canada, as defined in the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, Statutes of Canada, 1964, Chapter 22—

That was the statute alluded to by the Leader of the Opposition with reference to the three miles and 12 miles. The first part of the question concerned the territorial waters, 12 miles out:

> (a) Are the said lands the property of Canada or British Columbia?

(b) Has Canada or British Columbia the right to explore and exploit the said lands?

(c) Has Canada or British Columbia legislative jurisdiction in relation to the said lands?

They sound like the same thing, but they are not. One is property; the second is the right to explore and exploit, which will be important with reference to the continental shelf; and the third concerns jurisdiction. In other words, to understand that distinction, it is possible to have jurisdiction over lands even though you do not own them. For example, we, the Parliament of Canada, can legislate with reference to certain property in a province even though that property is owned by the Queen in right of the province.

So the first question dealt with the territorial sea and asked about the property—Canada's or British Columbia's; jurisdiction—Canada's or British Columbia's; and the right to explore and exploit.

(2) In respect of the mineral and other natural resources of the sea bed and subsoil beyond that part of the territorial sea of Canada referred to in Question 1, to a depth of 200 metres or, beyond that limit, to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the mineral and other natural resources of the said areas, as between Canada and British Columbia,

(a) Has Canada or British Columbia the right to explore and exploit the said mineral and other natural resources?

(b) Has Canada or British Columbia legislative jurisdiction in relation to the said mineral and other natural resources?

So with regard to the continental shelf, the question concerned the right to explore—Canada or British Columbia?; and legislative jurisdiction—Canada or British Columbia?

Notice that the terms of reference carefully distinguish between ownership and jurisdiction relating to land and resources of the territorial sea and the right to explore and exploit resources of the continental shelf. The continental shelf is defined in the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf. It is the sea bed and subsoil beyond that point to a depth of 200 metres, and so on, just as I have read it. The reference to the 200 metres is, I believe, because at 200 metres the continental shelf drops off and is no longer really a continental shelf; but if one can still explore and exploit those depths even beyond 200 metres, then, under the Geneva Convention, they are in the general area of the continental shelf.

Senator Flynn: Two hundred metres—in depth?

Senator Frith: Yes, that is right. The reason you use the figure of 200 metres is I think because after that it drops down and it is not considered to be the continental shelf; it is considered to be the international seas.

● (1510)

Why, honourable senators, is this distinction between the territorial sea and the continental shelf important? It is important because of the different rights which coastal states have over the two areas in terms of international law. As to the territorial sea, it is generally considered that the coastal state exercises what is called full sovereignty over the area; that is, it has both proprietary and jurisdictional rights over the sea bed, the subsoil and the superjacent waters and air space.

Just by way of a little parenthesis, although full sovereignty is referred to, it is not totally unlimited. There are certain limitations. Innocent passage of other countries' vessels, for example, is a limitation of sovereignty. Generally, however, the expression "full sovereignty" is used, and that refers to sovereignty over the territorial sea area.

With regard to the continental shelf, which is the further part that is defined in the Geneva Convention, the coastal state possesses a more limited sovereignty, sometimes called functional sovereignty. As stated in Article 2(1) of the Convention on the Continental Shelf, the coastal state exercises over the continental shelf sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring it and exploiting its natural resources. Please remember that those were the words in the question with reference to the territorial sea. They are interested in property rights. Do they own it? Do they have jurisdiction over it?

With reference to the continental shelf we are talking about the exploration and exploitation of natural resources. That is why, as I say, because of the limited scope of sovereign rights, rights with regard to the continental shelf are sometimes called "functional sovereignty" as opposed to "full sovereignty". These all sound like pretty fancy distinctions, but they do become important when we look at the application of the law to Nova Scotia's claim.

The next things we have to know about, it seems to me, honourable senators, bearing in mind the background, the geography and the nature of the British Columbia Reference case and the questions it was answering, are the general propositions that are to be gathered from the British Columbia Reference case and the authorities it cites. The judgment gathers them together, to some extent, on the point we are interested in, at any rate, at page 807. This judgment, incidentally, is a joint opinion of the court.

Perhaps I should recall to your minds, honourable senators, just to set the stage for this, that in order to understand boundaries we have to understand what those boundaries were when each province came into Canada. At the time that Nova Scotia came into Canada it was, of course, still subject to the laws of England. I now quote from page 807 of (1967) Supreme Court Reports:

> To express our conclusion up to this point, we adopt the summary in Coulson & Forbes on Waters and Land Drainage, 6th ed., 1952, at p. 12:
> 1. The realm of England where it abuts upon the open sea only extends to the low water mark; all beyond is the high sea.
>
> 2. For the distance of three miles, and in some cases more, international law has conceded an extension of dominion over the seas washing the shores.

That distance, since this case, has been made 12 miles.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: On a point of clarification, is "the realm of England" the same thing as "the sovereignty of England"?

Senator Frith: Yes. We are now talking about the realm of England in the sense not of the sovereignty of England as such, though this is perhaps too fancy a distinction; we are talking about the realm of England in the sense of where the British Crown has sovereignty in whatever right may be in question, whether it be in the right of a province or of Canada; so to that extent the realm is the area over which the Crown has sovereignty.

> 3. This concession—

That is, the concession of international laws.

> —is evidenced by treaty or by long usage.
>
> 4. In no case can the concession extend the realm of England so as to make the conceded portion liable to the common law, or to vest the soil of the bed in the Crown.

This is very important.

> This must be done by the act of the Legislature.

The cornerstone of these conclusions is the passage cited and approved by the Supreme Court in the Keyn case, and I quote from the judgment of Mr. Justice Lush:

> I think that usage and the common consent of nations which constitute international law, have appropriated these waters to the adjacent State to deal with them as the State may deem expedient for its own interests. They are, therefore, in the language of diplomacy and of international law, termed by a convenient metaphor the territorial waters of Great Britain, and the same or equivalent phrases are used in some of our statutes denoting that this belt of sea is under the exclusive dominion of the State. But the dominion is the dominion of Parliament, not the dominion of the common law. That extends no further than the limits of the realm. In the reign of Richard II the realm consisted of the land within the body of the counties. All beyond low-water mark was part of the high seas. At that period the three-mile radius had not been thought of. International law, which, upon this subject at least, has grown up since that period, cannot enlarge the area of our municipal law,—

I should say that the use of the words "municipal law" here is in the context of international law. In international law one speaks of international law and municipal law. When one refers to municipal law one means the local law of a country, and not that of a municipality. That constitutes another use of the word "municipal".

I shall go back to the beginning of that sentence.

> International law, which, upon this subject at least, has grown up since that period, cannot enlarge the area of our municipal law,—

This refers, in this case, to the law of Great Britain.

> —nor could treaties with all the nations of the world have that effect. That can only be done by Act of Parliament.

This will become very important in due course.

[Senator Frith.]

> As no such Act has been passed, it follows that what was out of the realm then is out of the realm now, and what was part of the high seas then is part of the high seas now; and upon the high seas the Admiralty jurisdiction was confined to British ships.

That was the issue in this particular case.

> Therefore, although as between nation and nation, these waters are British territory, as being under the exclusive dominion of Great Britain, in judicial language they are out of the realm, and any exercise of criminal jurisdiction over a foreign ship in these waters must in my judgment be authorized by an Act of Parliament.

Now, I am bound, honourable senators, to make another short digression, because Senator Smith, in his intervention, had to, and did, come up against the Keyn case and if you re-read his intervention you will find that he refers to it as being controversial. He is right, in that it was a split decision; but for our purposes, in my submission, honourable senators, it has now been, if you will, sanctified, or, at least, brought out of the area of controversy, by cases that have since approved it.

First of all, of course, it was approved by the Supreme Court of Canada in the very case we are talking about, but, for the record, the ratio of that case was followed also in England in two cases, namely, Harris vs. Franconia ((1877), 2 C.P.D. 173, 46 L.J.Q.B. 363), and Blackpool Pier Co. vs. Fylde Union, ((1877), 36 L.T. 251, L.J.M.C. 189). The reason the latter case is important is that it was heard by three of the judges who disagreed in the Keyn case and who then proceeded to accept that case as settling the question of the limits of the realm. Therefore, the question of the limits of the realm seems to have been settled by the Keyn case, particularly by the way in which it has been accepted since in the cases I have mentioned, as well as in the British Columbia Reference case and, by way of further reinforcement, by the Australian High Court in a case decided there in 1976.

Those two propositions are implicitly confirmed by the Supreme Court. I want to make sure I am getting the exact quotation, since this appears in two earlier interventions in this chamber by me and Senator Smith. At page 808, the Supreme Court says:

> We are not disputing the proposition that while British Columbia was a Crown Colony the British Crown might have conferred upon the Governor or Legislature of the colony rights to which the British Crown was entitled under international law but the historical record of the colony does not disclose any such action.

It is precisely on that proposition—namely, that the British Crown could have conferred upon the governor or legislature of the colony rights to which the British Crown was entitled—it is on that proposition found in the British Columbia Reference case that Nova Scotia relies in its efforts to prove that at the time it entered Confederation it was the owner of and had jurisdiction as to the resources off its coast. The question to be answered is, quite simply, whether the territorial sea was within the boundary of the province of Nova Scotia at the time of Confederation.

Section 7 of the British North America Act, 1867 says:

> The Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have the same Limits as at the passing of this Act.

Section 117 says:

> The several Provinces shall retain all their respective Public Property not otherwise disposed of in this Act, subject to the Right of Canada to assume any Lands or Public Property required for Fortifications or for the Defence of the Country.

Section 109 provides:

> All Lands, Mines, Minerals, and Royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union, and all Sums then due or payable for such Lands—shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any Trusts—

Therefore, clearly, the rights that Nova Scotia has now are the rights it had when it entered Confederation. Should Nova Scotia be able to substantiate its claim that the boundaries, or limits—to use the word of the British North America Act—of the province extended beyond the low-water mark before 1867, then the preceding constitutional provisions would apply. If no such extension took place, the Crown in right of Canada will be recognized as the owner of the lands and resources of the territorial sea, seaward from the low-water mark, by virtue of the fact that the Crown in right of Canada has succeeded to the British Crown as the sovereign.

The legislative jurisdiction as to these lands, as well as to the resources therein, would also belong to the Crown in right of Canada, either under section 91.1A of the British North America Act or under the residual power in section 91, the relevant sections of which are:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent . . . to make Laws . . . in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces;—

It then exclusively extends to:

> —all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated;—

And it refers to the public debt and property.

Therefore, it would seem, from the summary of the position of the Supreme Court of Canada in the British Columbia Reference case, that it is obvious that the delimitation of Nova Scotia's boundaries in 1867 is of crucial importance in determining its right to offshore resources. That is why the inquiry of Senator Smith refers to historical evidence, and that is why he has had recourse to a number of historical documents that purportedly substantiate these claims. However, in my respectful opinion, an examination of those documents, interesting as they are from an historical point of view, reveals that they do not prove an extension of the boundaries of the province beyond those it had at common law, and to repeat what those at common law were, they were just to the low-water mark.

The first and, it seems to me, fatal objection to Nova Scotia's claim is the non-existence of an act of the British Parliament extending Nova Scotia's boundaries beyond their common law delimitation so as to make the lands beneath the territorial sea part of the public lands of the province. At all material times, the dominion over the territorial sea was that of the British Crown, as a matter of international law. However, as his lordship stated so clearly in the Keyn case, as a matter of municipal—that is, local—law, such lands are outside the realm and are considered a part of the high seas.

Senator Flynn: Did you say from the 12-mile limit, or only at low-water tide?

Senator Frith: At this stage we are simply dealing with any extension of the realm beyond low-water, yes.

Senator Flynn: Low tide?

Senator Frith: Exactly. I repeat the words of the decision in the Keyn case:

> International law, which, upon this subject at least, has grown up since that period, cannot enlarge the area of our municipal law—

That is, national law.

> —nor could treaties with all the nations of the world have that effect. That can only be done by Act of Parliament. As no such Act has been passed, it follows that what was out of the realm then is out of the realm now, and what was part of the high seas then is part of the high seas now;

In the English case, what the court was trying to decide was whether certain admiralty rights existed because the realm had been extended beyond the low-water mark. What the court was finding in that case was that no act had been passed to extend the realm and, since no act had been passed to extend the realm, the realm had not been extended beyond the common law limits. That to me, as I have said, is the most fatal objection to the claim of Nova Scotia, as it was to British Columbia; namely, that no such act was ever passed extending those limits.

Senator Flynn: Do you say that the jurisdiction remains with the United Kingdom?

Senator Frith: No. At the time of Confederation, because of international law, the jurisdiction or the ownership went to the Crown in right of Canada.

Senator Flynn: Not by an act of Parliament?

Senator Frith: No, it was not necessary.

Senator Flynn: You say it is necessary for the province, but not necessary for Canada?

Senator Frith: Yes, because at that stage Canada became the entity which eventually received the extension of those rights by international law.

Senator Flynn: By the will of the former colonies?

Senator Frith: That could be, but it did not extend because of the British North America Act. One must go back to the British North America Act, which said that the limits of the provinces and their mineral rights depended on their boundaries, and their boundaries had not been extended. It seems to me that quotation makes clear the absolute necessity of an act of the British Parliament before we can conclude that boundaries, be it those of Great Britain or those of a colony, had been extended beyond their original delimitation. Nova Scotia, unfortunately for her, has never shown that such an act was ever passed with respect to her boundaries. Given that—and it is proposed that the lack of any such imperial legislation is conclusive—one must find that the boundaries of Nova Scotia in 1867 were set at the low-water mark, and that the territorial sea off the shores of the colony are to be considered as high seas as a matter of local or internal law.

● (1530)

But let us go further, nevertheless, and review the historical evidence offered on behalf of Nova Scotia. This was in the second part of Senator Smith's inquiry. I will refer first, as I believe Senator Smith did, to the Treaty of Utrecht, 1713, when the King of France ceded Nova Scotia to Britain "with its ancient boundaries." Those limits were described in Mémoires des Commissaires du Roi et de ceux de Sa Majesté britannique.

So that the record may be complete, and to facilitate future reference, I would ask permission to have printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate the various documents I am referring to.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps the Senate could be made aware of the number of pages involved.

Senator Frith: Perhaps 25 pages, in total.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The documents referred to by Senator Frith were tabled on Tuesday, January 20, 1981. For explanation, see pp. 1545-6.)

Senator Frith: By the Treaty of Utrecht, then, the matter was disposed of as follows—and it is in French:

[Translation]

> Thus the undersigned representatives of His Majesty the King of Great Britain declare what are the limits requested on behalf of His said Majesty as the true boundaries of the said territories of Nova Scotia, or of Acadia in its entirety, in accordance to its former boundaries, that is to the west on the side of New England—

And the words I wish to underline are as follows:

> —and to the south by the great Atlantic ocean—

[English]

That limit will turn out to be important. That was the limit on the south by the Atlantic Ocean, just as in the case of British Columbia the delimination was by the Pacific Ocean.

The Treaty of Utrecht was confirmed by the Treaty of Paris, 1763. Article IV of the Treaty of Paris guarantees the cession of Nova Scotia to Britain "toute entière, et avec toutes ses Dépendances." The treaty also ceded to Britain: Canada, the island of Cape Breton and all other islands and coasts in the St. Lawrence River and Gulf.

Both the Treaty of Utrecht and the Treaty of Paris regulated the right of French subjects to fish in certain waters off Nova Scotia. The question of rights to fish, the hovering right to which Senator Thompson referred, turns out to be of some importance to the case made by Nova Scotia with reference to the extension of sovereignty or jurisdiction beyond the low-water mark. In the case of the Treaty of Utrecht French subjects were excluded from fishing for a distance of some 30 leagues, about 90 miles, off Sable Island, and were excluded from a similar area extending to the southwest. The Treaty of Paris allowed fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, save to a distance of three leagues, about nine miles, from all the coasts belonging to Great Britain and not within 15 leagues, which is 45 miles, from all the coasts of Cape Breton.

With regard to these treaties and their possible relevance to the delimitation of Nova Scotia's boundaries, the first point is that treaties generally have no direct operation in English law—they have no direct operation. As stated by O'Connell, "... the making of treaties remained a prerogative function, but the exercise of this function had no effect internally, save through the intervention of Parliament." It is a basic principle of our law that treaties do not operate within the boundaries of the country until they have been implemented by legislation.

Let me deal now with the argument respecting the exclusion of French fishermen. Bear in mind that what I am dealing with now is Nova Scotia's claim that by these various acts of sovereignty, as they called them, we extended our boundaries beyond what they had been. Thus, as to the argument that the exclusion of French fishermen from varying areas of the waters surrounding Nova Scotia indicates that Britain exercised jurisdiction over those areas, that argument fails to take into account the international character of these documents. Nothing prevents sovereign states, as between themselves, from derogating from rules of international law. The very fact that express exclusion of French fishermen from the maritime areas defined in the Treaty of Utrecht and the Treaty of Paris was thought necessary leads us to the conclusion that, in the absence of such an expressed declaration, the greater part of these surfaces would be open to French subjects for fishing purposes given their character as high seas.

In the third place, the Mémoires des Commissaires du Roi, to which I referred, expressly provides that the "great Atlantic Ocean" marks the southern boundary of Nova Scotia.

The treaties comprise the first group of documents.

A second group of documents relied on are the various commissions and instructions issued to governors of Nova Scotia from time to time, the argument here being that the Crown gave certain instructions to governors of Nova Scotia to do things beyond the limits of the low-water mark, and by doing so was extending the boundaries of the province. With respect to this group of documents, I think we must underline that a generous interpretation is required in order to read those documents as extending the boundaries of Nova Scotia beyond its limits at common law.

The first such document relied on is a Commission of the King of France to Des Monts, establishing him as Lieutenant-General of Acadia to:

> —there command in peace, rest and tranquility, as well by sea as by land; . . . do generally whatsoever may make for the conquest, peopling, inhabiting and preservation of the said land of La Cadia; and of the coasts, territories, adjoining and of their appurtenances and dependencies—

Then a charter in favour of Sir William Alexander, given in 1621, states that the grant includes:

> —all and singular the lands, continents, and islands situate and lying in America, within the cape or promontory commonly called Cap de Sable, lying near the latitude—and so on, and he describes it and goes on to mention "Sanctmareis Bay, and thence northward," and he describes these areas and refers to the areas which, as such, are beyond the low-water mark.

But then, again, we have:

> —and thence to the cape or promontory of Cap Britton aforesaid, lying near the latitude of forty-five degrees, or thereabout, and from the said promontory of Cap Britton, toward the south and west to the aforesaid Cap Sable, where the circuit began, including and comprehending within the said sea coasts, and their circumferences, from sea to sea, all lands, continents, with rivers, torrents, bays, shores, islands, or seas, lying near, or within six leagues to any part of the same,—

Six leagues would be about 18 miles.

> —and on the southern part of the same, . . . all seas and islands towards the south, within forty leagues—

That is 120 miles.

> —of the said sea coasts of the same, including the great island, commonly called Isle de Sable, or Sablon, lying towards the Carbas,—

You may recall that Senator Smith gave us some arguments that related to and were based on the rights on Sable Island.

There was then the Commission of Governor Phillipps, 1724 to 1725, which instructed him:

> —to levy, Arm, Muster, Command and Employ all Persons whatsoever Residing within our Said Province of Nova Scotia, . . . to Embark them for the Resisting of all Enemys, Pirates and Rebels both at Sea and at Land, and to transport Such forces—and so on.

In 1763, a Commission for Montague Wilmot to be Governor of Nova Scotia stated that:

> Our said Province shall be bounded by the Southern Boundary of Our Province of Quebec as far as the Western extremity of the Bay des Chaleurs; To the Eastward by the said Bay and the Gulph of St. Lawrence, to the Cape or Promontory called Cape Breton in the Island of that Name including that Island, the Island of St. Johns, and all other Islands within Six Leagues of the Coast; To the Southward by the Atlantick Ocean—

Again, remember that in the British Columbia case the limit was the Pacific Ocean which was found to mean only to the low-water mark as far as B.C.'s territorial claim was concerned.

● (1540)

Honourable senators will see that much is made to depend on the word "appurtenances" which appears in many of these documents. That one word, I submit, does not change the fact that as late as 1763 the southward boundary of the province was given as being the Atlantic Ocean.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that these documents fail to prove that the boundaries of Nova Scotia were ever such as to include lands below the waters of the territorial sea. It is true that in a number of these commissions the territory of the province was said to include islands situated within a good distance from the coast. In the case of the commission of Governor Wilmot, the territory of the province is said to include "all other Islands within forty Leagues of the Coast." It seems to me that that language very clearly refers only to the islands themselves as being a part of Nova Scotia and not the submerged lands to a distance of 40 leagues, because in the British Columbia case also there were islands well off the coast that were clearly part of British Columbia's territory but that did not lead to the seas between the coast and those islands or the underwaters being an extension of their realm or boundaries.

Similar grants of islands situated within a certain distance of the coast were also made to individuals and were clearly designed to vest property rights to the islands themselves. I would refer to Annex VII. In all these cases the measured maritime distances only have the purpose of identifying which islands are under consideration.

The third and last group of various legislative enactments of the province relied upon—and this includes the hovering rights referred to by Senator Thompson—are as follows:

In 1761 an act to prevent the spread of contagious distemper provided that every ship coming into the port of Halifax and, "having any person on board infected with any plague, smallpox, malignant fever, or other contagious distemper, shall anchor at least two miles below the town of Halifax towards the sea." That document will also be filed.

In 1770 an act was passed which imposed a fine on any fisherman who "throws into the sea, within three leagues of the shores any heads, bones or other offal of the fish." That is contained in the Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1767 to 1771.

Reference is then often made to a number of so-called "hovering acts" in which jurisdiction is asserted over maritime areas off the coast of the province usually for the prevention of smuggling and the protection of fisheries.

To summarize the contention in favour of the province, Nova Scotia says that it exercised jurisdiction over the territorial sea before it entered Confederation—it did not claim that its boundaries were extended—and that these exercises of jurisdiction, never having been disallowed by the British Crown, must indicate that the boundaries of the province extended to those areas at the time. That would be the case where the British Crown has "... conferred upon the Governor or Legislature of the Colony rights to which the British Crown was entitled under international law." That was the quote from the B.C. case, remembering the quote from the B.C. case where the court said that it was not denying that the Crown could have done it but that it did not. It was stated in the Keyn case that such a conferral would necessitate an Act of the Imperial Parliament and could not be effected unilaterally by Nova Scotia. That the extraterritorial legislation of Nova Scotia was never disallowed in London does not, it seems to me, prove anything inasmuch as the power of disallowance rested with the Crown, not with Parliament.

We must not forget, either, the distinction between property and jurisdiction. The exercise of jurisdiction by Nova Scotia as to her coastal waters is not sufficient to conclude the existence of proprietary rights as to those waters. What Nova Scotia has to prove is that her boundaries—that is, the physical delimitation of the colony—extended beyond the low-water mark. In this respect, remember that in the British Columbia case the Supreme Court expressly found that the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act which extended the Admiralty's jurisdiction in the territorial sea "did not enlarge the realm of England, nor did it purport to deal with the juristical character of British territorial waters and the seabed beneath them."

The same could be said of the Nova Scotia legislation. That legislation is best characterized as extraterritorial.

I think it is well settled that a number of sovereign states, particularly in the nineteenth century, adopted legislation applying beyond their territory. International law recognizes many bases for the exercise of state jurisdiction. Territory is only one of them. What this means is that ownership of the territorial sea is not the only available explanation for the Nova Scotia legislation referred to earlier.

The proper conclusion to draw from the existence of this legislation is that the British Crown did not object to the exercise, by the colony, of extraterritorial jurisdiction for certain purposes such as protection of fisheries, prevention of smuggling, and the control of epidemics.

Again, it is necessary to restate the fundamental objection to Nova Scotia's claim of ownership of the solum, the soil, of the territorial sea in the light of the principles found in the British Columbia reference:

1. Rights in the territorial sea arise as a matter of international law;

2. Such sovereign rights (ownership and jurisdiction) accrue to the British Crown as the sovereign;

3. The territorial sea of the Colony of Nova Scotia also was under British sovereignty;

4. Only the British Parliament could dispose of the rights of the British Crown in respect of the territorial sea off Nova Scotia;

5. This could not have been done by virtue of the King's prerogative as that prerogative only entitled him to legislate within the limits of Nova Scotia as they existed at common law. Remember again that in the Keyn case only Parliament could make that provision.

As another historical footnote that is important to this background, remember that at the time all these things were taking place the big fight in England was as to whether the Queen, the King, or Parliament had the prerogative rights, and that is why these distinctions are still important as they are brought forward and applied here.

This must remain the fundamental flaw of the case in favour of Nova Scotia's ownership of the solum of the territorial sea off her coast. Even if that were not so, we must conclude that on fair interpretation of the various documents referred to previously, it is very difficult to conclude that the boundaries of Nova Scotia in 1867 included the territorial sea. While this evidence may enable us to conclude that the colony was permitted to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction in some instances, it is quite insufficient and another matter to uphold the theory that in 1867 Nova Scotia had any proprietary rights in the territorial sea.

● (1550)

Therefore, honourable senators, the same rationale the Supreme Court adopted in the British Columbia Reference case becomes applicable to Nova Scotia. If the boundaries of the province did not extend beyond the low-water mark as of 1867, then ownership of the bed and subsoil of the territorial sea and of the resources there situated must belong to Canada, and it is Canada that has exclusive jurisdiction in regard to these areas. This is so by virtue of section 91.1A of the British North America Act, 1867, or the residual power in section 91.

> The mineral resources of the lands underlying the territorial sea are of concern to Canada as a whole and go beyond local or provincial concern or interests.

The Supreme Court finds further confirmation of this result in the position of the Crown in right of Canada as successor to the rights formerly recognized, in international law, to the British Crown. This is the point I made in answer to a question raised by the Leader of the Opposition.

If our conclusion that Nova Scotia did not have the ownership of the solum of the territorial sea off its coasts or of the resources there situated in 1867 is correct, it follows that it has no jurisdiction or ownership as to the resources of the continental shelf either. In the words of the Supreme Court:

> As with the territorial sea, so with the continental shelf. There are two reasons why British Columbia lacks the right to explore and exploit and lacks legislative jurisdiction:

You will remember that in respect of the continental shelf, there were just those two questions—jurisdiction and right to exploit. On the territorial sea, it was ownership, jurisdiction and the right to exploit. The Supreme Court went on to state:

> (1) the continental shelf is outside the boundaries of British Columbia, and
> (2) Canada is the sovereign state which will be recognized by international law as having the rights stated in the Convention of 1958, and it is Canada, not the Province of British Columbia, that will have to answer the claims of other members of the international community for breach of the obligations and responsibilities imposed by the Convention.

Even in the event that one concluded Nova Scotia's boundaries did indeed extend to the territorial sea in 1867 before entering Confederation, it should be noted that the position as regards the continental shelf would not be changed. As the Supreme Court pointed out:

> International law in relation to the continental shelf is a recent development... The rights now recognized by international law to explore and exploit the natural resources of the continental shelf do not involve any extension of the territorial sea. The superjacent waters continue to be recognized as high seas.

Thus, rights in the continental shelf cannot be described as rights to which the British Crown was entitled in 1867, and such rights cannot therefore have been conferred "upon the Governor or Legislature of the colony". At the time at which the international community recognized the existence of such rights, Canada was a sovereign state. Therefore, those rights belong to the Crown in right of Canada.

So, to summarize, honourable senators, the boundaries are the boundaries at common law—that is, the low-water mark—unless a jurisdiction and ownership has been conferred, which it could have been but was not, by an act of the British Parliament to extend those beyond the common law limit and, in any event, anything beyond the territorial seas to the continental shelf would not have been conferrable even by Britain because those rights arise by international law.

So, it seems to me that giving to Nova Scotia the best side of all the best possible arguments, it still loses. The rights to the offshore resources of Nova Scotia must, in my opinion, be found, for the same legal reasons, to be the same as those of British Columbia, namely, no rights, because those rights belong to the Crown in right of Canada.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Senator Frith, I am sorry that I missed some of your remarks at the beginning, but I should like to have some explanation with respect to the distinction you make between jurisdiction and ownership. Is this distinction arrived at as a result of a decision of a court, or are you making the distinction yourself? I ask this because I cannot easily understand, if there is jurisdiction, especially on extraterritorial rights, how it is possible that one does not exercise at the same time the right of ownership?

Senator Frith: The example that I gave earlier, and that perhaps is closest to home is that there are parts of the territories of the provinces of Canada, as they exist now, that clearly belong to the provinces, yet, for certain purposes, the federal government has the power and jurisdiction to legislate with reference to those properties. So, the distinction is one found in all cases that deal with this question. It is distinguished, for example, in the very questions that were put to the court. That is the difference. It is possible that you can own property yet I might have jurisdiction to make certain laws with reference to that property and not, thereby, acquire ownership.

In this particular case, the distinction develops as we develop the legal results. In this case, we talked first of the extension of the property—the extension of ownership by extending the boundaries. When Nova Scotia finds that it cannot, in the face of the Keyn case and the British Columbia Reference case, come up with any act of the British Parliament that extended its boundaries—that is, its ownership of the underwater—it then brought forward the jurisdiction that it had to the sea. It never brought forward any documents that said it had jurisdiction to the solum under the sea, but said that it had jurisdiction with reference to smuggling and other things on the top of the sea and, therefore, said, "Since you never disallowed those acts, you allowed us to extend our jurisdiction."

That is the reason for the distinction. In order to have the ownership of offshore resources under the territorial sea, you have to have ownership of the solum. In order to have the right to exploit the natural resources beyond the territorial sea and to the continental shelf, you do not have to own it. In fact, we do not own it. None of the coastal states owns it. They only get the right to exploit from the Geneva Convention. So, they have certain jurisdiction, but that is called, as I mentioned, a limited or functional sovereignty, whereas the sovereignty over the land under the territorial sea is called an absolute sovereignty, although it is subject to some limitations, such as innocent passage.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Frith for his lucid and erudite enunciation of this whole proposition. As a layman, I found it quite fascinating. Because of my own inability, I feel that I did not grasp how he so easily dismissed the description of Nova Scotia which was in the Royal Charter granted by the King of England to Sir William Alexander, who desired to establish New Scotland in the New World. That Charter states:

> —all... islands or seas lying near, or within six leagues to any part of the same, on the western, northern or eastern parts of the coast—

That certainly is not the low tide mark which he referred to as always being the accepted thing with the British. I think Nova Scotia and British Columbia are different historically. What we look at is the rights of Nova Scotia territorially and not jurisdictionally.

It would be interesting to know if the definition by France of its boundaries was the same as Britain's, or if that corresponds with the transfer, because the King of France apparently conveyed the same privileges to the governor that himself had. Apart from that, it seems to me that certainly it went beyond the low-water mark in the description of what was the territory of Nova Scotia in the Charter.

Then, when we look at the Treaty of Utrecht and the Treaty of Paris, we see that Article IV of the Treaty of Paris describes Nova Scotia, and states that in handing it over to Britain, France handed over completely, if I can use that word, the boundaries described as belonging to Nova Scotia in the original document given by the King of France.

It seems to me that Senator Frith keeps the British Columbia Reference case and dismisses it lightly, rather than looking at the original definition of Nova Scotia by the King of France.

• (1600)

Senator Frith: There are several points raised in that question. First, I tried to take care to admit that there are differences in the constitutional history—and that includes all of the background documents—between British Columbia and Nova Scotia. What I did was to take the reasoning in the British Columbia Reference case, accept the differences in facts, and apply it to the Nova Scotia facts, including the facts to which you have referred. Having done that, I found that the principles in the British Columbia Reference case apply equally to all of the facts that we are talking about with reference to Nova Scotia, including the question of the islands.

The position I take on the islands is that there are islands that belong—and no one would quarrel with this—that belong to British Columbia too, but that the description in the treaties and in the commissions with reference to islands, in order to describe the islands, describe the distance between the mainland and the islands. So, I do not quarrel at all with the position that those islands are included in the boundaries of Nova Scotia—that is, that they are part of the territory of Nova Scotia.

Senator Thompson: Right up to Sable Island?

Senator Frith: Exactly. All of the islands that were granted are a part of the land territory of Nova Scotia. If they find any natural resources on an island that is clearly in their territory, they own those resources. The jump that Senator Smith makes is to say that included in the islands is all of the sea bed in between. That is the problem. I take the view that that is not what the Charter did. There are cases in the annex where such islands were given to individuals—

Senator Thompson: I am reading from the Royal Charter. It includes:

> —all . . . islands or seas lying near, or within six leagues to any part of the same—

And then further down, it refers to "all seas and islands." Seas come into this description a great deal as being part of Nova Scotia. But you are dismissing the seas as not being included as part of Nova Scotia.

Senator Frith: Yes, that they are not included—that is, that by including jurisdiction over the seas, they do not include the sea bed.

[Senator Thompson.]

Senator Thompson: I am not talking about jurisdiction; I am talking about a description of Nova Scotia. I quote from the Royal Charter, which appears in Senator Smith's intervention at page 1208 of Hansard of November 12, 1980:

> —all . . . islands or seas lying near, or within six leagues to any part of the same—

And it refers to "seas" at various times in the description of the boundaries of Nova Scotia. I am not talking about jurisdiction.

Senator Frith: Well, I will have to refer to my notes on that point. I did analyze that in my notes. I can either go back and find that analysis now or come back to it at the next sitting.

Senator Thompson: I shall be glad to talk to you later about it.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question of Senator Frith.

I must say I was more than interested in his most learned and persuasive argument. He referred over and over again to international law only recently recognizing the rights of the maritime states. Is "recognizing the rights" of the maritime states the same as "creating the rights"? In other words, did international law recognize rights which had been created and then existed, or did international law then create rights and confer them on these maritime states?

Senator Frith: I think it would depend on what rights we are speaking of. Underwater rights, and rights with regard, particularly, to the continental shelf, were rights that no one had even talked about or thought about. Rights under the sea beyond the territorial limit, or even beyond the common law limit, simply had not arisen because no one thought of there being anything under there worth worrying about. The question of creating rights and recognizing rights is a distinction that I do not think came up in any of the cases. The issue that they were concerned with was international law recognizing rights, and then creating them, also, in the sense that they were created by the Geneva Convention. The Geneva Convention itself, as I recall it, states that the rights contained in Articles I, II, and III are really a codification or a formal recognition of rights that existed before. So, I do not recall the distinction between "recognizing" and "creating" as being of importance in relation to the eventual rights that were found by the court to the natural resources lying under the solum of the sea bed.

Senator Cook: When international law created these new rights and conferred them on the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, why did it not give a share of these newly created rights to land-locked countries as well?

Senator Frith: I cannot answer that.

Senator Cook: I cannot either.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I imagine that Senator Frith will adjourn the debate. If not, I will, because it may be that Senator Smith may want to comment on some aspects of the very able and learned presentation of Senator Frith. But I am afraid he is giving us the strict viewpoint of the federal Department of Justice.

Senator Frith: I take responsibility for it myself. I did not get anything from the Department of Justice.

Senator Flynn: You made it clear that they convinced you—

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Flynn: I want to make it clear that they do not convince me.

In the course of the honourable senator's remarks, he made objections to the case by Nova Scotia, but he certainly did not make the case for the federal government. I do not know how these rights were acquired, and that is a point that I think needs clarification. Perhaps he will do that in further explanation of the questions put to him, especially those put by Senator Thompson.

I am quite sure that my honourable friend will not be able to establish title being with the federal government, except possibly with regard to those rights which were created or acquired subsequently in relation to the three-mile limit, or the 12-mile limit, or the continental shelf. That is a grey area. But beyond that I do not see anything in the honourable senator's presentation which would give any title to the federal government.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would ask Senator Flynn to read Hansard tomorrow, because I did deal with that directly. In my submission, those rights clearly go to the federal government on two grounds, the details of which are covered in my remarks. It may be, of course, that even after reading the detail he may still wish to quarrel with it.

Senator Flynn: As far as British Columbia is concerned, I have no problem, but not with regard to the original provinces or Newfoundland.

Senator Frith: In my submission, any province that came into Canada in the 19th century, and perhaps the one that came into Canada in the 20th century, Newfoundland, could not make a claim to the continental shelf, but would have a different argument with reference to the territorial seas. I think that there, too, they are in trouble, but at least coming into Canada in the 20th century they are in a different position.

● (1610)

I understand the point being raised by the Leader of the Opposition. He says I have taken the position that these rights never went to Nova Scotia, but have not shown how they then went to the federal government. We can get back to this, because I think it is very important and, of course, it is going to be important immediately and in the long range to us because we will be getting legislation on the subject and the work we are doing on it now might help us in discussing it.

In summary, the two reasons are because of section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, and because Canada is, as such, a successor to the rights of the British Crown.

Senator Flynn: The last point is far from proven.

Senator Frith: Let's debate it. That is what we are here for. But, again, see also the judgment in the British Columbia Reference case.

I should make it very clear that while I did a good deal of this research myself, I did have some help. However, the Department of Justice had nothing whatsoever to do with it.

Senator Thompson: That is why it is so good.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 20, at 8 p.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Public Accounts of Canada, Volumes I, II and III, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 55(1) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Quinquennial actuarial report on the state of the Regular Force Death Benefit Account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund as at December 31, 1975, pursuant to section 40 of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, Chapter C-9, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Mississauga Railway Accident Inquiry (Commissioner, The Honourable Mr. Justice Samuel G. M. Grange), dated December 1980.

STATE IMMUNITY BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-19, to provide for State Immunity in Canadian Courts.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, January 22, 1981.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY

INDUSTRIAL RESTRUCTURING AND MANPOWER RETRAINING PROGRAM

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I am particularly interested in the recently announced program which is designed to promote industrial restructuring and manpower retraining, since there is a tremendous provincial involvement in it. Could the minister tell us what discussions were held and in what detail between the Government of Canada and the provinces in terms of the allocation of this amount of $350 million—that is, as to where and how it is to be spent?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, a similar question was asked in the other place, and the minister responsible, the Honourable Herb Gray, replied that there were a number of discussions with, for example, the automotive industry and others prior to that, although he did not deal specifically with the so-called involvement of the provinces. This is not intended to be a cost-shared program. The $350 million that is involved is a 100 per cent commitment by the federal government. I have a copy here of the announcement which, I am sure, I do not need to refer to, because it seems to me the honourable senator also has it in front of him.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am very pleased to hear about the interest the Honourable Herb Gray is showing in the problems of the automotive industry and the fact that he is consulting with the people involved. It is certainly a very touching comment, but it really has very little to do with the unemployment problems and the retraining programs that we in the Atlantic provinces have, particularly in Newfoundland, the part of the country that I represent.

Could the minister specifically tell the Senate what discussions have been had, in terms of retraining programs in the Atlantic provinces, between the Minister of Manpower in Newfoundland, and perhaps Nova Scotia and the other provinces, in terms of the $350 million program?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am a little surprised that my honourable friend has no interest in the unemployment problems in the automotive industry. That, of course, is not an attitude that can be taken by the government of the whole country. I know that the honourable senator has asked more specifically as to what has happened to the Atlantic provinces, but if he will read the document that I think he has in front of him he will note that on page 2 it says that communities will be designated for one year, with a maximum of two six-month extensions. It does not say that they will be in any single region of the country, and therefore they are not either included or excluded.

● (2010)

At the bottom of that same page the honourable senator will see that for industry there is a special program of financial assistance to firms undertaking projects, the purpose of which is to establish, expand or restructure operations in these communities. It is clear from the totality of the program that it is for industrial adjustment, and not for industrial expansion. We have a number of progams designed for that purpose that are already operational. For the workers involved there are increased training allowances where the adjustment is severe, and there is more flexible mobility assistance to be provided, and so on.

I would not want my honourable friend to get the wrong impression, that this program is specifically designed to include or exclude any part of Canada.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister, and I would like to assure him that I do have a definite interest in the automotive industry. In fact, we in Newfoundland are interested in any kind of industry, should the Government of Canada be willing to facilitate us in that regard.

What I would like to say is that I understand that under questioning the ministers responsible for the implementation of this program have indicated four or five communities, including Sept-Îles and Schefferville, because of the layoffs in the Iron Ore Company of Canada. That company is very active in Labrador City as well, and I wonder if this program is going to be extended to communities other than the five named to date. I think of Cape Breton, for instance, where the steel industry is obviously in need of a great deal of help. The people who work there have been disadvantaged for quite a long time. Those who have not been working are even more disadvantaged, of course.

I wonder if the minister could tell the house if this program has been aimed at the four or five communities named, or is this $350 million to be distributed among the disadvantaged communities throughout Canada that have had serious problems for quite a long time, and not merely for the last two months, during which time not only the automotive industry but also the steel industry has been affected.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can only repeat myself and say that the designations have not been completed. In fact, I do not think any of them have been specified in the announcement.

THE ECONOMY

JOB CREATION PROGRAM—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

I read with a great deal of interest that the Minister of State for Economic Development, and his colleague from New Brunswick, the Minister of Fisheries, have met with members of the Government of New Brunswick. I wonder if the minister would care to inform this house as to any specific proposals that may have been advanced by the Government of New Brunswick to enhance job creation in that province.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the brief answer to the question is that that is not what the meeting was designed to do. I have felt for several days, perhaps even two or three weeks, that I should perhaps try to find an opportunity to make a statement, or even a speech, in this chamber—and I think it would be a good speech—about the general thrust of the meetings that I had in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and, indeed, in Saskatchewan yesterday. It is, to put it briefly, an attempt to consult with industry, labour and the provincial economic departments to hear what their priorities are for the regions so that we can deal with the eight constraints that are known to all honourable members with, perhaps, a view to making better use of the funding we already have.

● (2015)

I did not go to any of those three provinces, and I am not going to the other seven, with a bag of promises or goodies, if you like, or even any money; but we think that we have a responsibility to go through the consultative process, and we also believe that we have a responsibility to the Canadian taxpayer to find out whether we can make better and more effective use of the funds already being spent in economic development. That is what it was all about. We did not really discuss specific matters.

My honourable friend will realize that, when it comes down to identifying priorities, some priorities do emerge.

Senator Thériault: When the minister has had time to digest what was suggested to him by the various groups he met with in New Brunswick, especially the members of the provincial government, will he inform the Senate so that those of us who are from New Brunswick will know if the trip was worthwhile?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend does not need to wait to find out whether the trip was worthwhile. I can tell him now that the trip did, indeed, result in a good exchange of views.

Senator Flynn: In New Brunswick.

Senator Olson: Yes, in New Brunswick. And the response from the business community was good.

By the way, they have an institute there with which Senator Thériault must be familiar. It is comprised of people from business, labour and the provincial government. Our attempt to include that group of people in the development of a set of national priorities resulted in an excellent exchange of views, and we found a great deal of common ground with respect to where the thrusts ought to be in the use and application of funds in the ensuing months or even years. There is no question about that.

Frankly, I was rather pleasantly surprised that we could find such a high level of agreement on some of the identification and some of the ways for dealing with those constraints that I have already indicated in one or two speeches that I know are well known to my honourable friends. I suggest that they read them again—perhaps several times—because, as I go across the country, I find more and more support for that position. There is a great political will, I think, for the government's emphasis on economic development to be, indeed, focused on what is contained in that thrust.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the minister for his answer, but I must tell him that I am rather surprised that he was surprised at the lucidity of the people of New Brunswick.

ENERGY

NEW BRUNSWICK—HOME HEATING—CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development which I asked two or three times in the fall. I assume it was not part of the discussions he had, but can he inform the Senate whether in fact the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, or the Government of Canada, is any closer to agreeing with the Government of New Brunswick that the people in New Brunswick converting from oil to electricity should be entitled to the so-called $800 conversion grant?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and refer it to the minister directly responsible. That particular matter was not mentioned in the discussions I had with the New Brunswick government.

● (2020)

THE ECONOMY

JOB CREATION PROGRAM—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to Senator Thériault's question. This is really a point of clarification, because I must have misunderstood what the minister said in his answer. He gave me the impression that he had visited Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan, and that he had discussed matters of economic import with those provinces, and so forth, but that he had no intention of going to the other seven provinces with his bag of goodies. I am wondering what the criteria are, and why some provinces are included in these discussions while others are excluded.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, that is one of the problems of communication and the level of comprehension between members of this side of the house and members of the other side of the house. I thought I said exactly the opposite. I said that I intended to go to the other seven provinces, but that I did not carry a bag of money, if that is the expression you like to use—

Senator Flynn: A bag of goodies.

Senator Olson: —to the three I have already been to, nor would I to the seven I am going to visit.

We are looking for an agreement on the use and application of funds now being provided for economic promotion and development. To repeat, I was rather pleasantly surprised at the level of agreement as to where and how we should attack, if that is the right word, the constraints that we see in the system. The exchanges that I had with the representatives from New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan were extremely useful in that regard.

Senator Doody: A further supplementary, if I may. I think that the minister must be quite pleased with me for giving him an opportunity to straighten that out in the record. It sounded quite different to me, but I am pleased to hear that he will be going to the other provinces as well to discuss the economic strategy of the government. I can assure the minister that many of the provinces—indeed, all of us—would be interested to learn the economic strategy of the government, particularly as it relates to the less developed provinces.

Would the minister, in the same tenor, tell us what the criteria would be in terms of the economic strategy so that one could qualify to benefit from the $350 million retraining and restructuring program which was announced earlier? I know that five or six communities are now eligible, but I wonder what the criteria would be and how others might have themselves included in this program.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that policy and the framework or the criteria against which we would adjust a very large part of the rest of our spending capability were not discussed in the same context.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Does the minister intend to meet with his counterpart in the Province of Quebec, namely Mr. Landry? If so, will the meeting be held soon? Will he be accompanied by a minister who is fluent in both official languages, for I believe it might be rather difficult to communicate with Mr. Landry?

[English]

Senator Olson: The answer, honourable senators, is yes. I think it is on Thursday of this week that I will have a meeting with Mr. Landry in Montreal. There will be at least one. Perhaps the Honourable Mr. Ouellet will be with me. There may be more. On these visits, there has been a minister from the region with me.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: If past experience is any indication, I think that a meeting between Mr. Ouellet and Mr. Landry will make it rather difficult to hold interesting exchanges. So if you feel that Mr. Landry might not accept Mr. Ouellet, is there another minister who could replace him?

[English]

Senator Olson: I do not get involved in these discussions, but I can assure my honourable friend that simultaneous interpretation will be available. Not only that; there are some people who speak French in such a manner that I can understand almost all of it, but I do have a little difficulty replying. However, I really do not think we need anticipate any difficulties. As far as my position is concerned, the colleagues I have with me from the federal government are not subject to acceptance or rejection by anyone else.

ENERGY

OIL—POTENTIAL SHORTAGE IN EASTERN CANADA

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. An article appearing in the Globe and Mail of January 17, 1981, states in part:

> This winter a potential shortage of oil in Eastern Canada is being covered by the oil companies, in particular through Exxon's international pool. The potential shortage is mostly the result . . . of Mexico's failure to supply the 50,000 barrels of crude a day contracted by Petro-Canada.

● (2025)

My question is: Is the minister able to indicate to the Senate the government's assessment of how long certain Canadian oil refiners will have to rely upon the much-maligned international pools operated by the multinationals for an assured supply, and, in particular, how long it will be before Petro-Canada will be able to guarantee the supply which it should theoretically provide under the much vaunted deal with Mexico?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have answered a question similar to that several times before, and it seems to me that what is being asked for now is some kind of update on the situation. I do not think that the general answer, for example, that we are going to experience a severe shortgage of oil supplies in this country, will apply, because of contingent arrangements that have been made. I suppose my honourable friend has alluded to one of them, but that is not the only one. There are, of course, some quantities of oil available, in case of shortages, for peak requirements and that sort of thing. I can take the rest of the question, as it relates specifically to Petro-Canada and Mexico, and refer it to my colleague, the minister responsible, for an update on his assessment of the situation now.

Senator Donahoe: A supplementary question. I recall several of my colleagues directing a series of questions to the honourable minister with respect to the quality of the Mexican crude and the ability of the Canadian refineries to handle that quality. I also find in the article I quoted earlier a statement which reads:

> January shipments are at 20,000 barrels a day, down from 25,000 a day in December. The crude's low quality has caused problems in the refining process, say the refiners, although they are required to use it by the federal government.

Can the minister tell us if the federal government has taken that quality of oil into account in making the arrangements for that supply, which does not seem to be being delivered?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will refer the specific question to the minister responsible and ask him what the situation is respecting that. I will say, though, that my honourable friend keeps raising this matter of the quality of the Mexican oil as if it were some kind of surprise. I am not sure that it is.

Senator Donahoe: It has something to do with what it is worth.

THE ECONOMY

JOB CREATION PROGRAM—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS

Hon. Charles McElman: As a supplementary to Senator Thériault's initial question and the reply given by the minister, the minister spoke of what I believe is a business-industry-labour committee in New Brunswick and its high calibre. Has he measured its calibre by its recommendation that the present Senate should be replaced by an elected Senate, with two elected members from each province in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I can frankly and honestly say that we did not discuss that subject at all.

Senator McElman: I would ask, then, that the minister reconsider his view of the high calibre of that committee.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INAUGURATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government inform this chamber whether any cabinet minister has been sent to Washington to represent Canada officially at the inauguration of the new President of the United States?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no information on that matter. However, an inquiry will go forward.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, now that the American hostages have been released by the Government of Iran, would the Leader of the Government tell us whether the Canadian government will revoke diplomatic and trade sanctions imposed upon Iran before that government settles its debts with the Export Credit Corporation, and other Canadian crown corporations and private business?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a statement on the subject of Iran.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Muir: You just happen to have your music.

Senator Perrault: I am sure that Canadians of all political persuasions are delighted that for the hostages and their families, the long ordeal of captivity and separation is over. We are all enthusiastic about the events that have taken place. A statement has been issued by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the subject.

When it was announced that there would be a Canadian export embargo against Iran and the introduction into Parliament of sanctions legislation last May, the minister said that Canada would lift sanctions as soon as the hostages were released. Now that the hostages have actually been released, the government will review the sanctions against Iran at the earliest opportunity so that we can normalize relations with that country promptly. This will entail proclamation by the Governor in Council declaring that the Iran Economic Sanctions Act ceases to be in force, and action to lift the export embargo and other measures now in effect against Iran. Lifting measures imposed since the hostage-taking would not, however, mean that Canada would be ready to send arms or defence support equipment to Iran.

Senator Flynn: I would think not.

Senator Perrault: Our present policy on arms sales would exclude Iran, as a country involved in continuing hostilities, from receiving such equipment.

We will also be examining, in the near future, the question of sending Canadian staff back to our embassy in Tehran. In March of last year the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that we would reactivate our embassy once the hostages were released, assuming conditions in Iran were favourable. We do not expect the role Canada played in helping six Americans to leave Iran last January will prevent us from reactivating the embassy or otherwise re-establishing normal relations with Iran.

The other part of the honourable senator's question will be taken as notice.

CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA FORECAST

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Recently the Conference Board of Canada issued its revised predictions for 1981, indicating a stark worsening in its previous estimates of some three or four months ago. For example, it cut its forecast of economic growth by almost one half.

Would the minister undertake to bring to the Senate the latest calculations or estimates of either his department or the Department of Finance to either confirm or deny the Conference Board's predictions, including its prediction that inflation in 1981 will be 11.7 per cent—the highest annual rate in over 30 years.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators, I will undertake to bring that information to this chamber.

I may be saying more than I ought at this time, but some of those predictions have not turned out as well as some of the predictions made by the various government departments, including the Department of Finance.

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)

DAILY ISSUE—CONTENTS PAGE—DELAYED ANSWERS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege relating to the manner in which delayed answers are reported in Hansard. Up until last week, whenever a delayed answer was reported to the Senate by a minister, it would appear in the contents page under the subject matter, but there would be no indication of which senator asked the question.

There has been a slight improvement in that system but I feel that further improvement could be made by indexing the delayed answer in the same manner as all other oral answers, but with the addition of the word "delayed" in brackets so that the senator who put the question will be able to identify it in the event he is not in the chamber when the delayed answer is given.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on this subject.

• (2035)

I think it should be clear that when I ask that the Senate agree to the printing of an answer instead of having it read, that answer is to be taken as though it had been read. That is my understanding. Otherwise, I would have to stand here and read them all out. I have no criticism of the way they are structured, but if they are not structured in the printing of Hansard in that way, then that is somewhat different from what I expected would be the case. Such answers should be taken as though they had been read.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, my intervention was not meant as a criticism but as a constructive suggestion. If you look at the contents page of Hansard for January 13, you will see under the heading "Finance" the words "Interest rates. Senator Olson." That refers to a question that I had asked on a prior date and had I not been present in the Senate on January 13, I would not have been aware that Senator Olson had, in effect, answered it.

REVISION OF BUDGET ASSUMPTIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to the question asked a few minutes ago by our colleague, Senator Nurgitz.

Can the Minister of State for Economic Development say whether the government has revised the assumptions contained in the budget of the Minister of Finance with regard to the likely rate of inflation, economic growth, unemployment, and the budgetary deficit, among other things, and if so, could we be informed of the revised figures as soon as possible.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot answer as to whether or not that revision has been done. It is clear, of course, that there are some matters, both positive and negative, depending on your point of view, that have taken place since the budget was brought down on October 28. I am sure that such revision is going on. I am not sure when the Minister of Finance intends to make a further statement on the changes that have taken place.

Certainly, some of the energy projects have not gone forward quite as was predicted at that time. On the other side of the coin, there has been a rather significant increase in agricultural prices, and the volumes that are being realized are somewhat better. So, there are revisions on both sides of the coin.

I am trying to be helpful, but I cannot give my honourable friend a date. I am sure there are some fairly significant changes that are being dealt with.

Senator Murray: Before too long we will be dealing, I presume, with some of the legislation flowing from the budget, and I simply make the point that it would be helpful were we to have that information before addressing ourselves to the legislation.

The minister mentioned some of the assumptions in the budget concerning energy. My supplementary question concerns the extent of the government's information on the investment plans of the energy industry. For example, can the minister say whether, in fact, Gulf Canada has dropped about $200 million from its exploration and development programs for this year; whether it is a fact that Norcen Energy has cut $40 million from its budget, and that a leading Canadian independent, Canadian Hunter Exploration, which is controlled by Noranda, has switched all of its discretionary spending for next year, amounting to some $90 million, from Canada to the United States?

My question is whether the government can confirm that information and whether, in view of that and similar information that is being published on an almost daily basis, the minister will agree that the government's energy policy is a complete disaster area?

Senator Olson: No, I would not agree that it is a disaster area.

Senator Flynn: Surprise.

Senator Olson: There are some adjustments that, as we have already indicated, we are willing to consider and, indeed, to make with respect to such things as some of the rules. There was an announcement made, for example, respecting certain tax exemptions on September 23, and there is a proposal out respecting the COR, the Canadian Ownership Requirements.

The reason for putting that out as a proposal is to get some feedback from the industry. Had we not intended to make any amendments, I suppose we would have put it out as a hard set of regulations and not as a proposal. I might say that we are getting a lot of co-operation from the industry in the way of expert advice.

• (2040)

The honourable senator has asked another series of questions that disturb me a little in giving a positive reply, because what he is really identifying is a reduction from intentions, not a reduction from what happened last year or what might have been the pattern.

If he wants us to answer the questions on that basis, so that we get the level of reduced intentions from where they were perceived to be, down to the lower level of intention, I suppose he would also agree that as they understand the energy program, and as they increase their intentions, we can then demonstrate an equally significant increase in the intentions.

Therefore, the senator is talking about something that is really not fixed. When he asks us to do an analysis of that, it seems to me that he is asking for something like—I can think of a couple of similes respecting that. If he could present his questions with a little more precision, so that we can identify some targets, not simply intentions, it would be somewhat more helpful, because some of those intentions have started up again.

Senator Murray: One must take it for granted that the Minister of Finance, in making certain assumptions about the levels of energy investment, and so on, was dealing with intentions—intentions that have diminished considerably over the past two months or more since the budget and energy policy were announced.

ENERGY

SUPPLY AND DEMAND PROJECTIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray: With the indulgence of the Senate, I should like to put another question to the minister concerning energy policy. The minister will be aware that the National Energy Board has embarked, as we noted in a recent debate in this chamber, on studies of supply and demand projections in oil across the country. In view of the controversy surrounding the projections that are contained in Mr. Lalonde's paper, I wonder whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, or his officials, might agree to appear before the National Energy Board to justify and explain the basis of the projections contained in that white paper; and, if not, whether the Minister of State for Economic Development would soon intervene in one of the two debates that are on our order paper concerning energy, to outline the basis of those supply and demand projections?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there are two separate requests in that question. I can convey to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the request respecting his appearance before the National Energy Board. I am not sure whether or not that will be precedent-setting because, after all, the Natrional Energy Board does report to the minister and it is their business to hold hearings, to hear the views of the people directly involved in the industry, and so on. Whether or not the minister, or his department, should get involved in making an input into those hearings, I am not sure. I would have to check that. I am not saying that it is unprecedented, but it seems that there is the possibility of a problem there.

As to the second part of the question, yes, I will be glad to make an intervention in the debate as soon as possible.

Senator Murray: I did not mean when someone else is speaking. What I had in mind was that the minister would make a speech of his own.

Senator Olson: I would like to do that, but I would not like it to be a repetition of the last speech I made here on the Constitution. When one read through it one could not tell who was the speaker because the Leader of the Opposition had more lines than I had in my speech.

Senator Flynn: That is what made it interesting.

Senator Olson: I would hope that the honourable gentlemen opposite might extend the courtesy of allowing me to make a speech in this house, because I like doing it once in a while; but I would like to construct it along my own lines of thought. Sometimes it is very tempting to follow the lines that are interposed by the Leader of the Opposition and the honourable senator, because they bring up such weak arguments that one gets off onto those sidelines. However, I will seriously consider that, and soon.

Senator Flynn: I promise to be quiet.

Senator Murray: Me too.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and concerns the Garrison Diversion in Manitoba. I should again like to bring to his attention—and it has been done before by other honourable senators—our concern and that of the provincial government and the public in general about the Garrison Diversion.

Last week an American governor again requested his government to grant sufficient money to complete the Garrison Diversion project to irrigate the area. If that is done, it will affect the Red River and lakes in Manitoba, and also our fisheries.

In view of this additional request by that American governor I again ask the Leader of the Government to request the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make appropriate representations on our behalf to ensure that the diversion is stopped and no harm is done to any area of the province of Manitoba. If that project is proceeded with it will affect not only the Red River and our lakes, but also the whole of the southwestern part of the province.

In view of the general concern, I would like the Leader of the Government to take the question as notice if necessary, and ensure that we deal with the request to the American government as quickly as possible to avoid such action.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his continuing interest in this important subject. His views will be conveyed to the appropriate source.

The U.S. Department of State has requested that a process of bilateral consultations regarding the Garrison Diversion be initiated in March.

As a prelude to these consultations, they have invited Canadian scientific and technical experts to visit their Water and Power Resources Service Engineering and Research Centre in Colorado to review possible project design modifications. This visit is tentatively scheduled for tomorrow and the following two days—that is, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.

We are confident that this technical review will provide us with a basis on which to proceed to the consultation process, keeping in mind Canada's firm position that any inter-basin transfer of water is unacceptable.

That information is provided for honourable senators.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, earlier this evening I took as notice a question with respect to Iran and the Export Development Corporation. To establish a new record for prompt replies, I now have an answer.

In response to the question raised, I have been informed that the Export Development Corporation, EDC, has been receiving payment on amounts falling due in respect of long-term loans made to Iran, except for payments relating to a principal amount of approximately $2.1 million Canadian which is owed on a loan where there is a dispute as to amounts due under the commercial contract. I am advised that the arrears are a small proportion of the total payments due and made.

An additional amount of approximately $6.9 million Canadian is owed to EDC on an insurance claim paid to the Canadian exporter from the same contract. EDC is in communication by telex with the relevant Iranian authorities to obtain payment on both the overdue and the claim amounts.

I understand that EDC would take a cautious approach to considering providing new loans to Iran until these overdues have been settled and commercial relations with Iran have been normalized.

More generally, EDC's problems of arrears and claims have come about quite apart from the hostage-taking and are not directly linked to the resumption of commercial relations with Iran. However, we will want to take all outstanding questions into account as we move to remove economic sanctions.

THE CONSTITUTION

ONTARIO—BILINGUALISM

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I do not want to re-raise the storm that blew over this place last Thursday when I asked a certain question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but at that time I was convinced that the Leader of the Opposition had quoted me wrongly, and I asked him to look at the record.

Honourable senators, with your permission I would like to read the last paragraph of a statement made by the Leader of the Government, and I quote:

> Here is the opposition, which in recent weeks has interminably been stating that provincial rights are not being taken into account, that there is an attempt by the national government to circumvent the legitimate rights of provincial governments, today asking, 'Why doesn't the national government impose this on the Province of Ontario?

Then the Leader of the Opposition, as reported at page 1524 of Hansard, intervened with the remark:

> Senator Thériault said that. Stop distorting everything.

Honourable senators, my point is that I never made such a statement, and when I am prepared to make a statement on whether I feel the Government of Canada should impose the provisions of section 133 on the Province of Ontario, I will make my position clear at the proper time.

At that time I was simply asking my leader to intercede with the Leader of the Opposition to see if some of his English-speaking colleagues—including one who has resided in New Brunswick for three years and knows the situation very well—would join with four members of Parliament from Quebec who were meeting with the Premier of Ontario to see if he would change his mind and ask the Government of Canada to have section 133 imposed in the amendments to the Constitution. I want to make this point clear, that the interjection by the Leader of the Opposition was as a result of a misunderstanding of what I had said.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): So what?

ENERGY

OIL SHORTAGES—PRECAUTIONARY MEASURES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on November 12, 1980, by Senator Donahoe concerning oil shortages.

If Alberta proceeds with its intention to reduce supplies to eastern Canada, supplies would be decreased by 60,000 barrels a day commencing March 1 of this year. A further reduction of 60,000 barrels a day would follow commencing June 1 with a further 60,000 barrels commencing September 1.

Should this unfortunate situation occur, there is, at present, crude oil available in the international market. The price at which international oil would be bought to replace the Alberta cutbacks is not known at this time. Naturally, price would depend on the pricing conditions at the time of the purchases.

CANADA OIL AND GAS LEGISLATION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on December 10, 1980, by Senator Doody concerning the Canada Oil and Gas Act.

(The answer follows:)

> I am informed by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that the contents of this bill were not discussed in detail with the provinces before it was introduced in the House of Commons. Honourable senators will understand that the integrity of the parliamentary process would have prohibited this action.
>
> The provinces and industry, however, have understood for some time that the existing legislation governing oil and gas activity on Canada lands was outdated. The new Canada Oil and Gas Act has been in development during the past several years. Indeed, certain aspects of this proposed legislation have been discussed at length with industry and the provinces.
>
> The act has, of course, evolved over time with the most recent changes being set out in the National Energy Program. Although details of the proposed legislation would not have been discussed with interested parties prior to introduction of the bill in the house, in accordance with legislative procedure, they will now have an opportunity to make known their views on specific provisions during the standing committee stage of consideration.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on Thursday last, during the debate on Senator Smith's inquiry respecting some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores, Senator Frith requested, and was granted, permission to have certain documents appended to that day's Debates. It has since been found that reproduction of those documents in legible form is, to say the least, most difficult.

With Senator Frith's agreement, and on his behalf, I ask leave to table these documents so that they will be available for examination by any senator who wishes to see them.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Then, honourable senators, I table:

Copies of Mémoires des Commissaires du Roi et de ceux de Sa Majesté britannique and other historical documents relating to the boundaries of Nova Scotia.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, January 14, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Argue calling the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular:

1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;

2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;

3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;

4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and

5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I wish to take part this evening in the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue calling the attention of the Senate to the energy policy of Prime Minister Trudeau. You will notice that I did not call it "constructive" because, on scrutiny, one soon realizes that its provisions will lead the country down the economic road to havoc.

Not only does that policy deal with the matter of constitutional jurisdiction over resources—upon whose damages I shall leave it to some of my colleagues to comment—it also deals with the role of the government in the Canadian economy and that of foreign investments in Canada. That the government, like its predecessor I might point out, should want to ensure the security of our supplies and reduce our dependence on foreign sources, or that it should want to encourage a greater Canadian ownership in the field of energy, everyone will agree. But the government approach to achieve those goals run counter to all those which until now have enabled Canada to become the great country that it is.

It is true that the field of energy is at once a wonderful opportunity and a great challenge to Canada. In times like these, when unemployment runs rampant, the balance of payment worsens, and our dollar weakens to the point of at times dropping below 83 cents in terms of the American dollar—and that, despite the vigorous help of the Bank of Canada—the country should turn with hope to the development of its natural resources which, fortunately, it has in abundance. It would be normal to make every effort to benefit from our competitive position in the field of energy. It would be normal as well to avoid any endeavour which might jeopardize the development of our oil wells, put off the creation of jobs in Canada, undermine our dollar, boost our deficit in relation to foreign countries and tend to dry up foreign investments.

But we are witnessing a rather peculiar spectacle. The government keeps emphasizing the significance of the energy field and its great potential. It underscores the import of the decisions to be taken and the policy it has decided to implement. Far from taking advantage of the fortunate situation in which Canada finds itself it upsets everything and strangles the chicken that lays golden eggs. Far from giving the green light to such super-projects as the development of the tar sands in Alberta the government stands right up to the companies and the administrations of the producing provinces, beats up the multinationals which have been operating here from the start and runs across the border with all the employment opportunities lost to Canada.

The methods to which the government wants to resort to Canadianize the industry are arbitrary, smack of expropriation and will have an untoward effect on Canada's economic growth. As the Informetrica group pointed out, it would cost at least $10 billion to Canadianize the industry, including between $3 billion and $5 billion which might be deducted from the amount of Canadian oil and gas sales in the next three years; the government would not allow the companies to reinvest these funds in Canada, so they would do so elsewhere thus hastening the loss of value of the Canadian dollar. It is rather ironical to imagine how the Canadian public, by paying more for its energy supplies, will contribute to help government-owned companies invest in foreign countries and at the same time spur the economy of those countries and create jobs there. And all that will not add anything to our own supplies. You see, when I used words such as "arbitrary" and "expropriation" a moment ago, I forgot I could have added the word "stupid".

The methods used are also arbitrary and confiscatory because the state is taking over part of the industry, either Canadian or foreign, by declaring that, from now on and retroactively, the Crown owns a 25 per cent interest in all rights on Canada Lands. If we study closely this part of the energy program, it becomes obvious that the Canadianization of the oil industry will not benefit the investors and the Canadian private sector, but rather the state. To my mind, this means nationalization, and this is what we are now facing. It has already occurred in several countries, with the unfavourable results of which we are all aware. Let us keep in mind that, for many years, Canada has encouraged foreign investment and received enormous benefits from these investments, especially in the employment sector. We shall need for a long time yet that foreign capital to finance our economic development; the nationalization process which the government wants to bring about will only cause this capital to dry up because the climate of confidence which is so important for the investors will no longer exist. To this, we must add an exodus of irreplaceable human and material resources.

As I said earlier, the principle of increasing Canadian participation in the development of these resources is quite commendable and I fully support it, but this objective can be achieved through incentives for Canadian investors which would not discourage foreign capital.

[English]

A recent study shows that of the six largest companies in the industry, three with assets of $9.4 billion are controlled by non-residents, and that the other three, with combined assets of $8.9 billion, are controlled in Canada. Furthermore, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources figures show that there has been a gradual decline in both the ownership and control of the petroleum industry by non-residents. For instance, in 1971 non-residents owned 78 per cent and controlled 90 per cent of the petroleum industry assets. By 1979, foreign ownership had declined to 62 per cent, and control to 64 per cent of assets. This trend indicates that Canadians will soon own and control more than half of the domestic petroleum industry whether or not the proposed national energy policies of the government are implemented in their present form. I cannot but conclude from this that the government is only interested in nationalizing the industry, and not in Canadianizing it.

Honourable senators, on the question of energy supplies I must contend that the government's recent performance is, to use a polite word, spotty. You will recall that last May I consistently warned the government of the pitfalls lurking behind our purchase of Mexican oil. I was told repeatedly that our negotiators were aware of possible extra refining costs due to the low quality of the product. Now it turns out that not only are we importing heavy fuel in an eastern Canadian market already glutted with it, but, as I predicted, this will add significant cost burdens to the Canadian consumer and to the federal treasury, and will displace the domestic heavy crude, the production of which is currently prorated. Furthermore, the contract contains no guarantee of receiving the contracted amount, as we have seen, no guarantee of quality and no guarantee of price.

Because of compensation payments by the government it is costing the federal treasury $170 million to import unneeded heavy fuel oil. Some deal!

Now the government wants to increase its purchase of Saudi Arabian oil at world prices, but refuses to do it in Canada, even when each Canadian family is spending the equivalent of $900 a year on OPEC oil. Honourable senators, I shudder to think what will happen to this country if the government increases its involvement in the management of its resources, as it intends to do, vigorously.

I shall end my remarks by repeating that the energy policy, as outlined, will have the ultimate result of large amounts of development capital leaving the country, as it already is doing, a dramatic decrease in foreign investments, and a real national growth projection reduced by 1 per cent annually for the next two years. Unless amended, this policy clearly calls for the eventual nationalization of energy companies. Are other resource companies next? Who knows.

Honourable senators, I support Senator Murray's motion that Senator Argue's inquiry be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Flynn: We are supposed to continue the debate on Senator Murray's motion a little later. It might be more convenient if Senator Molgat waited until then to intervene.

Senator Molgat: Very well then, I withdraw my adjournment motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Therefore, the debate on this inquiry has now concluded.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 10, 1980 debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-sixth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Brussels, Belgium, from 14th to 23rd November, 1980, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, this order stands in my name, and I had intended, when the inquiry was originally introduced, to say something about it. Having read the speeches of my predecessors, and particularly that of Senator Bonnell, I do not feel that I have anything to add at this time. I was a member of the same committee, the Scientific and Technical Committee, as Senator Bonnell. The work of that committee was extremely interesting, but it was so carefully related to the Senate by Senator Bonnell that I do not think I can add anything to what he had to say.

I would underline, however, what Senator Bonnell told us about the evidence brought before the NATO subcommittee with regard to the work being done on recombinant DNA in many parts of the world. This work is of the utmost importance, and since it is a subject in which a great many people interest themselves, though in many cases without having the scientific background or knowledge to enable them to support the views that they are apt to take, I think it is important that responsible parliamentarians keep themselves in touch with the work that is being done.

It is, to me, a matter of great satisfaction that there seems to be an abundance of evidence now that the dangers of experimentation with recombinant DNA are not nearly as great as some scientists felt a decade or even five years ago, and it looks as though there may be great opportunities not only in the field of genetic manipulation but also in the field of biomass energy, and so on, arising from this work, and I am glad that the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization have interested themselves in this important matter, which must be one of the most important scientific possibilities facing us today. I wish that Canada would contribute more to this research, because I do not think we want to be caught way behind in an area which may be of tremendous importance in the decades ahead.

Other than that, I can say that it was a matter of great interest to me to attend the North Atlantic Assembly. The hard work was done in committees. As I say, I was on the committee on which Senator Bonnell has so adequately commented, so I do not wish to clutter up the record by trying to repeat what he has said so well. I did not attend the other committees. If you were on one of the big committees, it was impossible to pay attention to more than one.

● (2110)

The General Assembly generally passed the resolutions that emanated from the committees, and they were generally passed with near unanimity. This was an exercise that made one feel a little sorry that the Assembly did not of its own initiative involve itself more directly in some of the vital issues, but NATO is a complicated organization and the permanent council, the ministers of defence and the permanent ambassadors to NATO from the various countries exercise many of the functions, making it unnecessary for the North Atlantic Assembly to debate vital issues at great length. Nevertheless, the resolutions which were passed showed near unanimity among the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, at which we can all take satisfaction.

I am pleased and honoured to have been a representative or a delegate from the Parliament of Canada to this Assembly. The work being done by NATO and the contribution being made by the Canadian armed forces, although not as great as some of us would like, is nevertheless of great significance.

It was a matter of great satisfaction to me to find that the esprit de corps, the spirit of the Canadian NATO forces in West Germany and wherever we met them, was as good as it was, and while they badly need improved equipment and are looking forward to replacing their CF-104s with the CF-18s, which are still some years away, anyone who visited Baden-Solingen and talked with the Canadian air squadrons there would be greatly impressed and would be proud of his Canadian compatriots and the part they are playing in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

I have nothing more useful to say at this time about the Assembly. It was a great honour to have been one of the representatives of the Parliament of Canada to it.

Senator Thompson: May I ask the honourable senator a question? When I read Senator Bonnell's comprehensive and erudite speech, there were one or two things he was suggesting that struck me as significant. One was that constant contact should be kept with the developments that are being made in genetic research. I was glad to hear you say, senator, that you feel those are more positive and beneficial to humanity than they are harmful.

Certain of the leading geneticists in Canada, notably Dr. Simonovich of Toronto, who is an internationally known geneticist, are suggesting that the Parliament of Canada and legislators generally should start looking at the moral and ethical questions being posed by the great advances in genetics. Would you agree with them that that is a subject which should be looked into further by such a forum as the Senate, for example?

Senator Hicks: Well, honourable senators, that is a difficult question. There may well be moral and ethical problems concerned, but the history of mankind shows that, when man becomes aware of scientific possibilities, almost always inquiry into those possibilities continues. I believe that will be the case with respect to inquiry into the various aspects of recombinant DNA.

If we arrive at the stage—and we are a long way from it at the present time—where we begin trying to interfere with human genetics, then the moral and ethical problems become huge. At the moment, however, genetic manipulation has to do with bacteria which may be developed to produce insulin, for example, much more cheaply and in much greater quantities than is possible today. That is undoubtedly of benefit to mankind. It may also be used to cause the deterioration in a particular way of cellulose material in order to make it available for what is popularly called biomass energy—and I admit, honourable senators, that I am getting a little out of my depth as a scientific technician here. There is a great deal that can be done before we get ourselves into a situation where we have to worry about moral and ethical problems, although I am certainly not saying that that is not a possibility. The history of mankind shows, however, that when the possibility of learning something by inquiry is made available to us, invariably we follow it up.

On motion of Senator Hastings, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report on the administration of Allowances for Blind Persons in Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 12 of the Blind Persons Act, Chapter B-7, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the administration of Allowances for Disabled Persons in Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 12 of the Disabled Persons Act, Chapter D-6, R.S.C., 1970.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE BUDGETS TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled reports approving the budget and supplementary budgets of the following committees:

Banking, Trade and Commerce; National Finance; and Transport and Communications.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MODIFIED MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 23, I would modify my motion which appears as Order No. 7 on the Orders of the Day to read as follows:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Honourable senators will see that, as it now stands, my motion refers to the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue which is "presently on the Orders of the Day." The debate on Senator Argue's inquiry was concluded last evening, with the result that it is no longer on the Orders of the Day. Therefore, in consequence, I am requesting leave of the Senate to make this technical change in my own motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

RESIGNATION OF PRESIDENT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. After hearing this morning the scathing criticisms of the government by various women's groups in this country concerning the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government can tell us what the government proposes to do to restore some credibility to the body known as the Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I do not have before me the text of any detailed criticism of the minister or his policies by recognized groups interested in the extension of human rights. Perhaps those comments have been made, but I do not have the material in front of me. I can only say that under the auspices of this and previous Liberal governments, enormous advances have been made in respect of the status of women in this country.

Senator Nurgitz: As a supplementary, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he can advise the house as to whether, in light of Doris Anderson's resignation, a more pliable or agreeable defeated Liberal candidate has been found to preside over that council?

● (1410)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I deplore the note of cynicism which is evident in the remarks of the senator who, after all, was appointed only a few months ago.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You make me cry.

Senator Perrault: Surely after such a brief period in Parliament he has not come to this deplorable state of cynicism about the appointment process.

Senator Flynn: It doesn't take long with that kind of government.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: It took even less time with the last one.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is really by way of a follow-up on some questions I asked last evening of the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning energy policy. It arises from two reports I read today, one from Data Resources of Canada containing the almost incredible information that the energy sector, which pre-eminently should be boosting economic growth in this country, will, in fact, be a drain on the economy in the coming year. They said that the National Energy Program will collect about $4.5 billion for the federal coffers in the first half of the year, but only $2 billion will be recycled. That will make what they call a "$2.5 billion negative fiscal shot in the first half of 1981."

The second report to which I refer is that of a statement by the minister himself in Regina in which he said that westerners misunderstand and misinterpret the national energy policy. I want to ask the minister whether it is the position of the government that the fact that energy is a weak spot in the economy now, rather than the strong factor it should be, is because of a misunderstanding of the policy. With regard to the minister's statement that the problem is that the government does not have the firepower in public relations that others have, is he prepared to agree that the $3 million advertising budget in the energy field has been a waste of money?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no, I am not prepared to agree to that, but I know that my honourable friend's colleagues criticize us every time we try to give the public information about government, and, indeed, parliamentary, programs because we acknowledge openly and without reservation that we do not seem to have the firepower in public relations that many of the provincial governments have. It is fairly easy to find out why. They spend much larger amounts than we do on that, and I think if we were to accommodate the honourable senator he would support us wholeheartedly when we go with public relations and public information programs so that people do know what the policies are.

I can bring a list of energy-related programs and economic activity related to them that we would project with some confidence into the near future, and I think he would agree, after examining it carefully, that the conclusions that have come out of Data Resources of Canada form their opinion, but it is not necessarily one that would be shared by me or my honourable friend. If he did an intelligent analysis of what is going on, I am sure he would come to the same conclusion.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Would you stop insulting the senator?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): He flattered him.

Senator Olson: It depends on an assessment of how much you want. For example, in the next three or four years we are going to have an expansion, in my view, in the coal industry which will be unprecedented in Canadian history. It will be much bigger than anything that has ever happened in the past, and the economic activity coming from that is going to be great. I can bring in the rest of the list on hydro-electric generation and all other forms of energy, but I understand my honourable friend would rather talk about gas and oil, and, if he does, that by itself is a very important part of the energy-related economic activity but it is not all. To get back to that, I maintain what I said, and that is that there is a lack of understanding of how the new energy program will apply to the oil and gas activity. We can see that is happening—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Tell it to the unemployed.

● (1415)

Senator Olson: I will also get to that in a minute. We can see that is happening and that there is some apprehension about the size of the exploration and development projects for later on in 1981. We agree. We also agree that it would be very helpful if the federal government and the governments of the producing provinces would come to an agreement. I do not know how many more times I or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have to say that there is no one in Canada more anxious to have an agreement so that the industry and everyone else—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Your agreement.

Senator Olson: —will have some of the uncertainty removed—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: —and so that we can get on with it.

Honourable senators opposite talk about employment, and so on. Here is the answer, that I was going to give later, to a question asked by Senator Charbonneau a few days ago about drilling activity. The government realizes that some drilling rigs are idle and that others have moved to the United States.

Having said that, however, it should be emphasized that this, in part, is a continuation of an earlier trend resulting from record drilling activity in previous years and an overbuilt drill rig fleet.

If my honourable friends do not understand that situation, they should realize that their government set out on a deliberate policy of increased tax measures to enhance the drilling for natural gas in Alberta in 1976—and oil also—which resulted in a great increase in the number of gas wells that were drilled. There are 9,000 gas wells in Alberta that are now capped, because that is all the market can take. What do honourable senators opposite want us to do—drill another 10,000 until we get the market up to the volume that will accommodate the flow from them? Of course not.

It should also be emphasized that forecasts, regardless of their source, are extremely speculative. For instance, Oilweek, apparently considered an authoritative trade journal, published data of drilling activity in mid-December which indicated that over 500 rigs were active. That contrasts sharply with the figure of 462 released for the same period of time by the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors.

Therefore we have to look at those things. Both are apparently equally credible organizations; but the bottom line is that the amount of activity in December 1980, and as late as January 8, 1981, is not down from last year.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, in light of the minister's assessment that coal production in this country is going to be increased in a dramatic manner, can he explain to us why, in his own province of Alberta, a big consortium like Elco Mining, which the minister probably knows about, has postponed, probably for the next six to eight years, mining development in Alberta?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure about the management decisions, but I should like to advise my honourable friend that the Manalta Coal Company at Gregg River in Alberta has recently signed a contract to deliver an additional three million tonnes per year into export position.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Negotiations have reached an advanced stage for approximately six million tonnes more over the Anzac route into such places as the Quintette and Bull Moose and the area of Sukunka. In addition, there are two or three major new contracts from southeastern British Columbia that will be coming in.

That is only a partial list. There is a long list, adding up to many millions of tonnes additional in the next three years, and the federal government has committed itself to tripling, as and when necessary, the capacity of Robert's Bank to accommodate that loading. We have also given a commitment to build a coal loading facility on Ridley Island, and all of the infrastructure, all the way into the interior of British Columbia where those coal mines are located. My honourable friend should realize that this is only a partial list of what is coming on.

There is far more interest in thermal coal use all over the world, and people are looking to Canada in areas besides those that I have listed. That is why I have come to the conclusion that the economic activity that will be going on there is almost unprecedented in Canadian history.

Senator Perrault: Nothing but good news.

• (1420)

Senator Charbonneau: I admire the minister's enthusiasm, to which, naturally, we all subscribe. If what he is referring to ever comes to pass—

Senator Olson: It is already under way.

Senator Charbonneau: Yes. Well, Elco Mining, a consortium of Canadian companies and European interests, has been under way for several years. The federal government announced what it was supposed to do, but it still has not produced anything, and that happened about six or seven years ago. I certainly hope, as a Canadian, that what you are telling us now is going to happen, but if what is going to happen turns out to be the same as what happened when the federal government announced these previous projects, God help us.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am suprised at what is being said. There are many factors that go into a management decision as to whether one is going to begin this year, next year, or five years from now the exploitation of a deposit; but I can tell the honourable senator that I was in Elko, B.C., a few weeks ago to be present at the opening ceremonies of a new 15,000 tonne hopper loading device which will enable them to load trains on a continuous flow basis from the Fording Mine. I am not sure about identifying the company to which the honourable senator refers, and where its deposit is, but perhaps it is near Elko. There are a number of other mines going ahead very rapidly in that same area. Why the specific company the honourable senator is referring to is not going ahead, I do not know; but I can look into it. It is not because there is no activity going on there, because there is in fact a great deal of activity going on.

Hon. Robert Muir: As a supplementary, honourable senators, may I direct a question to the new-found wash-house coal miner across the way? As Senator Charbonneau has said, I am sure we all applaud his great enthusiasm for his fantastically new interest in coal.

Senator Olson: It is not new; I have had it for months.

Senator Perrault: He was born with it as a child.

Senator Muir: I do not see much coal dust in his eyes, but let us say that, like the poor, he has always been with us. In any event, would the minister be kind enough to investigate the reason why the Cape Breton Development Corporation—whose job it is to open up new mines, provide employment, and increase coal mining—is at the moment contemplating changing to oil in one of its heating plants that has to be renovated? Would they be proposing to burn some of that Mexican oil?

Perhaps the minister could find out what the reasoning behind this move might be, and plead with them to stick with coal, since they are producing more coal now, and we can use it. Incidentally, I believe coal mining is coming back into its own because of the high cost of oil.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will have to take that specific question as notice. I do not know why they are doing this. I do not even know if they are doing it. What I do know is that an addition to the coal mining prospects in that part of Canada is not only under active consideration, but I would think that major new activity there is at an advanced stage.

Senator Muir: I would agree completely with the honourable senator. Coal is coming back, and we are happy to see it coming back, through the efforts of Devco. I think they are doing a pretty good job.

The minister says he does not know if they are going to do this or not. That is why I pose the question. Will he, however, please find out and see if something is happening along those lines?

Senator Olson: I understood the question.

Senator Murray: By way of a supplementary, honourable senators, this is not the first occasion on which the minister has cited Oilweek by way of defence, or supposed documentation, of his own assertion that drilling activity had not declined significantly. I think that perhaps one way to help settle the argument would be if the minister would undertake to bring in government figures providing quarterly comparisons of drilling activity as between 1980 and 1979, and not just the status as of January 1, 1980.

Perhaps he would also undertake, on a quarterly basis, to give us the figures for drilling activity this year, 1981, compared to last year, because notwithstanding the assertions he made last week in reply to a question, I think, from our colleague Senator Roblin, the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors said the other day that while there are as many rigs operating this year as last year, the number of active rigs is probably 20 per cent below what it would have been without the National Energy Program.

● (1425)

It is true that the number of drilling rigs is about the same as it was last year, but the association said that drilling contractors had added more than 100 rigs to their fleets in the last year in anticipation that the rapid exploration pace in the first nine months of 1980 would continue. As a result, the association estimates that 60 rigs are sitting idle out there and that a similar number have moved to the United States. Therefore, I ask the minister if he would undertake to bring in the statistics that the government has, and is prepared to vouch for, as to drilling acitivity in this year and the previous two years.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would be very glad to do that because I think it would clear up a few other things. The honourable senator wants me to try to make some comparisons between 1979 and 1980 on a quarterly basis. If he finds that there is some downturn, I am sure he will agree with me that it has nothing to do with the National Energy Program, because those estimates are taken from a time previous to the announcement of it. I also answered part of the question before, which is that we have had a very significant increase in the number of gas wells that were drilled, partly as a result of a policy set out in 1976, and there is a limit to the amount of capital spent on developing those gas wells unless you have a concurrent increase in the cash flow from them.

I know many places in southern Alberta where there are gas wells drilled in 1977 and 1978 which still have caps on them. The drillers knew, when they drilled those wells, that they were not going to be included in the pro-rating system because there were already enough connected gas wells to satisfy the market. Therefore, some of those wells have been sitting there for two or three years without any production. This must be taken into consideration when comparing current activity with the surge of activity which followed the stimulation and incentives resulting from the policies of the government then in office.

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CORPORATION—FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and it is related to the automotive industry and employment therein. My understanding is that when the government made the loan arrangement with Chrysler Corporation some months ago, Chrysler guaranteed the employment of a specified number of Canadians in its plant. I wonder what the status of that employment figure is now, in relation to the present problem that Chrysler has.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, those figures have not changed. In fact, Chrysler, I understand, will negotiate further with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Apparently there are some significant changes in the totality of the Chrysler Corporation's requirements, one manifestation of them being a request for a further $400 million from the United States government. The fact is that at present there has been no change in the commitment or the understanding that we have, although I know that they have asked for negotiations, and I think the minister has indicated his willingness to discuss it with them.

Senator Doody: My understanding is—and the minister can perhaps correct me—that Chrysler intends to reduce its planned investment from $1 billion to $600 million. Would that have an adverse effect on employment?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what Senator Doody is trying to do now is to get into the details of what is involved here. I read what is in the newspapers too, but I do not know whether that is part of the proposal that Chrysler Canada is going to put to the minister, and I do not expect to know until they do it.

Senator Doody: The minister seems to think it improper for me to be looking for information about the deal that the Government of Canada has made with the Chrysler Corporation.

Senator Olson: No, not at all.

Senator Doody: I think it is incumbent upon me to try to find out what is going on between the Government of Canada and the Chrysler Corporation as to where the taxpayers' money is going and how many people will be employed as a result of that stimulus. The minister surely has been in conversation with the minister responsible on an ongoing basis during that time, and under these conditions I would simply ask for the information I think we are entitled to.

• (1430)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understand that and I do not resent it at all, and my reply was not intended to cast any aspersions on the question. I simply said I did not have the answer yet.

Senator Doody: I take it, then, that the minister will try to obtain the answer.

Senator Olson: Yes.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is a better answer than the previous one.

THE ECONOMY

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA ANNUAL REVIEW—RATE OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF DOMESTIC OIL—NATIONAL ENERGY POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on December 10, 1980 by Senator Charbonneau concerning drilling activity in our producing provinces.

Senator Charbonneau asked whether the minister was able to confirm that current estimates of the number of wells to be drilled in 1981 indicate that there will be approximately 4,200 fewer than in pre-budget predictions.

The government realizes that some drilling rigs are idle and that others have moved to the U.S. Having said this, however, it should be emphasized that this is, in part, a continuation of an earlier trend resulting from record drilling activity in previous years and an overbuilt drill rig fleet. It should also be emphasized that forecasts, regardless of their source, are extremely speculative. For instance, Oilweek, an authoritative trade journal, published data for drilling activity in mid-December which indicated that over 500 rigs were active, which contrasts sharply with the figure of 462 released for the same period of time by the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors.

Beyond the question of credibility of a given set of data there is the larger and less certain issue of forecasting activity. A number of events, including federal policy decisions, have been made which will have an impact on future drilling activities. In fact, the federal government recently announced its intent to extend the current definition of exploration expense for one year, and we anticipate that this will have a positive impact on drilling activity.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—LABOUR REPRESENTATIVE

Hon. H. A Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on January 15 by Senator Muir which concerned the Cape Breton Development Corporation. He asked whether the government was contemplating appointing a labour representative to the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

I am informed by my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, that he is at the present time looking into board vacancies for the Cape Breton Development Corporation. He should be in a position, shortly, to make an announcement on this subject. In the meantime I would like to assure the honourable senator that I have referred his representations to my colleague the minister.

THE ECONOMY

STATUS OF ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to respond to a question raised on January 15 by Senator Doody. He asked if the minister would try to determine why a chairman had not been appointed to the Atlantic Development Council, and why the council had not met for some time.

I am informed that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is currently looking into the matter of the appointment of a chairperson for the Atlantic Development Council. However, I would remind the honourable senator that the board of directors continues to function and it is supported by a staff in St. John's.

Regarding the scheduling of a meeting of the council, I understand that the council can call meetings whenever it deems appropriate.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question on that particular program? When I asked the question initially I mentioned the fact that there was a staff sitting in St. John's. I also mentioned the fact that, to the best of my knowledge, the council had not met for a considerable length of time, a matter of perhaps two years or more. There would seem to be some sort of discrepancy there. Can the minister look into that?

Senator Olson: I can look into it for the precise dates when the meetings were held, but if you are asking me when a meeting will be held, I will have to refer that question to the council, because, as I said in my reply to the question, the council can call meetings whenever it deems appropriate.

ENERGY

OIL—INTERNATIONAL PRICES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, some days ago I asked the Minister of State for Economic Development some questions concerning international oil prices.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes.

Senator Murray: I should like to ask him now if he would jog the memory of his officials and bring in that data as soon as possible, because it would be most useful to have.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will try to do that.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Is there any prospect of getting replies to the questions I submitted on October 23? I thought they were rather simple questions, and I do not think the answers should be complicated. Surely, after three months I might expect a reply.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, replies to certain of these questions are put together with painstaking care.

An Hon. Senator: More pain than care!

Senator Perrault: Consequently, there may have been a delay occasioned by the nature of the question. However, the matter will be investigated immediately.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, some of these unanswered questions are mere yesterdays in comparison with a question I asked last May in reference to Irish moss. As everyone knows, the important quality of carageen, which is extracted from Irish moss, is that it is a coagulant and brings solidity. I am afraid that somewhere along the line we have solidified into total inactivity. I do wish the minister would make some motion so that we could get back to having the emergence of just a tiny bit of information before the next fishing season starts. It is only three months away.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can well understand the honourable senator's concern. I shall probe the reasons why "mossification" appears to have attached itself to the reply process.

PRIVACY BILL, 1980

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Second reading of the Bill S-9, intituled: "An Act to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to government files containing personal information relating to themselves".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask that this item be placed on the Orders of the Day for February 18, so that it will not be dealt with at the same time as the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, January 22, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

UKRAINE

SIXTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that January 22 is a very special day for three-quarters of a million Canadian citizens of Ukrainian origin. It was 63 years ago, on January 22, 1918, that the Central Rada, the Parliament of the Ukrainian people, proclaimed the independence of Ukraine in Kiev, the ancient capital of the country.

The downfall of the oppressive Russian tsarist regime in 1917 heralded the liberation and freedom of many non-Russian peoples, such as the Poles, Lithuanians, Latvians, Estonians, Byelorussians, and many others, all of whom in the past had been conquered and incorporated into the Russian empire.

Ukraine, under a democratic government of the Cossacks, was conquered by Tsar Peter I in 1709, who imposed an autocratic form of government on the Ukrainian people which, in the 19th century, forbade, by decree, the use of the name "Ukraine" and the Ukrainian language.

The collapse of Russian tsardom, the "prison of nations", gave the opportunity for the Ukrainians and the subjugated nations to assert their will.

The Parliamentary Act of January 22, 1918, established the Ukrainian National Republic, modelled upon those of the western world. It recognized the highest principles of democracy—freedom of speech, press, religion, assembly, association, and personal freedom. All minorities, including the Jews, were granted—and I quote—"national-personal" autonomy and representation in the government. The Ukrainian National Republic was the very antithesis of totalitarianism, despotism, colonialism and imperialism, and therefore has much in common with Canada.

The fact that today the blue-yellow flag of free Ukraine is flying over the City Hall of Ottawa, the capital of Canada, which is recognition of their just struggle for freedom and democracy, brings great joy to the Ukrainians of this country and to all freedom-loving Ukrainians throughout the world.

The National Liberation Revolution, which first began in Ukraine, spread throughout the Russian Empire to the nations imprisoned by the Russian tsarist regime. One after the other, the non-Russian peoples proclaimed their independent states. This was a democratic, anti-imperio-colonial manifestation. Gradually, however, the Russian communist regime subverted and conquered, by force, all of these independent states and compelled them to join the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by 1922.

The former Russian tsarist empire was thus transformed, by conquest, into a totalitarian Russian communist empire more despotic and reactionary than the previous one.

Ukrainians have been in the forefront of the human rights movement in the Soviet Union. Some, like the Orthodox priest Vasyl Romaniuk, have been jailed for their religious beliefs. Others, like Yuriy Shukhewych, a totally innocent person, have received long prison terms for being the children of Ukrainian patriots who had fought for the liberation of their country. Severe sentences have been meted out, particularly to 37 members of the Ukrainian Helsinki group in Kiev, now represented by General Petro Grigorenko, and other expelled members, in the United States.

Citing the Soviet constitution to the effect that each republic has the right to secede, and Principle VIII of the Helsinki Act on the self-determination of peoples, the group's memorandum of autumn, 1979, stated:

> The group has become a force in the national liberation struggle of the Ukrainian people for its national and political liberation and for the right of the individual to a free life in his own land.

Free Ukrainians, and the free people of all subjugated nations of the Soviet Russian empire and its satellites, will continue to celebrate their independence days, and impress upon the western world the fact that freedom is indivisible. The principles of the United Nations and the Helsinki Final Act must be applied to the Soviet Union, which is a signatory, to the effect that self-determination, complete freedom, sovereignty and integrity of national territory must also be granted to the non-Russian and satellite nations.

Honourable senators, the Canadian government, Parliament, legislators, leaders and people in general must constantly reassert their faith in the principles of democracy, justice, freedom and independence, without which there can be no lasting peace. At the same time they should express sympathy, moral support and readiness to give feasible aid to all those less fortunate nations which are still struggling for the realization of these, the highest principles of humanity.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Canadians of Ukrainian descent have made a major contribution to the Canadian nation and the Canadian family. I know that all honourable senators have listened with great interest to the Honourable Senator Yuzyk as he has chronicled the history and the struggle for freedom of the people of Ukrainian descent down through the years. All of us have listened with profound sympathy and interest as he described some of the great problems which have confronted those of Ukrainian descent and as he reminded us so eloquently of the need to oppose tyranny wherever it exists.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think we should thank Senator Yuzyk for calling our attention the anniversary of the independence of Ukraine in 1922. On this occasion, we wish to extend our warmest greetings to all our fellow-citizens of Ukrainian origin while expressing both our regrets that tzarist oppression has been replaced by another even more cruel form of oppression, and the hope that the day will soon come when the regime will be overthrown and freedom can flourish again in that great country. We, Canadians, have never concealed our conviction that the freedom of peoples should be respected as well as the freedom of individuals. Once again, we hope and trust that circumstances will soon allow the Ukrainian people the freedom and the joy of expressing themselves as they see fit in the world.

● (1415)

[English]

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am emboldened to associate myself with the splendid sentiments already expressed so well by Senator Yuzyk and the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition, and hope that none of them or any other honourable senator will think that I am, for a moment, seeking to detract from the great contribution which the Ukrainian people have made to this country and, indeed, to the world of decent people in its fine expression, but it so happens that this year we shall not be meeting on January 25, which is the anniversary date of the peasant poet, the great idealist and the great humanitarian, Robert Burns. Indeed, we shall not be meeting until January 27.

In all the clarion calls for freedom which the finest people in the Ukrainian world have put forth, they would find ample, sustained, courageous and poetic support from Robert Burns, a man who opposed cant—not K-a-n-t, because he didn't care about him, but c-a-n-t—hypocrisy, bigotry and narrow-mindedness, a man who believed profoundly in the brotherhood of man and, as well, the fatherhood of God, although he did not accept that it may be revealed in such narrow interpretations as some of my fellow Presbyterians of that age insisted upon.

This was a man ecumenical in his sins perhaps, which meant that he was more honest than those about him, a man ecumenical in his support for those who deserved it, but a man who is unique among the poets in our world and perhaps in any other world. While we study great poets and admire them, in the whole great pantheon of gifted people Robert Burns is the only one whom we "celebrate." Did one ever hear of a Shakespeare celebration or a Goethe celebration? But we always celebrate Burns. He gave us the example on how that should be celebrated. He also gave us the great example that what counted in life was not the tinsel show of the fineries and the filigrees, but the essential qualities, when he said:

> The rank is but the guinea's stamp;
> The man's the gowd for a' that!

He struck through to the integral truth which all of us, when we are at our best, recognize is the expression of the finest in humanity.

Because we shall not be sitting on January 25, I hope that my fellow senators will join with me in honouring today that brilliant genius so briefly among us, the peasant poet, the commoner poet, the man gifted by God beyond many, many others and in a rank with just a few like Mozart, a very small, select group of the divinely inspired. I ask senators to join with me in supporting the fine words of Senator Yuzyk and in adding to that our respect for a man for whom we should all have the greatest regard.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on the celebration that Senator Yuzyk has referred to, coming from his home province myself and knowing the contribution that Ukrainians have made in western Canada, and particularly in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, I would like to congratulate him on the work he has done pertaining to his group in this particular regard. I think it is most fitting that we should also recognize the senator because he has had tenacity equal to that of his group in our area, for these people have worked not only the soil but also in almost every sphere of activity in our province, which is borne witness to by the group of fine professional men and women they have produced. They have made a very valuable contribution, not only to western Canada but to Canadian society as a whole. To that end I, too, would like to join, without naming any other poet that one might mention, in saying, senator: Thank you for a job well done. At the same time, I wish to thank the Ukrainians for the contribution they have made, particularly in western Canada.

● (1420)

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, as a neighbour of Senator Yuzyk in this house, I have noted his fine record of attendance as a member of this assembly and I have observed his constant interest in this subject. I owe my presence here, in large part, to the support of Ukrainian Canadians. I endorse what has been said by Senator Guay in complimenting Senator Yuzyk.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Tax Review Board for the year ended December 31, 1979, pursuant to section 17 of the Tax Review Board Act, Chapter 11, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

ITALY

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—CANADIAN AID—NATIONAL CO-ORDINATING COMMITTEE—VISIT OF SPEAKER TO DEVASTATED AREA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to bring to your attention a subject which I am sure is of interest to everyone in this chamber. In just a few hours' time our esteemed Speaker, in his capacity as chairman of the national committee co-ordinating Canada's Italian relief effort, will be on his way to that area of Italy devastated by last November's earthquake.

I do not need to remind honourable senators of the heart-breaking conditions that are the legacy of that terrible disaster, with hundreds of thousands left homeless. If there is a bright spot amid all the misery, it is the response of the people of Canada, led in this nation of ours by the great Italian-Canadian community who have rallied magnificently to the cause of bringing help to the earthquake victims. It has been estimated that to date some $8 million to $10 million has been collected across the nation, with still more expected from further fund-raising campaigns.

The help that these contributions will bring starts tonight with the departure of His Honour the Speaker and his fact-finding mission to the stricken area. The various Italian-Canadian agencies which established this non-partisan co-ordinating committee chose well when they chose our Speaker to head the entire organization, which will oversee Canada's contribution to this relief effort.

I am sure I speak for all in this house, honourable senators, when I extend to His Honour the best wishes of his colleagues for the worthy cause upon which he is about to embark.

Your Honour, we wish you well, and we wish you a safe journey on the eve of your Italian mission. We look forward to a report of the good work we are confident your committee will accomplish in the earthquake zone.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will enjoy yourself during your visit to Italy.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I join in the good wishes extended by the Leader of the Government, first of all to our Speaker to whom, on behalf of all honourable senators on this side of the chamber, we wish a most pleasant journey.

May we ask him to convey on our behalf to the Italian people and especially to the victims of the terrible earthquakes of a few months ago our deepest sympathy and the assurance that we want to help them as much as possible. The Leader of the Government has clearly indicated that the Italian community in Canada had received a rather impressive sum of money. I believe that it was a joint effort on the part of Canadians everywhere. I also think that the Canadian government did contribute its share.

I am sure that once he has visited the area and inquired about the situation, Mr. Speaker will want to ascertain whether our contribution has been adequate, on the basis of the needs and our means, and that he will indicate to us, to the government and the people of Canada whether we should contribute more.

Therefore our thoughts will be with him and we wish him unqualified success in his discharge of this important mission.

• (1425)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, my visit to Italy is a function I must undertake in my position as chairman of the committee co-ordinating relief for the Italian earthquake victims. I expect the trip to be a very short one and I should be back in Ottawa on Tuesday. As a result of a strike by Italian airline personnel, I cannot fly directly from Montreal to Rome, so I must land in Zurich and fly to Rome from there.

I expect to meet with members of the Italian government and the authorities in Naples, and I shall also be received by the President of the Italian Senate, Signor Fanfani, a former Prime Minister. I hope I will have an opportunity to visit not only those who find themselves in unhappy circumstances, but also those who have been unaffected by the disaster.

I thank all honourable senators for their moral support.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, the 27th of January, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend to invite the Senate to defeat this motion since, over the years, I have learned that it is a useless gesture. However, I should put on record the fact that last week I mentioned to the deputy leader that, from my perspective, the Senate need not sit this week, and what has taken place has proved me right. There is really no valid reason for the Senate to sit next week. Surely, if committees are meeting, the members of those committees can attend those meetings without the entire Senate being forced to sit. The Senate will have practically nothing to deal with next week.

• (1430)

If it is merely a matter of how the Senate is perceived by others, I say that is a rather empty argument. When we speak of the reform of the Senate, we should be thinking in terms not of cosmetics but of substance. When there is something for us to deal with, we should take the time to deal with it thoroughly, even if it means sitting six days a week. But when our agenda does not justify our being here, then, in my opinion, we should not come.

In the present circumstances, for instance, our not sitting next week would allow His Honour the Speaker to spend a few more days in Italy. Obviously, he dare not stay longer than he has scheduled, because he knows how very badly this house needs him when it sits.

I realize that all this effort on my part will likely be in vain. The government leader will not change his mind. He has received his instructions and he will stick by them one way or the other, whatever happens, come hell or high water. But perhaps he can be prevailed upon to discuss with the Leader of the Government in the other place whether it will always be necessary for the Senate to sit, even when nothing is to come to us.

For instance, the only matter we have to deal with is Bill S-19, which I understand Senator van Roggen will sponsor later today. That may be an interesting bill, but, surely, it won't be argued that it is imperative for the Senate to come back next week to continue the study of it. The matter with which it deals is something we have discussed for years and years.

Honourable senators, I put these remarks on the record so that in future we will not be accused of having accepted without any objection the motion before us.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, perhaps I did not hear Senator Flynn correctly, but did he refer to His Honour the Speaker receiving directions from somebody?

Senator Flynn: No, senator. I was referring to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course the leader was being facetious. I receive directions from no one.

Senator Flynn: Then you should try to seek some.

Senator Perrault: You are damned if you do, and damned if you don't.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate as well as our colleagues opposite would join the members of the official opposition in expressing the disgust and deep contempt which the Canadians must now feel following the news of ill treatment of the American hostages during their captivity in Iran.

This, as you know, violates all Geneva agreements and human rights legislation by which governments throughout the world should abide. The Iranian government as well as guardians of the revolution, the students, have been abusing the American hostages and I think that the entire world must unequivocally disapprove such behaviour.

I think that for their barbarian and brutal conduct towards the American hostages the guards should one day be condemned and punished.

Under the circumstances, I should like to ask the government leader if it would not be appropriate to let the Government of Iran know that Canada condemns its action and its ill treatment of the US hostages and is not prepared to resume its diplomatic and commercial relations with Iran even if Canadians stand to lose several hundred thousand dollars.

I think that the international community should take a similar stand in an effort to prevent a reoccurrence of that situation. I should like to ask the government leader if he would convey the representations of the official opposition to his government.

• (1435)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that all honourable senators will join in the sentiments expressed so well by Senator Asselin. The government is following closely the revelations about the mistreatment of American hostages during their long captivity.

Throughout the crisis, of course, this government and the predecessor government, of which the honourable senator was a member, strongly condemned the hostage taking, not only because of its illegality, but also because of the obvious humanitarian objections to holding and treating people in this way.

Our concern about these reports does not affect the need to end sanctions at some point. They certainly will determine, however, when those sanctions will be ended. The sanctions were imposed as part of international pressure on the Iranian authorities to release the hostages. Now that the hostages are free, it was the general view before these stories began to emerge, that we had no justification for maintaining sanctions.

Other countries, notably the EEC member states, Japan and Australia, which imposed sanctions in concert with us, have either already lifted those sanctions or are about to do so. However, I am advised that there will be no imminent action on the part of Canada of a similar nature.

Other aspects of the normalization of our diplomatic relations with Iran will be handled with deliberation. Honourable senators will recall that we never broke diplomatic relations with Iran, so there is no need to formally re-establish them. However, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, indicated in the House of Commons on January 21, the taking of certain practical steps, including the return of Canadians to staff our embassy in Tehran would, under normal circumstances, not be a question of weeks, but of months.

In the case of the embassy, we will be looking at the factors, including this new evidence, which argue for returning our staff soon because of the need to provide consular and other assistance to Canadians who are there now or who may wish to visit there in the future. However, we are naturally hopeful that the security situation for our personnel will be acceptable.

I thank the honourable senator for his suggestion.

IRAN—RELEASE OF AMERICAN HOSTAGES—ROLE OF ALGERIA

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I expected greater alacrity and greater curiosity on the part of my colleagues. In this connection, I would ask the Leader of the Government if the Canadian government has expressed to the people and Government of Algeria commendation and appreciation for their role in bringing the hostage question to a widely-applauded finality. I think they did a fine job.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know all honourable senators are in accord with the sentiments expressed by Senator Macquarrie. However, I have no information on the point. The question will be taken as notice.

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I had intended to ask this question of the Minister of State for Economic Development, but, better still, I should like to pose it directly to the Leader of the Government.

In light of the recent statement made by the chairman of Sysco, Mr. Michael Cochrane, to the effect that the Sydney Steel Corporation broke even in the last quarter of 1980, and that this sets the stage for further quarters of profitable operation, this will only be so if the first phase of the long-range business plan designed by a federal-provincial task force is commenced soon. The Leader of the Government knows about this, because he keeps himself abreast of these things.

• (1440)

Could the Leader of the Government indicate when the federal government will join with the provincial government, which has already approved the plan calling for an investment of $175 million over five years, and issue its approval so that this rejuvenation and renewal of the steel mill can get under way?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice and referred to Senator Olson, who is engaged in some important business today, and therefore is not in the chamber.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. In light of the fact, as I have already intimated, that the provincial government has given its approval and management has also approved, as has the United Steel Workers of America, would the Leader of the Government lend his assistance in cabinet to the Minister of State for Economic Development on this very important subject?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, under all circumstances I attempt to do so, as does the distinguished Honourable Senator Argue.

Senator Flynn: Leave him alone.

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DERAILMENT—REPORT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—CONSIDERATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government relating to the report of Mr. Justice Grange on the Mississauga railway accident inquiry. It relates to the statement, which I believe to be correct, that the Minister of Transport has appointed a committee to consider the recommendations contained in that report.

I should like to discover whether the committee is to consider all of the recommendations before they are implemented, or is it simply to consider those matters in recommendation 11, on page 205 of the report, which the commissioner himself suggests should be considered by a committee of Transport Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret that I do not have on my desk today an explanation or elucidation of the exact terms of reference. The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, I might ask whether or not the government is taking seriously the recommendation on page 196 of the report that certain of the commissioner's recommendations be implemented immediately, or, as he puts it, without lead time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government takes very seriously the report which has been prepared. The necessity of guarding against similar disasters in the future is uppermost in the minds of the members of cabinet.

Senator Smith: Does the Leader of the Government concur in the view apparently expressed by Mr. Magee, the Canadian Transport Commission's rail safety commissioner, that if it takes one year to implement the report the government will be looking for a new rail safety commissioner of the CTC, which I take to mean that, in his opinion, there is no reason to wait a year?

Senator Perrault: I do not have available a copy of Mr. Magee's full text, and it would be unfair of me to pass judgment as to the validity of his remarks.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary. Would it be too much to ask the Leader of the Government to obtain the text and to give a response to my question as a delayed answer?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall be pleased to take the question as notice and will answer it in any form the honourable senator might wish. Perhaps the honourable senator could send me a copy of that statement this afternoon. That may be the fastest route.

Senator Smith: I would if I had one.

PACIFIC OCEAN—WEATHER SHIPS—AIR-SEA RESCUE

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government give us any information about the proposed withdrawal of weather ships in the Pacific, a subject which I believe was of some concern last fall to both him and those of us from the west coast? I am wondering if there have been any further developments and if he can tell us what the situation is at present.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, information is being sought at present, but I am pleased to bring to the Senate information that a 171-foot vessel will be put in service on the northwest waters off the British Columbia coast by mid-summer, to provide a greater degree of safety for those engaged in the fishing industry. Also we are going to provide a 71-foot cutter, which will be in operation by the first week in February.

We are investigating the possibility of establishing at least a helicopter rescue service on a contract basis in the Prince Rupert area, and I understand that ultimately there will be five rescue vessels on the west coast to assist in reducing the loss of life.

I know that the air-sea rescue question is not directly associated with the weather ship, but Senator Bell, who lives on Vancouver Island, is aware of the drastic weather conditions which occur there, and the need for good facilities to determine the weather which affects the safety of those who work at sea.

With regard to the technical information about the weather ship and satellite weather forecasting, that information is now being prepared and will be brought to the chamber as soon as possible.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—MANAGEMENT CONTROLS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on December 17 last, concerning management controls and interest paid on trust funds held in trust for Indian bands. The reply contains two pages of detail. I would be pleased to read it, but perhaps it could be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The first question raised by the honourable senator deals with the Auditor General's comment that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development intends to write off $17 million of $81 million loaned by the Indian Economic Development Account. In response to this question, IAND is presently developing a series of integrated financial and management controls related to the direct loan program including:

- a) a loan accounting and management information system as well as

- b) a comprehensive set of standards, criteria, guidelines, and procedures covering the full range of lending operations.

These controls will be implemented on a phased basis commencing in 1981, with a target implementation date of April 1982. Early estimates of the annual cost of such controls amount to approximately $150,000 per year.

These controls will be exercised by the Director of the Economic and Employment Development Branch and reported through the Director General of Economic and Social Development to the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Indian and Inuit Affairs Program. The effectiveness of the financial controls will be monitored by the Director of Department Accounting Operations and reported to the Senior Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance and Management. In addition, the department will conduct annual comprehensive audits on the Indian Economic Development Account.

With respect to the supplementary question raised by the honourable senator dealing with interest paid on trust funds, the response, in summary, is that the government calculates the monthly average of the market yields for Government of Canada Bond issues, with terms to maturity of 10 (ten) years or over, and then applies this figure to the average month-end balances on deposit in the Indian trust funds. The monthly average interest rate for the year ended March 31, 1980, was 10.81 per cent.

The Department of Finance provided officials of IAND with comparative figures for the rate of return given on Indian band funds as against other rates of return available through financial institutions. They pointed out that in the 1979-80 fiscal year the interest actually paid by IAND, 10.81 per cent, is less than the amount that could have been earned using average rates offered by chartered banks for 90-day term deposits of $100,000.00 or more, 12.79 per cent, but greater than would be earned by deposits in non-chequable savings accounts, 10.57 per cent.

The past year's economic situation, where one found the yields on short term investments to be greater than on long term investments, was definitely unusual and temporary in nature. In the past month the financial situation has reverted to more normal patterns—that is, long term yields are now greater than short term yields. Consequently, the present manner of calculating interest on Indian band funds will once again prove to be advantageous in terms of the rate of return earned by Indian bands as compared to the rates of return available at other financial institutions.

STATE IMMUNITY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George van Roggen moved the second reading of Bill S-19, to provide for State Immunity in Canadian Courts.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-19, to provide for State Immunity in Canadian Courts, in actuality limits, if anything, the existing level of immunity of foreign states and their agencies relative to actions brought against them in one form or another by Canadian citizens in our courts.

I shall not endeavour to go into detail, but I would first give honourable senators a thumbnail sketch of the historical background of the bill. Previously we had no such legislation in Canada; nor had most nations until comparatively recently. However, almost all the major trading and commercial nations now have such legislation in place. The United States first took action as long ago as the 1950s, not in the form of legislation but simply by making a formal arrangement whereby the Department of State would press the claims of American citizens on a formal basis. Then in 1977 the United States enacted legislation similar to this measure. In 1972 the Council of Europe arrived at a convention on this subject, and the majority of the members of the council enacted the enabling legislation to give effect to that convention. Other nations have adopted similar legislation. England embraced the convention of the Council of Europe in 1978.

• (1450)

One of the reasons Canada did not move before now in this connection is that we were following the British lead. There was a feeling of distinction in the common law countries that made them hesitate to embrace this type of legislation, arising out of the principle that the Queen can do no wrong. They did not wish to hastily violate that principle.

Following the lead of Britain in embracing the convention, Canada has now brought forward this bill. It is, I am told, closely patterned on similar legislation of the countries I have mentioned. What it does, in effect, is to preserve the immunity of foreign states to actions by Canadians against those foreign states in matters related to their normal non-commercial activities in Canada—in other words, their ordinary representation here through their embassies.

The newspapers have disclosed to us in recent months several instances where difficulty has been encountered by Canadians, either in gaining access to the courts in actions against foreign states or in enforcing judgments flowing from such actions.

Under clause 4 of this bill a Canadian citizen would not have the right to commence an action against a foreign state in our courts except under certain circumstances where that foreign state submitted itself to the jurisdiction of our courts.

In clauses 5 and 6, exceptions are provided. Clause 5 reads:

> A foreign state is not immune from the jurisdiction of a court in any proceedings that relate to any commercial activity of the foreign state.

And clause 6 reads:

> A foreign state is not immune from the jurisdiction of a court in any proceedings that relate to
> (a) any death or personal injury, or
> (b) any damage to or loss of property that occurs in Canada.

So, one may gain access to the courts if the action involves a commercial activity or those other items set out in clause 6. Having gained access to the courts, one can then pursue one's cause of action to judgment. But having gained that judgment, one still does not necessarily have the right to enforce the judgment against the foreign state, unless the foreign state, again, submits itself in certain ways. I might say, having gained that judgment, one would then be in a more effective position to request the Department of External Affairs to pursue the foreign state to secure payment of the judgment.

Jumping now to clause 10, the next most important clause, it reads:

> (1) Subject to subsection (3), no relief by way of an injunction, specific performance or the recovery of land or other property may be granted against a foreign state unless the state consents in writing to such relief and, where the state so consents, the relief granted shall not be greater than that consented to by the state.
> (2) Submission by a foreign state to the jurisdiction of a court is not consent for the purposes of subsection (1).

In other words, while the state may have consented earlier to the matter being tried in court, that consent does not mean that one can have execution against the state.

Then subclause (3) reads:

> This section does not apply to an agency of a foreign state.

Subclause (3) is the important one. Under this legislation, one can sue a foreign state without consent if it involves a commercial activity, but one cannot execute against that foreign state. In the case of an agency of a foreign state which might be involved in a commercial activity, one can sue without consent and proceed to execution. So, when one is dealing with agencies of a foreign state, one is indeed placed in a proper commercial position, just as one might be when dealing with any other entity with which one does business.

This legislation will be of great assistance, I am sure, to our courts in clarifying the situation that they are in and the situation in which Canadian citizens find themselves in dealing with foreign states and their agencies in matters of contract or otherwise. Certainly, it will alleviate some of the difficulties experienced in the past, as evidenced by instances such as that involving the Russian ship a month or two ago.

I believe I was requested to speak to this bill because of its foreign affairs nature. However, on reading the bill and the material provided to me by the department, I am of the opinion that the bill is of a wholly legal nature. There are several aspects to it that I have not dealt with but which should be examined in committee, such as the definition of a commercial activity and things of that sort. For that reason, I would suggest that, once the debate on the motion for second reading is concluded, the bill be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask my honourable friend a question on this bill. The impact of it is not quite clear to me from what he has said.

The sponsor has told us that the commercial activities of a foreign state are activities which may be attacked in the Canadian courts by a Canadian who wants to deal with the matter. Is that the situation?

Senator van Roggen: I do not know that I used the word "attacked". I do not think one attacks a foreign state, or its agency, for conducting commercial activities in Canada. If there were a breach of contract in the course of a commercial activity—for instance, if a foreign state did not pay its bills—then one would have a right of action against that state.

Senator Roblin: Not being a lawyer, I undoubtedly used the wrong term. "Right of action" is the term I probably should have used. So, a Canadian citizen can have a right of action against a foreign state. Thinking particularly of those foreign states which operate what are euphemistically called centrally operated economies—socialist or communist states which conduct the whole economic life of the nation—while we are told that we have a right of action against such states, we have no right to compensation. The right to compensation is limited to agencies of a foreign state.

What analysis has the department given you as to the character of commercial relations between Canada and the Soviet Union in respect of that which is conducted by an agency of the state and that which is conducted by the state itself?

Senator van Roggen: In keeping with international precedent and convention, sovereign states are still immune from the enforcement of judgments against them in this or other countries. This has been the historic tradition, and continues to be under this legislation. It is in keeping with the legislation of other countries of a similar nature. Where the law has been advanced by this type of legislation, and by the convention developed by the Council of Europe, is in the area of recognition of the fact that the historic activities of foreign states within the borders of other states is no longer confined to the operations of their embassy and ambassador in diplomatic matters, and so on; but the centrally controlled economies that you refer to, and the general development of commercial activity controlled by state agencies and corporations, has been so extensive in recent years that some redress must be provided for people doing business with them.

● (1500)

The degree to which the international community has moved forward in this respect is indicated by the fact that, if it is a commercial activity that is involved, you may sue the foreign state and have access to the courts. Before, a court could not hear you. Having obtained your judgment, however, you cannot then execute it. If, on the other hand, the business is being done, if I may use the term "business," by an agency of that foreign state—the Russian airline Aeroflot, I suppose, might be cited as an example—then you may not only proceed through our courts to judgment but you can execute that judgment against the assets of that agency of the foreign state.

Senator Roblin: If I may be allowed to ask a supplementary question, I dare say, in due course, someone will be able to explain to us what the rules are for recognizing agencies, as opposed to the government or the foreign state itself. Does "an agency" refer to any commercial activity, as opposed to a diplomatic activity that might be conducted by the state itself?

Senator van Roggen: I am referring to an agency as a legal entity, and not the nature of that activity. I am sorry if I have not been more explicit. If it is a commercial activity that is in question, whether that commercial activity is conducted by the state or by an agency of the state, you may go to the court relative to it. If it is a commercial activity conducted by the state, you may not, however, execute that judgment against that state. I use the word "execute" in the legal sense of executing a judgment. If the activity involved is a commercial one, with regard to which you have gained a judgment involving an agency of the state, then you may execute your judgment. Is that clear?

Senator Roblin: I follow my friend very well indeed. I suppose my problem is that this seems to be a very peculiar distinction to me. You get commercial activity, and that is what really gives rise to the problems; and yet, by some form of words, in one case, because it is an agency—and, surely, an agency of a centrally planned economy is the same as the state itself, or, if not, what is the difference?—you can sue the one and not the other; but I appreciate the fact that I have no right to continue this discussion in this form, so I will leave the matter there.

Senator van Roggen: I think I can give you a rather short example, and the courts, mind you, would have to pass judgment on this kind of thing, because I am not giving a legal judgment.

If a state awards a contract to build its embassy, that might be construed as a commercial activity; but as it is an activity of the state, and not of an agency of the state, you cannot obtain execution of your judgment.

Senator Roblin: So if they will not pay you, you cannot collect.

Senator van Roggen: That is correct.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, does this immunity of a foreign state apply to any entity which calls itself a foreign state, whether or not it has enacted similar legislation?

Senator van Roggen: I have difficulty following the question, Senator Grosart. You say "any entity which calls itself a foreign state." Are you referring to organizations such as the PLO, or some such entity?

Senator Grosart: I am simply asking a question; I am not referring to anything. If any body comes here and says, "We believe we are a foreign state," though it is not the essence of the question, is this a reciprocal arrangement, or can any body, regardless of whether they extend the same privilege to us—and it is a privilege—be covered by this?

Senator van Roggen: This is not reciprocal legislation, but the fact of the matter is that this legislation limits the immunity of a foreign state, rather than extending it, so there would be no point, under those circumstances, in its being reciprocal.

Senator Roblin: Could that fellow collect on the Russian ship?

Senator Grosart: May I suggest that it does establish this right, whether the honourable senator or anybody else says that this is a convention of international law. The fact of the matter is that this is the first legislation of this kind and it is establishing this immunity. It is here. It is an act of Parliament that says there is this immunity. Therefore it is establishing that immunity in an act of Parliament. That is the intention.

Now, what I am asking is, are we going to insist that anybody who is going to qualify for this immunity will give us the same privilege in the same manner? It is all very well to argue that this is a convention and that this has always gone on in international law, but that is a nonsensical argument, as anyone who knows anything about international law will agree.

I am merely asking if this is reciprocal, or whether we are again merely being boy scouts, as we have been in so many instances in the past in matters of international law.

Senator van Roggen: With the greatest respect, Senator Grosart, I say that the state of the law at the moment, without legislation such as this, is that you cannot sue, as a Canadian citizen, a foreign state in Canada. In certain circumstances you can get before the courts, and I think the committee should go into this in more detail; but the point is that at the moment a foreign state has immunity, even though there is no legislation on the subject. As it has that immunity now, by international convention, which has gone on for centuries, this statute will define and limit that immunity.

Senator Grosart: To make my question clearer, the honourable senator now says that there is existing immunity. Will he tell us under what authority it exists? I am sure he will agree with me that it is well established in our law, though not in United States law, that even an international treaty does not place an obligation on our courts. Perhaps there is a good answer to my question, and I am not saying that there is not; but what is the basis of the statement that this immunity now exists?

Senator van Roggen: I am not competent, Senator Grosart, to give you a professorial dissertation on the origin of the conventions that exist between nations whereby they extend immunity to foreign diplomats operating within their borders; but, to the best of my knowledge—and your leader can correct me if I am completely wrong on this—that is the state of international convention and the common law at the moment. You shake your head, but I am simply saying that that is the case. You can question that in committee, if you wish. This act will define, and indeed limit, the present state of immunity of a foreign state.

Senator Grosart: On another matter, just of definition, does the phrase "commercial activity" include financial activity and fiduciary activity? In ordinary business we make a distinction between commercial activity and financial activity. Is there a definition, perhaps in the courts, or some place, that would extend this definition of "commercial activity" to all activity involving trade, as well as commerce, securities, and that very large field which goes entirely beyond the normal definition, unless there is a legal one, of commercial activity?

• (1510)

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, while there is some reference in the act—I cannot put my finger on it at this moment—to the seizure of the assets of foreign banks, and to some of their assets being immune and other assets not being immune, my impression from reading this rather short bill is that, in effect, the question of the definition of "commercial activity" is left to the courts. It is not defined too explicitly in the act.

Senator Roblin: It is in the definition section.

Senator Grosart: My deputy leader says it is in the definition section, and that is what worried me, because the definition section is about as vague as it could be. It says:

> 'commercial activity' means any particular transaction, act or conduct or any regular course of conduct that by reason of its nature is of a commercial character.

Senator Roblin: What is commercial is commercial.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think this is the general idea.

Senator van Roggen: The bill does not endeavour to define it specifically, but simply leaves it to the courts. It is dangerous to start developing hypothetical examples. You might easily have a government-to-government trade agreement on wheat which would be between two states, and then at some later date part of that wheat gets assigned to a government agency, and a transaction might slip from being a non-commercial transaction to being a commercial transaction. That would be up to the court to decide in the individual case before it.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I intend to move the adjournment of the debate, but before doing so perhaps I should mention for the information of the sponsor and Senator Grosart that clause 14 provides an answer to the question of reciprocity. The Governor in Council may restrict the immunity.

My question to the sponsor is: Have any recent events provoked the introduction of this bill?

First of all, I remember a judgment of the Supreme Court in favour of someone who had done some printing for the U.S.S.R in respect of Expo in Montreal. The person in question was able to obtain a judgment against the state. That would be, I would say, in the realm of commercial activity. Otherwise, I do not remember any other events or circumstances that would justify bringing this legislation forward at this time, except that which the sponsor said about the adoption of the legislation following the recommendation of the Council of Europe.

The second point is that, of course, we know the problem is dealt with in the jurisprudence of our courts. The Supreme Court has already underlined where the normal limit of the immunity is. To give an example, a warship coming into our waters would be immune because it would be a foreign state, whereas a commercial ship bringing in grain or other merchandise would be engaged in commercial activity and thus subject to seizure, and the immunity would not apply. Are we merely codifying the present state of our law, or are we going further? If the sponsor can give me some indication in this respect, I would appreciate it.

Senator van Roggen: I am not really competent to give you a legal opinion on that point. My briefing notes refer to three or four recent cases. There are the cases of Corriveau vs. Cuba and Edwards vs. U.S.S.R.—which I think is the case you just referred to—and a case involving the Saudi Arabian embassy and the difficulty a contractor had in getting paid.

As I read my briefing notes, the state of the law in Canada, as developed by our courts, leaves a good deal of uncertainty, and while definitions of commercial activity, and so on, will still leave some level of uncertainty to be settled by the courts, this measure, at least, establishes a framework comparable to that established by other nations in which the courts and individual litigants can operate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:
> That the subject matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could have leave, in the absence of Senator Frith, to resume this debate today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I am very pleased that Senator Murray has moved that the subject matter of Senator Argue's inquiry respecting our national energy policy be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The reason I say this is that since 1975 some of us have been anxious to do this very thing, if not reconstitute the former Natural Resources Committee, because energy appeared to be a very important subject that Parliament had to deal with. On August 5, 1977—and I am quoting myself, which is a terrible thing to do—I said:

> Honourable senators, perhaps the time has come when we should consider reconstituting the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

There seemed to be quite a lot of support for this.

In 1978 the same thought was expressed, and in 1979 Senator Olson was very anxious to have a standing committee on energy established. I think there was a great deal of support for that. At the same time I was hoping the committee's terms of reference would be broadened to include natural resources, but energy was the key during the autumn of 1979.

Then followed an election and the government changed, so nothing was accomplished on that particular front. That did not mean that the problem of an energy policy for Canada disappeared. Senator Hayden, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, was very interested in the proposal in the fall of 1979, but at that particular time, as you recall, his committee was inundated with work. It had a very heavy legislative work load in the way of the Bank Act and many taxing—and I intend no pun—measures. That committee had a lot of hard work before it, and could not take on another study at that time.

A bit of background should be put in place here. Many people would say that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee really does not have much expertise in energy or even natural resources, because they are matters not strictly within banking, trade or commerce. However, one has to realize that Senator Hayden has always maintained his interest in natural resources, having helped when the Senate revamped all its committees in 1945 and 1946 and established the Standing Committee on Natural Resources. If I recall correctly the proceedings I read some time ago, Senator Hayden was responsible for thorough Senate investigation of the gold mining industry which, of course, had to be let go during the war.

Later on in 1947—I cannot remember the names, and, unfortunately, I do not have my notes with me—there was a study by the Standing Committee on Natural Resources of the newly-discovered high quality deposits of potash in Saskatchewan, which was desperately needed for the development of a fertilizer industry.

● (1520)

All these are things the Senate has done well in the past. I feel we are allowing to slide past us an opportunity to provide an excellent service to our country. I feel strongly that it is the Senate, and only the Senate, that can put together a body of specialized knowledge, make a reasonable assessment of it, and render an informed judgment. This will give the people of the country and the industries involved a feeling of assurance that in the Parliament of Canada there is a well informed body that understands their problems. They will feel that they can refer to our committee and receive our recommendations.

I was very interested in Senator Frith's contribution to the debate on the inquiry initiated by Senator Argue, when he said, I take it, that in due course we will have the opportunity to consider particular pieces of legislation arising out of the National Energy Program, and through this inquiry we have had a chance to take a preliminary run at the national energy policy. We have made a step in the right direction. Now let us proceed and build up this body of knowledge. Of course, it cannot be done overnight, and I feel rather strongly that we cannot do it on a piecemeal basis. One of the strengths of the Senate is its capacity to maintain a continuing interest in special studies, proposed legislation and the progress of government policy. A task force cannot do this; a royal commission cannot do this: we can do this if we build up sufficient background knowledge.

The other thing that I think we should consider in all this is the danger arising from the dispute between the provincial governments and the federal government with regard to taxation policies killing the industry. This is not only going on now, but it was also, if you remember, in 1973. I have just found a quote from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who said:

> Obviously, policies developed in isolation in Ottawa hold scant hope for success.

Here in this chamber, and probably only in this chamber, can we bring the policies and the needs and understanding of resource development of our regions together and give them an assessment that is free from partisan political distortions. I feel that we can be objective in our committees here. I am sure that we have proved that in the past, and that we can continue to do so in the future.

For these reasons, I would like my colleagues to support Senator Murray's motion and see if we can take the first step towards the development of a natural resources committee. It might be a subcommittee, which Senator Hayden thought would work very well, which would later develop into a natural resources committee, which we need.

On motion of Senator McElman, for Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 27, at 8 p.m.

ITALY

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—CANADIAN AID—NATIONAL CO-ORDINATING COMMITTEE—VISIT OF SPEAKER TO DEVASTATED AREA

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I just returned from Rome at 6 o'clock this evening, and I am pleased to give you the best regards of the President of Italy, Signor Pertini.

[English]

I would also communicate greetings from Signor Fanfani who, as you know, was Prime Minister of Italy on three or four occasions. He was later promoted to President of the Italian Senate.

As far as the details of my trip are concerned, I hope to have an opportunity to discuss them with you later since I do not intend to take up your time this evening.

[Later:]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On behalf of all honourable senators, I welcome the return to the chamber of His Honour the Speaker from a visit to the earthquake ravaged zone of Italy. We commend him for the initiative he and his committee have shown in trying to bring some relief and succour to those people so badly affected by the earthquake.

● (2010)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to join with the Leader of the Government in welcoming His Honour the Speaker back to the Chair. It was a very quick visit indeed, and I expect that there is a certain amount of jet lag to be accounted for.

I look forward to hearing His Honour's report on the earthquake situation. I am sure it will be a matter of some real interest to all honourable senators.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of messages, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1981

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-56, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other acts subsequent to 1970.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Notices of Ways and Means Motions to amend the Excise Tax Act (1) and the Excise Tax Act (2), issued by the Department of Finance.

Report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada for the year ended May 31, 1980, pursuant to section 18 of the Law Reform Commission Act, Chapter 23 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Tuesday, January 27, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to which was referred Bill S-15, intituled "An Act respecting The Royal Canadian Legion", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, December 16, 1980, examined the said Bill and reports the same with the following amendment:

Page 4, Schedule II: Strike out the description in Column II and substitute the following:

"The petals are red and the centre portion is green."

Respectfully submitted,

M. Lorne Bonnell,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Bonnell moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

OIL—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS—ALLEGED STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development, who I see has been making speeches on the oil situation. I have particular reference to his comments before la Chambre de Commerce de Québec with respect to the oil situation. In his address he is alleged to have told the meeting that Ottawa and Alberta are "not really all that far apart."

I presume he was referring to the present dispute between the Government of Alberta and the federal government in connection with oil, and I am wondering what the basis is for the statement that he made to la Chambre de Commerce de Québec.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what is happening at the moment, as my honourable friend knows and as has been announced, is that the respective ministers are trying to reconcile the figures leading to a conclusion as to the economic benefit or the revenue.

My friend will recall that the price of conventional oil did go up by $2 a barrel under the National Energy Program. In addition to that, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has already indicated that if another $1, or perhaps $1.50 per barrel, would result in an agreement, then he would be prepared to negotiate. That is public information. He has said it on the floor of the house.

On the other side of the question we have the Province of Alberta telling us—and, indeed, honourable members opposite—that they would accept $4 for 1980 and a $4.50 annual increase in 1981 and 1982. If that is so, there are some aspects of it concerning which the two sides are not all that far apart.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I sincerely hope that my honourable friend and his colleagues will be able to come to some meeting of minds with the Government of Alberta, because it is very much in the public interest that they should do so.

Senator Olson: I do, too.

Senator Roblin: He tells us that there has been some movement on the part of the federal government in the area of pricing. Can he tell us whether there has been a change in the federal government's attitude with respect to two other important matters under negotiation, or, at least, on the table—I do not think that any negotiations have yet begun—with respect to the two administrations, one having to do with the tax regime, which has certain drawbacks that we brought to the minister's notice, and the other having to do with the exploration incentives, particularly in provincial areas where the conventional oil goal is being sought?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure of the significance of the words "particularly in provincial areas where the conventional oil goal is being sought".

There is a higher level of incentives offered in the frontier areas, or what are sometimes referred to as Canada Lands, which would be offshore east coast or offshore anywhere around Canada, plus those areas in the high north where costs are very much higher. That is where we get to the 80 per cent offer, and I guess it is about 35 per cent in the Provincial Lands that you are referring to, but, certainly, the difference arises largely because of the actual difference in costs.

● (2015)

Senator Roblin: As my honourable friend knows, the small Canadian oil producers have not been at all satisfied with respect to the federal regime for incentives, depreciation, depletion, and that sort of thing in the Provincial Lands as opposed to the Canada Lands. That was one reference that I had in mind.

The other reference that I had in mind related to the 8 per cent tax now to be levied at the wellhead, which, because it is not tax deductible, in effect it is claimed, represents a 22 per cent tax on the after-tax situation. Perhaps other circumstances should be included, but one of the major fall-outs of that tax regime has been the prejudice that it has brought to the current small wells that are producing in the whole of that area.

I am asking the minister whether any change in the tax regime has been contemplated to relieve the pressure on these small wells which, we are told, will be closed down under the present circumstances.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think any basic change is being contemplated. The regulations have not all been written yet, and that is one thing we are seeking advice on, as to the practical effect that it will have, when we write those regulations, as to whether or not there could be some differentiation in some of the wells in the areas where the production is so small that the 8 per cent makes a significant economic difference. I would not want to mislead my honourable friend by saying that any major changes in the 8 per cent tax are being contemplated.

Insofar as the other part of the question is concerned, whether some of the smaller or, indeed, any of the Canadian companies would be worse off under the new program than they were under the previous regime, which included earned depletion allowances and other things, I am not at liberty to make the figures known because they were provided on a confidential basis to some of our people who did the calculations on them. I can tell my honourable friend, regarding a number of individual companies, that, whatever was involved under the old regime, if the high level of Canadian ownership requirements is met, they are in fact better off under the new policy, even in the Provincial Lands.

Senator Roblin: I would not ask my honourable friend to disclose any confidential information, but he did mention a point that I would like to refer to, namely, the problem of reconciling the figures, not only between the governments but between government and the industry. They are simply so far at variance that it becomes essential, in my opinion, that this matter be clarified and treated as an urgent task. If my honourable friend is doing that, I think that is a good move, and I hope he will be able to report to us on a non-confidential basis what the agreed facts are with respect to the impact of this policy, because they are so far apart at the present time that they do not seem to be talking the same language.

Senator Olson: In some respects that, of course, was the initial reaction. That is often the case when people do not understand or have not had an opportunity to explain in detail.

I should also tell my honourable friend that at the outset of the program I did ask for some technical advice from the industry in Alberta, and there is a committee in Calgary made up of some senior officers who are knowledgeable on tax law and preparing exploration and development budgets for oil companies. I think there are about 12 senior officers and vice-presidents who are technically knowledgeable in these areas, and they have provided us with some excellent advice. We have made some amendments in line with the advice they have given, which is what we indicated we would do at the outset. That is where it is coming through, but I cannot give an undertaking as to when the reconciliation will be done of what goes into the numbers. I am not suggesting that everyone, after they understand the program, will agree more than they do now, but I believe there is now much better rapport in trying to reconcile those numbers than there was before. Perhaps some of the difficulty arose because the opposition led them to believe that it was a much worse program than it really was when they began looking at it.

● (2020)

Senator Roblin: I had intended to stop my questioning, but my honourable friend really invites me to reply to his last sentence. If my honourable friend will take the trouble to collect his clippings, which I know he has, that cover the statements of every factor of the oil industry in Canada, and of many quite broadminded and impartial observers of the scene, he will find that it is not what the opposition is saying, but what the industry is saying about the government's policy.

I invite my honourable friend to consider, for example, the speech delivered in Montreal by the gentleman who controls Husky Oil, if he wants some amplification of the impact of his policies on the small wells and the heavy oil industry in Saskatchewan and Alberta. I refer to Mr. Robert Blair. My honourable friend will then know exactly the sort of thing I am talking about.

I suggest it is not the opposition that is crying, "Wolf"; it is really a concern that is widely spread throughout the industry, and it is the government's responsibility to answer that concern.

Senator Olson: Yes, and the government is answering that concern. I would not like my honourable friend to take great offence. I did not think it was a major matter. I thought that perhaps it was prompted a little by the opposition, and despite his explanation I am still of that opinion.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In the comprehensive and enlightening exchange between the minister and the honourable senator to the effect that the Governments of Canada and Alberta are now not too far apart in the discussions on their differences, the closeness of their positions, which has not yet been finalized, would appear to lend some credence to allegations of lack of tact perhaps, or lack of diplomatic skills, on the part of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In view of the fact that my honourable friend has displayed such an abundance of those admirable qualities in the Senate—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: —and has caused us to be grateful for the amount of information he provides, and in view of his tact and candour and the manner in which he presents the government's position—and, of course, in view of the tremendous reputation that the honourable minister has in his native province, as attested to by the crowds of grateful constituents who line up outside his airport office—I wonder, in view of all those self-evident facts, if the minister has volunteered his services as a mediator in this dispute between the Governments of Canada and Alberta. I am sure that many Canadians would breathe a great sigh of relief if the minister would take up these delicate negotiations on behalf of the Government of Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, no, I have not offered my services, but obviously I have a great deal of interest in the matter, being the only minister in the cabinet from Alberta, the major producer. I do not need to go into any great detail about my interest in the matter, but I can tell the honourable senator that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources put forward a program and was instrumental in bringing that program to the Parliament of Canada and implementing it across the country. It will come as no surprise to my honourable friend that that energy program is an accurate reflection, at least, of the principles involved—which is as far as one can go—in what this party carried to the Canadian electorate when it was elected to office. We respect that, and that is the basis on which we have introduced programs following the election. My honourable friend may wish to try to get me involved in this type of controversy, and I appreciate that he is trying to do that but I do not think he will be very successful, because the government knew—both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources knew—that there would be some difficulties because of the changes. There are always difficulties when things as important as the national energy policy and tax law, and all the matters involved, are changed. I suggest to my honourable friend that the more detailed the analysis of that, then the higher its acceptability, particularly to the Canadian companies.

There is just one other thing on which I want to correct my friend. He was listening rather intently.

What I said in Montreal—and if it is not in the paper, it is not a direct quote—was that they may not be all that far apart. Then I explained where the numbers were going to be. I would not like the honourable senator to start playing around with those words, so that it gets to be a positive statement that they are not all that far apart because that is what has been changed here in the last three or four minutes. That would then become a misinterpretation of what I said in Montreal.

Senator Roblin: There is no "may" in the quotation.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators will now realize the significance of my earlier question to the minister. The very tactful and diplomatic way in which he expressed himself in his answer was so dramatically different from that of his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

It is not a question of the government's policy being presented to the electorate in the last election. I would suggest that the language used in presenting it to the electorate was somewhat more delicately phrased, perhaps, than the language of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. However, be that as it may.

MOBIL OIL CANADA, LTD.—ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXPENDITURE CUTBACKS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have another question. Mobil Oil has announced a major cutback amounting to $164 million in its program for the coming year, 1981, which is almost half of its pre-budget projected outlay. I wonder if the minister could indicate to the Senate how many jobs will be lost, both in terms of the actual drilling or exploration program, and in the immediate supply and services program in that particular cutback.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators, my friend is an expert at what he is doing. He wants me to give him a specific answer to something concerning an alleged cutback from some intention. Now, what is the intention? Where were the jobs? How much is the indicated cutback?

You know, I really do not have very much time to do calculations on that kind of elusive basis, because you cannot come out with the right kind of numbers anyway. I suppose if I did I would be accused of playing games with numbers. Usually when I give numbers and do calculations it is on a much harder basis than that of an intended cutback from some previous intention. I do not know what that is.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am almost tempted to ask, "What did he say; what did he say?", but I do not think that would be very parliamentary.

The original program announced by Mobil, as I understand it, was somewhere in the nature of $359 million. That was the projected outlay from capital funds for 1981. They now say that they are going to cut back to $195 million. There is not very much playing around with words in that particular situation. It comes down from $359 million to $195 million.

What I am asking is: How many jobs will be lost in that process? A lot of this money would have been spent on the east coast offshore program. There are a lot of people in that area of under-employment in Canada who were looking forward to getting employment from that program during the coming year. That is the substance of my question. I am not playing with words. I am trying to find out how many people can be expected to have their hopes diminished or smashed this year because the program has been cut back.

Senator Olson: I can tell my honourable friend that I have the same problem. He says he is tempted to ask, "What did he say; what did he say?" but I keep wondering to myself, "What did he ask; what did he ask?" when he puts these questions about these elusive numbers. Now he says it is $300-odd million that is being cut to $195 million, but then he throws the statement that some of that money might have been spent on the east coast of Canada.

I think Mobil is an active player off the east coast of Canada, and if they are cutting back there, because of the energy program, I should remind the honourable senator that the replacement of incentive, especially to Canadian oil companies, is higher in that kind of frontier area than it is anywhere else. Of course, there will be some advantage to Canadian-owned companies doing exploration in the same area. My friend should not be surprised about that, because that was, as stated, a very positive and deliberate part of the energy program.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL TO JAPAN

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could put a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I would ask him if he would report to us concerning the sale of coal from the northeast of British Columbia to Japan, about which we have been reading in the papers.

● (2030)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there have been a lot of news stories around in the last few days. My honourable friend, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, made what I think was a comprehensive report on what has happened to date. There are some hard numbers on the tonnages, prices and dates involved, which, in my view, will come together, perhaps by the end of this week. I am not entirely sure that we can give a precise report to the Senate on it, because the Honourable Senator Perrault and I have been deeply involved in these negotiations since last May. We are gratified that we have now reached a position where a contract between several coal companies and the Japanese steel industry has been initialled. This is by far the largest coal deal in Canadian history. There is every indication that this contract will be highly beneficial economically, and will require very little subsidy, even in the initial stages. Therefore, I think it is one of the better deals that Canada has made in a long time. It is certainly one of the largest, about $10 million worth of coal in total. The Senate would probably like to have a report on that, but I would hope that I could wait for another day or two so that I would have more precise figures available to incorporate in the statement I would make to the Senate.

Senator Grosart: Did I understand the honourable senator to say that the report would be made initially in the Senate?

Senator Olson: It will be made initially in the Senate by me.

THE ECONOMY

JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development, following my question of last Tuesday night concerning his visit, this week, to the province of Quebec and his talks with Minister Landry about the economic evolution of the province of Quebec.

Could the minister give us a report on that meeting and will the discussions he held with the Quebec minister really result in some programs being carried out in that province through the federal government?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators, I can give you a brief report now, and perhaps a more detailed one later. It is a fact that Mr. Ouellet, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I had a meeting last Thursday in Montreal with Mr. Landry. It was, in my view, a very useful meeting, primarily an exchange of views on the eight constraints we have identified in the economic development of Canada over the next four of five years. We wanted also to have the views of the Government of Quebec with respect to such identification, and its agreement that these were indeed the constraints to which we should address a higher level of both funds and attention.

It was indicated to me by Mr. Landry that they, too, had identified some of these constraints and that they will perhaps give some consideration to changing the priorities regarding both time and funding, to meet the problems of those constraints. We tentatively agreed to have another meeting within three or four weeks, to give them an opportunity to look at them in more detail. Therefore, there will perhaps be another meeting.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: I thank the minister for his answer. More specifically, did you actually discuss the development of Montreal, the economic pole and now the entire economic support of the province of Quebec, since the Montreal economy has been declining in recent years?

Is there any agreement on new developments in Montreal?

[English]

Senator Olson: Only in a general way. I say that because it is not part of my activities to get into the details of such things as the Minister of Transport would be involved in with the National Harbours Board, for example, or as the minister responsible for DREE would be involved in in a number of activities there, or even as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would be involved in in certain activities going on in Montreal. Really, it was macro-economic policies we were discussing, but not in total either, because there were some constraints, such as the supply of critical skills, the use of funding for research and technology, and matters like that, that we addressed.

● (2035)

Those, of course, are primarily the responsibility of Mr. Landry as well, because, while he does not address or administer any specific programs, neither does my department. They do have some co-ordinating activity to do, however. So the discussions were of a more general nature than having specifically to do with the city of Montreal or the port or harbour area there.

Hon. Lowell Murray: If I may ask a supplementary of the Minister of State for Economic Development, did he take the occasion to consult the Quebec minister on which industries or communities in Quebec might apply under the $350 million adjustment program announced by his government a couple of weeks ago?

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, not in specific terms.

Senator Murray: Is it the intention of the government to consult the provincial ministers on this matter, which I am sure he will agree comes at least partly under their jurisdiction?

Senator Olson: It is the intention of the government to have the appropriate ministers—namely, the Honourable Herb Gray and the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy—administer this program.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION LICENCES—PROVINCIAL REVENUES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development to cast his mind back to some questions I asked him on December 16 last, which will be found on pages 1454 and 1455 of Senate Hansard of that date? My questions then concerned the probable expectation of revenues from the auctioning of licences and leases for gas and oil in the western provinces, particularly his own province of Alberta and in the province of British Columbia.

Is the minister now prepared to give the Senate some of the information which he then undertook to obtain?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will look into that and I will certainly come prepared tomorrow with whatever information we have gathered so far. Frankly, I thought we had answered almost all of the questions that I took as notice, but if there are some unanswered questions, we will check those out specifically.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman. Is he aware of the results of auctions of such licences and leases in the Province of Alberta in the month of January, 1981? Can he tell us what revenue they produced and how that revenue compared with the revenue generated in a similar period for the year 1980?

Senator Olson: I am not immediately aware of that, although I believe I read in a press report that the total amount was down somewhat from the previous year. Of course, sometimes press reports are accurate and sometimes they are not. There may well be all kinds of reasons related to that, apart from the one I suppose my honourable friend will think is central.

Senator Smith: Just so there will be no doubt about what I think is central to there having been an adverse effect, if there was one upon the revenue from such sales, obviously, it has to do with the national energy policy and its effect. The honourable gentleman may recall, or at least he will easily be able to refresh his memory, that that was the subject of some comments by both himself and myself on the occasion last December to which I have referred.

Senator Olson: Yes, I recall that.

EDUCATION

REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, my question, which I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, has to do with student loans and their collection. In view of the fact that many students from all over Canada are making regular payments on their student loans, even though in the past they may have delayed a little, why is it that collection agencies, such as Financial Collection Agencies Limited here in Ottawa, are harassing students who are presently employed in government and in other areas, to the point where they are calling them at work and at home, asking for renewed financial reviews and for more money than they can pay?

• (2040)

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Senator Riley: Why is this occurring, especially since many of these students are married and have families and are making an honest effort to pay back their loans on a regular basis? Why would the government department responsible engage collection agencies such as finance companies and others to harass these students?

Senator Donahoe: No heart.

Senator Doody: Callous.

Senator Riley: As a supplementary, I should like to know what commission is being paid to these financial collection agencies. Is it 80 per cent; is it 70 per cent; or is it as "low" as 60 per cent?

Senator Donahoe: Not likely.

Senator Riley: I want to know who engages these companies and what commissions are paid. Is the minister aware of these tactics?

Someone suggested that this subject should be placed on the order paper for consideration, but that will not help those students who, tomorrow afternoon, may be receiving harassing telephone calls from some of these uneducated employees of collection agencies who are taught to call and harass. This is a matter of urgent necessity, and I am not going to wait for weeks or months for an answer; I want an early answer.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Riley: I attended a small college when it didn't cost very much, and I paid my own way.

I also want to know who Mr. McMillan is. He is either employed by a financial collection agency in Ottawa or he is making long-distance telephone calls to harass government employees in Ottawa.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it should be said at the outset that Senator Riley appears to have collected a great deal of information. I would very much appreciate it if he would provide me with that file. If he has the names of specific individuals who believe they have been harassed or badly treated, I would appreciate it if the honourable senator would provide me with that information.

I am prepared to contact the Minister of National Revenue. Perhaps he has some knowledge of collection practices, if, indeed, some level of government has ordered them to be put in place.

Honourable senators, Senator Riley's information will be communicated to the appropriate authorities, and an explanation will be sought.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, rather than give the Leader of the Government a list of names, I will give him the name of an individual who has actually been harassed in his place of employment by an individual named McMillan who is employed by Financial Collection Agencies Limited.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, any allegations of that kind from the honourable senator, or other senators, would be of interest. The allegations are such that they should be brought to the attention of the appropriate authorities as quickly as possible.

Senator Riley: I should like to supplement my question by asking the Leader of the Government why the Minister of National Revenue or some of his bureaucrats employ these collection agencies, whether they are called "financial collection agencies" or not.

An Hon. Senator: Bloodsuckers.

Senator Riley: What commissions are being paid? This is most important.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, as a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government, would he also find out who administers student loans? Is it the provincial governments or the federal government?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will obtain as much information as I can. I understand, however, that this is a co-operative program involving provincial departments of education in conjunction with the federal government. I do not want to hazard opinions beyond that point, as I am not an expert in this particular loans field.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA—TRANSPORTATION OF OIL BY SUPERTANKER—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government having regard to newspaper accounts in the last number of days concerning tanker testing in the Strait of Juan de Fuca. Would the Leader of the Government confirm to this chamber if it is still government policy to oppose the shipment of oil by tankers through the strait?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the shipment of oil by huge supertankers on the west coast of Canada, on the east coast of Canada and, certainly, in the Arctic waters, is a matter of real concern to all Canadians. We are concerned that the oil should be shipped in tankers which are safe, seaworthy and provide maximum protection for the Canadian coastline.

The U.S. Coast Guard is conducting trials at the present time in the U.S. waters of the Strait of Juan de Fuca with a supertanker loaded with sea water to determine the ability of tugs to control a supertanker which has lost steerage and/or power. In other words, this test is designed to determine what could happen if all power and steering capacity were lost, which, I suppose, may be described as a maximum disaster "scenario".

Greenpeace has announced plans to confront the tanker. Indeed, some of those plans went ahead during the weekend.

There is widespread feeling in British Columbia that the test is the first step towards the use of larger tankers in the area.

[Senator Riley.]

My colleagues, Mr. Roberts and Mr. MacGuigan, were questioned on this matter in the house on December 15. The information we have thus far is that some two years ago the U.S. Secretary of Transportation issued a regulation limiting tanker size in Juan de Fuca to 125,000 DWT for a two-year period. The regulation called for tests and studies at the end of the period to determine whether the limitation should be continued. This test is thus being conducted in accordance with the terms of the original limitation which will expire shortly. It is being conducted entirely in U.S. waters and represents no danger to the environment—at least, this is the information we have received. Officials of the federal government at the regional level, and some officials of the British Columbia government were advised informally of this test in November. Federal and, we understand, British Columbia officials will observe this test and will follow the results closely.

The Canadian government continues to be deeply concerned about the risk presented to the marine environment by tanker traffic off Canada's west coast. We also continue to be deeply concerned about the east coast and the Arctic, as I stated earlier. We are determined to minimize the supertanker risk as far as possible. We have made this position clear to U.S. officials on a number of occasions, and we will continue to do so.

Senator Nurgitz: I appreciate the concern expressed by the Leader of the Government, but can he tell us whether any opposition would be expressed? Could the Leader of the Government confirm that it is the position of the Government of Canada, and that it will state to the Government of the United States, that it is in opposition to the shipping of oil by tanker through the strait? That, I believe, is the critical question.

Senator Perrault: Canada has never been backward in presenting the case for the protection of Canada's coastlines and waters, east, west or north. This test is being conducted in U.S. waters, but as you know, the strait is very narrow and a disaster in that area involving a supertanker would cause serious damage to Canadian shores as well as U.S. shores.

The tests are being watched very closely by Canadian officials. I may say, as well, honourable senators, that the new administration in the United States has indicated a great desire to meet as soon as possible with its Canadian counterparts.

• (2050)

The President of the United States had a productive conversation with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister last week regarding a possible early meeting involving these two national leaders.

The question of tanker traffic is, perhaps, one which should be placed on any agenda for such a meeting. A number of questions, of course, in several areas remain outstanding between Canada and the United States.

Certainly President Reagan has been most forthcoming in his first few days in office. As you know, before his inauguration he sought a meeting with the Prime Minister. I believe it was on Inauguration Day, or shortly thereafter, that he telephoned the Prime Minister and had a long conversation with him.

So, perhaps at one of the forthcoming meetings between officials of the new administration and Canadian officials, the question of tanker shipments along our coast could be placed on the agenda.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. It concerns reports widely disseminated today with reference to the Canadian government's proposed re-establishment of diplomatic relations with Iran. The reports to which I advert concern the suggestion and, indeed, I understand, the demand by the government in Tehran that, as a part of their acceptance of our diplomatic presence in their country, Canada be asked to repudiate the sort of activities the world saluted under Ambassador Kenneth Taylor, ably led by that strong, brilliant and courageous minister, Flora MacDonald, with the support of all the members of the Canadian mission, namely, the successful release of six of the American victims.

Could the leader indicate what is the Canadian government's response to this suggestion and demand by the Iranian government, recognizing, of course, that the receiving government does, under international law, have certain rights in this matter, even though that particular country seems to be well out of the bounds of international law? Can he indicate what Canada is proposing to do? It would appear that the minister—and all of us do make mistakes—might have erred a few days ago when he suggested that we would rather precipitously return to normalcy.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there have been a number of reports which suggest that the government is hell-bent to re-open the embassy in Tehran. Such is not the case and has never been the case. In fact, the Secretary of State for External Affairs may have been misunderstood in some of the statements he has made.

In anticipating the possibility of a question arising in the Senate this evening on the subject of Iran, I have a statement from the minister which I would be pleased to share with honourable senators. The statement reads as follows:

> On January 22, the Leader of the Opposition suggested that full diplomatic relations with Iran not be restored until (a) there is an investigation and report on the maltreatment of the American hostages; (b) Iran has demonstrated it will accept international law governing the treatment of diplomats.
> As stated most recently by the Prime Minister on January 22, Canada already has full diplomatic relations with Iran, as these were never broken. The issues that do have to be addressed are the lifting of sanctions and normalization of other aspects of our relations, in particular the reactivation of our Embassy in Tehran.
>
> The Government proposes to take the necessary steps to lift sanctions in the next week or two. This step, in our view, follows upon the release of the hostages, and has already been taken by EEC countries, Japan, Australia and Norway.
>
> The U.S.A., which was also to lift sanctions as part of the agreement for the hostages' release, has delayed doing so pending a study by the Reagan Administration of the whole agreement. However, the weight of public statements on the subject suggests eventual American implementation.
>
> The timing of other aspects of normalization, in particular the reactivation of the Embassy in Tehran, will be carefully reviewed over the coming months. Naturally the point which the Leader of the Opposition has raised—

And the point which honourable senators have raised here—

> —concerning the willingness of the Iranian Government henceforth to accept its obligations under international law will be a central consideration in determining when we should send Canadian staff back to Iran.
>
> However, as I stated to the Press outside the House on January 20, I do not see utility in trying to obtain written assurances from the Iranians, as they are already party to the Vienna Convention. It will be more important to judge whether conditions in Iran make it likely the Iranians will respect international law.
> Concerning an investigation and report on the maltreatment of the hostages, we are not aware that the American Administration is planning any such formal study, or that it intends to request an international investigation. We will follow this aspect closely, but we would not make the outcome of a hypothetical investigation a condition of resuming our dealing with Iran. We will wish to examine all the evidence available to us about the hostages' treatment and especially conditions in Iran before taking any decisions.

Honourable senators, I have a supplementary piece of information regarding hostage abuses. I apologize for the length of this reply, but I think honourable senators are interested in it.

The minister goes on to state:

> A review of Departmental files does not reveal any reference from Tehran on "Russian roulette".
> In the period November 4, 1979, to January 28, 1980, when he finally departed Tehran, our former Ambassador in Iran, Ken Taylor, provided External Affairs with daily situation reports which sometimes included information available to him about the whereabouts or treatment of the hostages. Much of this information was available to other diplomatic missions in Tehran.

Throughout this period, the Canadian government shared Mr. Taylor's reports with the American authorities.

At no time after I became Secretary of State for External Affairs was I made aware either of the use of Russian roulette or of any other abuses of the hostages, except through normal news reports.

It should be noted that most of the abuses and ill-treatment reported to the Department were common knowledge and had been mentioned on occasion on TV. They consisted of playing martial music, binding of hostages' hands, blindfolding of hostages, papering of windows, et cetera.

Senator Macquarrie: I thank the minister for his full report. In reference to the Russian roulette, I am tempted to quote Shakespeare: "For this relief much thanks." However, there were other allegations that were quite disturbing. I would make bold to say that the evidence is by no means in. I think it would be unwise for the government or the minister to follow an early rush into precipitous action by deciding too soon that nothing took place.

I should like to ask the leader if he is in a position now to assure this chamber that, regardless of what suggestions are put forward by the Iranian government as a part of the re-establishment of diplomatic relations, this country has no intention of repudiating the noble and decent act carried out by Ambassador Taylor on behalf of this country and this government, and that we are not embracing any ex post facto regrets for that very fine contribution to humanitarian ends.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have had no indication of any kind that Canada would extend an apology for an action which all Canadians agree was in conformity with the highest ideals of humanitarianism and reflected Canada's concern for fair play and justice, but the question will be taken as notice and a further statement brought to the Senate.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, on this point of acknowledging alleged improper acts, I wonder if the minister would ascertain whether or not the same sources of information were available to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as were apparently available to those who put together the program seen on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television network last evening dealing with a number of matters of this kind.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated in my earlier reply, we are very interested in additional information as it becomes available. If additional allegations of cruelty have substance, and there is further evidence, these will be factors in determining future Canadian action with respect to Iran. As the minister has said, the investigation of the alleged atrocities will be followed closely, but the government will not make the outcome of a hypothetical investigation a condition of resuming our dealings with Iran.

● (2100)

The situation is being monitored very closely by Canada. Certainly Canada does not condone the excesses which were committed in Iran during the incarceration of the hostages. But that question, as well, will be taken as notice. There may be information used on the CBC program which has not been made available to the government through official channels. Inquiries will go forward.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Why is there this rush to re-establish our embassy in Tehran? In light of the possible danger in Tehran, why the rush to re-establish the embassy?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated at the outset, any suggestion that the government is rushing to re-staff the embassy in Tehran is entirely incorrect. There has to be a period of time before Canadians are sent back to that post. We are not rushing that process.

EDUCATION

REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I would like to revert to the question respecting student loans, and ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to ascertain, while making the inquiries he has undertaken to make with respect to these loans, whether in Nova Scotia that portion of the moneys advanced by way of student loans which are funded by the Province of Nova Scotia is, in fact, given to the student in the form of a non-repayable bursary, and that any student loan funds which are being collected back would be, in at least the province of Nova Scotia, the collection of funds provided and put up by the federal government.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, information will be sought on that point and brought to the Senate as soon as it is available.

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I can now respond to a question posed by Senator Muir on January 22. The question related to Sysco.

I wish to inform the honourable senator that a task force comprised of federal, provincial and Sysco representatives recently completed a study to establish under what conditions a viable steel mill could be operated at Sydney, and at what cost this could be achieved.

My colleague, the Honourable Pierre De Bané, has received a proposal from the Government of Nova Scotia, and the implications of this proposal are now being considered alongside other alternatives in order that the cabinet can decide on an appropriate course of action. I hope that this issue will be brought to the cabinet's attention in the near future.

I am sure the honourable senator shares my view that we should study all options carefully in an attempt to achieve a viable economic operation at Sysco and maintain a stable work force.

ENERGY

OIL—SUSPENSION OF SYNCRUDE PLANT EXPANSION—DOMESTIC PRICING POLICY—WORLD PRICES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised by Senator Murray on January 14 concerning the cost of imported oil by source.

The following is a list of the prices requested by the honourable senator: Oil from Saudi Arabia is priced at $31.50 U.S. per barrel, with the percentage of total imports from Saudi Arabia being 45 per cent; from Kuwait, the price of oil is $35.50 U.S. per barrel, with the percentage being 3 per cent; oil from Mexico is $34.25 U.S. per barrel, and the percentage is 5 per cent; oil from Venezuela is priced at $33.25 U.S. per barrel, with 45 per cent of our total imports coming from that source; and from the North Sea, $39.50 U.S. per barrel, with the percentage being 2 per cent.

IMPORTATION OF OIL FROM SAUDI ARABIA—PRICE INCREASE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would also like to respond to a question posed on December 17 by Senator Flynn concerning the price increase of imported oil from Saudi Arabia.

Estimates indicate that the most recent OPEC increases, based on current import levels and projected over a period of a year, will cost Canadians an additional $1.3 million per day—just under $500 million per year—or $3.30 Canadian per barrel.

The federal Oil Import Compensation Program has factored OPEC price increases into its year-to-year increases, and when these are taken into consideration, the effect of the recent OPEC price increases would be to raise the 1980-81 oil import compensation costs by $150 million in total, and the 1981-82 previously anticipated costs by $100 million.

This would mean that the Oil Import Compensation Account for 1980-81 would be $3.3 billion, and the 1981-82 account would be $3.5 billion.

I would like to reiterate that these are estimates. Final figures will remain unavailable until actual import volumes are known.

THE ECONOMY

STATUS OF ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I can now respond to a question put on January 21 last by Senator Doody concerning the Atlantic Development Council.

I am informed that the last formal meeting of the council was held on February 6, 1979. More recently, an informal meeting took place on September 29, 1980. Additional details concerning council meetings were provided to the honourable senator in an earlier response.

ENERGY

IMPORTED OIL PRICE DIFFERENCES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the minister a supplementary question in relation to the per barrel price of oil coming from the different countries from which we import oil. I am wondering whether the difference in price is related to the quality of the respective oils, or whether it is simply that these prices are arbitrarily imposed by the sellers.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think there may be some of that. I will find out more specifically. However, I think the significant differences in price would be more related to the contractual arrangements that had been entered into.

As I look at these figures, one of the lower prices is $31.50, that being the price of oil imported from Saudi Arabia, and that oil, generally speaking, is a very high quality crude oil. Based on that, I do not think it is related significantly to quality.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, October 22, 1980, the debate on the consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on July 17, 1980.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on the Senate's consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, a report initially presented to this chamber on July 17, 1980. The Joint Chairman from this chamber, Senator Godfrey, addressed the house on the report on October 22 of last year.

Before dealing with either the report itself or Senator Godfrey's comments, I should like to say that it is obvious, even to a newcomer like myself, that the work of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has great success because of the work of a few. My understanding is that over the years that committee has been blessed with three or four interested, eager, very dedicated men and women, who have done the lion's share of the work and who have made that committee function. In that regard, it is obvious to me, as a member of the committee, that its present operation is largely a success due to the efforts of Senator Godfrey.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Nurgitz: His dedication, his interest in the particular work of the committee, and his hard, hard work bring credit to Parliament.

In terms of the fourth report of the standing joint committee tabled on July 17 of last year, I believe Senator Godfrey's comments made in this chamber on October 22, 1980 are very appropriate. The question of regulatory reform, as he said, has been studied to death.

Several governments in recent years have instituted studies. The Economic Council of Canada, on the recommendation of the government, undertook, in 1979, an almost identical study, and with the exception of one or two examples where ministers have, in fact, been following a somewhat different procedure following along the lines proposed in this particular report, nothing concrete appears to be happening. I will mention in a moment or two a good example of what could be an effective use of the committee if it can get the government to act on this particular kind of recommendation.

Honourable senators, it is my respectful submission that if one reads the fourth report of this joint committee, and in particular the comments of Senator Godfrey, one will realize that the time for study surely has come to an end. The time for action is now. I am suggesting, as is outlined in the report, that it is time to bring in legislation to make the necessary changes.

I am sure that Senator Godfrey will be disappointed to learn—as reported in Commons Hansard of January 15 last—that the government house leader in the other place has indicated that that report has no great priority, and that he did not at all anticipate even looking at it until some time after Easter.

Honourable senators, there are those who argue from time to time—and I guess I have been one—that regulatory legislation is bad, but I guess we all realize and recognize that it is, indeed, a fact of life. It is by now, as outlined in the report, an accepted form of governance. Let us not forget though that we owe a duty to the people of this country to make certain that there are procedural safeguards so that the rights and liberties of the subject are protected at the same time that we are maintaining a viable form of government. Unfortunately, there are those in government who in their haste to act, unknowingly and unwittingly suppress rights and liberties of citizens, all done initially in the hope of providing, I suppose, good government.

It may be recalled that on the last day before the Christmas recess I spoke on Bill C-51, the Clean Air Act. No one would argue that the government, with the best of intentions was not moving in the right direction in attempting to eliminate the acid rain problem. I think at that time that I referred to the purposes and objects of the bill as being "motherhood." Who could argue with any attempt to clean up the environment? But you may recall, honourable senators, that it was the method of accomplishing it that I took issue with—ministerial discretion, no right of appeal, no reasons for a decision being required, and a variety of those kinds of regulations in respect of which I suggested the citizen does not understand where he sits in the process and where he is being pushed out. This is, I suggest, a very good example of good intentions and great ideas but a poor way of legislating.

As Senator Godfrey said on October 22 when he was dealing with this report:

> Too often for the sake of administrative convenience, proper procedures are not provided for. It is the provision for proper procedures that protects the hard-won rights and liberties of the people secured over centuries of constitutional conflict.

This fourth report of the standing joint committee proposes the establishment of a new procedure. The report covers a variety of other things as well, including shortening the name of the committee. It seems that just mentioning the name of the committee takes up half my speech. I suggest the principal thrust of the report is that the enabling clauses of any bill should be referred to a committee before third and final reading. That is far more reasonable than the present system, and is more preferable from the standpoint of the citizen. It is a system that has worked with excellent results in other jurisdictions. It seems almost absurd that in our present system we pass a bill, enact regulations that obviously affect the rights of people, and then study those regulations to see if, indeed, they are proper.

At the time that Senator Godfrey spoke in October, the new Post Office Corporation Act had not been considered by Parliament, and I should like to point out at this time that the kind of procedure outlined in the report was, in fact, adopted on a voluntary basis by the minister responsible for the Post Office. The bill was referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and many amendments and suggstions were accepted by the minister which, I am satisfied, will result in a much better, stronger and more reasonable statute.

Other proposals are contained in the report such as the "Notice and Comment Procedures", whereby parties who have a particular interest in any given regulation would receive advance notice of it. This is a very acceptable and successful program used in the United States, and I commend it to the Senate.

Honourable senators, the report contains many substantive improvements to our present system. Canada lags behind the United States, the United Kingdom and other jurisdictions in having proper regulatory review. Now is the time to act. I urge the government to accept the report in its entirety, and to make those changes that are necessary in order to give it effect.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development) tabled:

Report of the Northern Pipeline Agency, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 13 of the Northern Pipeline Act, Chapter 20, Statutes of Canada, 1977-78.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CARRIED INTEREST EXEMPTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development in connection with the national energy policy. I am referring on this occasion to the plan of the government to provide for a 25 per cent carried interest in oil and gas exploration and development activities in the Canada Lands area. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources recently observed that that policy was being reconsidered with respect to those areas to which it would be applied. My understanding is that he has stated that there are two gas areas which will be exempt from the 25 per cent carried interest, namely, the Kotaneelee in the Yukon and the Parson's Lake field in the Northwest Territories.

My question is: Can the minister tell the Senate what standards are being used to evaluate the claims of these various areas for exemption of the 25 per cent carried interest, if such an exemption is indeed being considered?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I expect that Senator Roblin is aware of some of the exemptions with respect to the carried interest that were announced at the same time as the national energy policy, and they were, of course, the areas that are under production now. I suppose the largest of those was the Norman Wells area. Although I cannot verify precisely the other two that my honourable friend referred to, it may be that they qualify for the same reasons—that is, that they are already in production. What I said was that some of the regulations with respect to them were under consideration and many representations had been received, but it would be premature for me to make an announcement on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that there were major changes in the qualifications for exemption. Until such time as he has considered all the representations that have been made to him and is ready to announce a change in them, I really cannot give a definitive answer as to whether they may be applied specifically to the areas my honourable friend mentioned, and perhaps to some extent even broader than that if the minister sees justification for some of the representations that are being made to him.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I can assist my honourable friend in his consideration of the matter by saying that the report indicates that the two fields I mentioned are gas fields which are not in production, and they are not in production for reasons either of transport or price. My question was directed toward the criteria. What are the rules that the government is looking at? I presume they have rules for those two fields, or they would not have exempted them. I am therefore asking the direct question: What considerations applied in respect of those two fields. If my honourable friend does not have the information, perhaps he can get it.

● (1410)

I wish to go a step further, because there are other areas in Canada which are in a similar—I do not say identical, but a similar—situation. For example, in the Arctic areas, the areas in which Panarctic has been working, very large volumes of gas, probably 16 trillion cubic feet—something in that neighbourhood—have been discovered, and those areas are obviously not in production mainly for reasons of transportation, although market may enter into it. In other words, I am saying that there is a relationship between what appears to have been done in the two fields I have mentioned and the claims that might be best for others. Sable Island might be in the same category.

So I am really asking my honourable friend if he will give us the rules that applied to the two gas areas which have so far been exempted from the 25 per cent carried interest, and we may then be able to form some judgment on the matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin may have details of some positive announcement that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has made respecting the two gas fields he has identified. If he has—and I underline the word "if"—I will then refer the question to him and ascertain the reasons and the criteria for adding those two gas fields to the list of exempted fields.

I will go further and perhaps get a report on what are the representations and what is under consideration. One of the difficulties of doing that, of course, is that if one indicates, for a certain number of reasons, that one is considering some changes, some people take that as already having been done. So we have to be a little careful about that, but I will try to obtain as much and as complete information as I can respecting the regulations.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. I share with him some doubt as to whether the first two fields I mentioned have actually been dealt with or are merely prime candidates. I do not want to get in the way of the minister's negotiations. That is not the point of my question. I am trying to find out what is the policy, which I believe is legitimate, and what are the rules that the government has established in considering these matters.

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while I am on the subject of energy, I should like to refer to another form, namely, coal. We have all been pleased to hear the announcement with respect to the coal developments in British Columbia. It raises a question in my mind as to government policy with respect to that sort of energy, because we have seen, with respect to the oil industry, the government's policy of Canadianization, and we have seen, with respect to oil and gas, the government's policy with respect to export taxes.

I notice that the major firm that is developing those mines in British Columbia appears to be no more than 38 per cent Canadian owned. It may be that the government has given some undertaking to this firm that a Canadianization policy à la oil and gas will or will not apply to this company. It may have given some undertaking with respect to this project as to whether an export tax will or will not be invoked as it was with respect to oil.

I would like to know from the minister if there is any slop-over of those oil and gas policies with respect to energy and exports and government participation in the coalfields of northeastern British Columbia.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the national energy policy that was announced, particularly with respect to one of the most important parts of it—namely, the incentives that would be paid to the oil industry—was particularly and specifically pointed at Canadian firms. If that is to be done, then obviously we have to set up some level of criteria as to the Canadian ownership levels; and that certainly was done.

There was no attempt in the budget, and none is under consideration, with respect to the Canadianization of the major coal operators who will be supplying this latest contract, although there is a fairly high proportion of Canadian ownership of those who now appear to be signatories to the most recent contracts.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his reply. I take it that the government has neither been asked nor has it given any assurances with respect to the Canadianization factor that I mentioned or the export tax factor, so we will leave that matter where it lies.

I can tell my honourable friend that the Quintette property is stated to be 38.25 per cent owned by Denison, 17.5 per cent owned by each of Mitsui and Tokyo, both of Japan; 16.75 per cent owned by Imperial Oil, and 10 per cent owned by Charbonnages de France.

• (1415)

Senator Frith: How does that come out?

Senator Roblin: I hope it adds up to 100 per cent.

Senator Frith: Yes, but I mean the division of the 100 per cent as between Canadian and non-Canadian ownership.

Senator Roblin: What it means, I believe, is that it is one-third Canadian and two-thirds non-Canadian. However, I will leave that matter where it stands.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL TO JAPAN—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have one further question, honourable senators. I want to know what contribution, if any, the federal government has made to the coal projects in northeastern British Columbia. I am thinking of infrastructure of various kinds, including whatever the Canadian National Railways might be doing. We had some discussion on this point some time ago, and I wonder how the dust has settled out, and what the actual position is now.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, last evening, in response to a question from Senator Thompson, I indicated that I would like to make a full report to the Senate respecting the coal negotiations and what has finally been agreed to. I gave an undertaking that I would do that. There are, however, some pieces of the whole deal that are not yet signed. I guess there is a difference between "initialled" and "signed". We are highly confident that this will be completed in a very satisfactory way.

There is, of course, some front end money, if that is what you want to call it, that is going into the building of the port at Ridley, the coal loading facility, in conjunction with the grain loading facility that is also going in there. There were some added costs for infrastructure requirements, but there was some undertaking by the National Harbours Board that they would prepare the site for the coal loading facility, and so on. There will be a charge for that loading, but we have given an undertaking with regard to how much that charge ought to be, at least in the initial stages, so that the coal companies could add that into their price f.o.b. Ridley.

I would like to wait before giving the final details. Senator Perrault and I have been active observers of, and in some cases participants in, the negotiations between the two levels of government, the coal companies and the Japanese representatives along the way, although we are not negotiators directly.

I believe I can say at this time, from the information at my disposal, that it is a highly satisfactory deal for Canada and the coal companies, and, indeed, from the point of view of the economic benefit that will accrue to Canada and Canadians in the areas where economic activity will be enhanced.

THE ECONOMY

JOB CREATION PROGRAM—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Would the minister be good enough to inform this house as to how many jobs the government estimates will be produced as a result of its $350 million program, announced earlier this week?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I do not believe that an announcement like that can be made, or even calculated, at this time, because if my honourable friend will look closely at the announcement that was made, he will see that the program is to be targeted specifically at communities where there is severe difficulty in industrial adjustment. I do not believe that any of those communities have been identified at this moment.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators.

It seems to me that for some time past there has been a continuing series of cutbacks announced in energy production ventures. The most recent that came to my attention was the one made by Mobil, who say that they intend to cut back their proposed program by $164 million. The Gulf cut was $211 million from its 1981 investment plans. Judy Creek cut back by $400 million; Cold Lake by $9 billion; Alsands by $7 billion; the Syncrude expansion by $2 billion; Union Oil by $35 million; and Canadian Reserve Oil and Gas by $5 million. All of these planned investments have been stopped in the wake of the government's National Energy Program. The total loss to Canada could be as much as $22.5 billion, and even if some of these plans eventually go ahead there will, in any event, be an irretrievable loss for the year 1981 of $415 million in the private sector.

• (1420)

The minister certainly was in a self-laudatory mood when he announced the $350 million program last week. My question is: Why has the government, in determining its priorities, opted for $350 million in state investment rather than $22.5 billion in private investment? Is the government really convinced that its investment will create more jobs as opposed to encouraging the private sector to proceed?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what we have just witnessed is one of those convoluted exercises in reasoning which lead to the same kind of confused and complicated answers which, of course, bear no relation to the facts. What I could easily do is read out a list of the projects that are going ahead which would exceed, by several billions of dollars, those that the honourable senator claims are going to be delayed or cancelled.

My honourable friend included $9 billion for the Cold Lake project, but if he examines his figures he will see that the federal government moved quickly and decisively to retain the expertise there so that that project would not come apart. If he looks at his own figures and is a little honest in his own mind—and, really, he ought to do that for himself—

Senator Perrault: Once in a while.

Senator Olson: Once in a while, my friend says—then he will know who is holding up the Cold Lake project. It certainly is not the federal government.

GRAIN

ADJUSTMENT OF INITIAL PRICES—ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR THE CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be given permission to refer to a statement I made today with regard to increasing the initial prices for western grain. We operate under some difficulty in the Senate in that we do not have an appropriate procedure but, with the concurrence of my colleagues, I am prepared to outline that announcement. I apologize—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Again?

Senator Argue: —again. I wonder if I could have copies sent in for honourable senators. I regret very much not having them available at this moment.

Senator Asselin: I am not ready to consent to this operation now because we do not have a copy of the statement.

Senator Argue: I understand my honourable friend's objection, but if I am permitted to go ahead I will ensure he has a copy within minutes.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The problem is not that we doubt my honourable friend's good will but, if he makes a statement, the custom is that we are allowed to question him on it, if we have any questions to ask. In order to do that, it is very helpful to have a copy of the statement. I am sure we will get the statement before the Question Period is over; if we do not, we will be pleased to hear the honourable senator at any time the statement is before us.

Senator Argue: I regret that I did not have other copies with me, and I will be prepared to rise again when I have them. Thank you very much.

Hon. Lowell Murray: The point of order raised by Senator Asselin has been raised on several occasions in the past. Since the minister has referred to the custom in the House of Commons, he will know, as everyone who observes the other place will know, that when ministers make statements on motions, advance copies are sent to opposition spokesmen or opposition leaders so that they have an opportunity to examine them and prepare considered, if brief, replies. That courtesy has not been extended to us today; it has not been extended to us in the past. We would like to know when, if ever, the minister and the government is going to get around to extending that quite elemental parliamentary courtesy to the opposition.

Senator Argue: I thank my honourable friend for his additional comment, which I think added much to the comments that have been made.

Senator Frith: In football that is called "piling on."

Senator Argue: I respond more readily to the type of comment made by Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: That is enough damnation by faint praise. I am not going to have any of that.

Senator Argue: I wish to comment on Senator Murray's reference to practices in the House of Commons. I hope they have improved since I was there, but I remember that when I was in a position to make comments on motions, I very often received no notice whatsoever. Even with no notice, I think I was able to make some pretty good contributions. I know Senator Roblin could, as he knows this subject well. I hope he does not object to my praise, because it is a fact.

• (1425)

Again I say that I regret it, and I am most happy to comply. I hope that in the future I will be able to satisfy even Senator Murray that I am doing things in the correct and proper fashion in a chamber that does not have any rule governing this procedure—

Senator Asselin: It is a matter of courtesy.

Senator Argue: —because this chamber is not used to having ministers.

Hon. Robert Muir: On the point that has been raised, honourable senators, I would suggest to the honourable senator that after he left the House of Commons things greatly improved,—

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Argue: I don't think they get the business down there.

Senator Muir: —and copies were sent to the leaders, just as they are today. I hope that when copies are made available, honourable senators, they will be in both English and French.

Senator Argue: They are.

THE ECONOMY

JOB CREATION PROGRAM—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I should like to revert to the question concerning the $350 million program that Senator Donahoe directed to the honourable senator who is the Minister of State for Economic Development. Have the criteria already been established, as indicated in the release, for the designation of the areas where the money will go, and have the amounts to be appropriated to each province out of the $350 million been determined? For instance, what percentage of these $350 million can Quebec expect to get?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there is no answer to that question. Certainly, while there is some interest in how much is being spent, I, too, would be interested in how much will be spent in Alberta, Senator Roblin would be interested in terms of Manitoba, and Senator Argue in terms of Saskatchewan. However, I hope the criterion will not be what is spent on one side or the other of a provincial boundary but that the most severe needs of Canadians, wherever they are in Canada, will be addressed.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear. Good!

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: A supplementary question. This probably means that since there is a shortage of jobs in Ontario, particularly in the automobile industry, that province might qualify more rapidly than others where the situation is not as serious at this time.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I acknowledge that the automobile industry is probably one of the largest industries having a requirement for industrial adjustments, but I certainly will not accept that it is the only industry experiencing difficulty, and, obviously, those plants are widespread across the country in certain areas.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Economic Development on the same subject, because, in trying to follow the program as announced, I am worried that the assistance that is given will not be on an equalized basis. In other words, I hope that the closure of given industries in given locations will not be the only criterion for the application of this program. For instance, if a given town in the province of Ontario is hit by the closure of an automobile plant, the end result might well be that for that given town or region the opportunities for employment will still be higher, despite the closure, than is and has been the case in the Atlantic region.

I should like to stress that, if the efforts of the government with respect to that program are to be directed totally to areas where closures of industries occur, then, in effect, nothing will be happening in terms of trying to equalize regional opportunities in this country.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, a great deal is being done to equalize job opportunities. Actually, I am not sure "equalize" is the right word, because I do not know that it is ever entirely applicable, but a great deal is being done to enhance job opportunities in certain areas where there have been fewer opportunities. There is no doubt about that at all.

I should tell my honourable friend that this $350 million program is more specifically targeted, but that there are many other programs of the federal government that have been and are being enriched to deal with problems on a much wider basis across the country. I would not want my honourable friend to get the impression that this program is intended to be the solution to all problems relating to the equalization of opportunity or to even recognize or come to grips with the unemployment levels in various areas. Many other programs are also going ahead and are being enhanced for that purpose.

● (1430)

Senator Thériault: I did not say that nothing had been done because, as the honourable minister has pointed out, some things have been done. However, my concern is that in times of restraint the funding of DREE, in proportion to the total budget of Canada, has been reduced by almost 50 per cent—that is, from 2 per cent to 1 per cent of the total revenue or budget.

I repeat, what worries me is that there is $350 million which, in my humble opinion, if the government had been serious about regional disparity, it would have added to the DREE budget.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a view my honourable friend has a perfect right to express, so far as I am concerned. However, he ought also to take into account the fact that the DREE budget commitment was increased significantly for the fiscal year 1981-82. I do not have the exact figures, but the increase is higher from its current level than any other department of government, social or economic. We have increased the "A" base very significantly.

In addition to that, there will be access to additional funds, although DREE will have to compete with other departments for what is over and above the "A" base increase. Nonetheless, there is an increase of $250 million in the economic envelope for 1981-82 over "A" base budgeting, which is current levels plus inflation.

The Minister of Finance indicated—and I think justifiably so—that the major increase of 21 to 22 per cent was in the economic development area, and, of course, DREE is part of that.

Since you have raised the subject, it is my view that the increase in the envelope allocated to DREE is probably higher than that for any other single component part of that envelope. I would not like my friend to believe that DREE has not been enriched rather substantially.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to argue with the minister over the dollar figures, since many answers can be given. I am pleased to hear that the economic development allocation will be increased by about 23 per cent for the fiscal year 1981-82.

Senator Olson: Twenty-one per cent.

Senator Thériault: Is the minister prepared to assure the Senate that the DREE budget will be increased by at least that percentage?

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, I am. It will be substantially more than what is anticipated to be the current levels for commitment or allocation in the fiscal year 1981-82.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: With regard to the $350 million program, could the minister now tell us on the basis of what criteria that amount was arrived at? It does not strike me as very hefty in view of the overall needs of the country, the great number of firms closing down right across Canada and not only in the province of Quebec?

Could we know exactly what criteria will apply in meeting the objective the department would like to achieve?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure how to find a specific formula for the increase, since, obviously, in many cases it is a matter of judgment as to where the increases should be applied.

As announced by the Minister of Finance, what we are doing, in the first instance, is following a policy of constraint across the entire budget and, at the same time, increasing the economic development section.

● (1435)

There is no significant increase in the social development budget or in government operations or, for that matter, in External Affairs and National Defence, except the commitment we made for 3 per cent real growth in defence. Some people are unhappy about that.

Because of the priorities this year, the major thrust has been in economic development. To produce a formula, the rules, criteria, or whatever, is difficult to do because this is a judgment that has to be made.

I have tried to indicate what the Minister of Finance's judgment was, and indeed what the government's judgment was, as to where the major thrust ought to be in 1981-82 and the two subsequent fiscal years.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Would the minister tell us what judgment will be made concerning that $350 million expenditure?

Will the Minister of Finance make the decision himself or will a committee be established to consider the allocation of those $350 million?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is a committee that has been set up in cabinet for economic development. It is called the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development. My honourable friends opposite asked for a list of those who are members of that committee, and that has been provided.

Senator Asselin: Who is the chairman of that committee?

Senator Olson: The chairman is here.

Senator Argue: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: The lead ministers, in bringing in the programs, will be the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: —and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Honourable Herb Gray. They will work out the programs and bring them to the cabinet committee, which will then make the choices and exercise the discretion that every government is charged with. That is where the decisions will be made.

Senator Thériault: A supplementary question. I again direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Did I hear him say that in the projected expenditures, the total in the economic development envelope is approximately $7.5 billion?

Senator Olson: It is $7.3 billion.

Senator Thériault: That is an increase of approximately 23 per cent over the previous year?

Senator Olson: It is 21 to 22 per cent over the current allocation.

Senator Thériault: Does that include the amount set aside for the Western Development Fund?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Western Development Fund is not included in those calculations, nor is the energy envelope included in those calculations.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Is it possible, considering the present economic climate in Canada, that this amount of $35 million be increased if need be?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a speculative question that I really cannot give an answer to. There were a couple of other "ifs". There was an "if need be." I do not think it takes long to demonstrate, depending on where your priorities are, that more money could be spent. It is a matter of balancing that against what I think is the overall, responsible fiscal policy of the government and how much more ought to be included in that.

[Senator Leblanc.]

GRAIN

ELEVATOR CONGESTION IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

I understand that in western Canada, and particularly in Alberta, farmers have experienced difficulties in delivering their grain because of congested elevators. Could the minister advise us whether this is correct, and, if so, what measures are being taken and what is going to be done about it?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I thank the honourable senator for his question.

This situation has affected southern Alberta, in the main, and, to some extent, southern Saskatchewan. It has created difficult situations for producers during the first half of this crop year.

The difficulties arose as a result of a labour-management dispute at Revelstoke, British Columbia. These difficulties, together with an excellent harvest in Alberta last fall, have resulted in four CPR blocks in Alberta still on the "A" quota level of 80 kilograms, or approximately three bushels per quota acre for spring wheat. That is a fairly low quota.

The Revelstoke situation has recently shown signs of improvement. However, the situation was further complicated by severe weather problems in the mountains. During the Christmas holiday period very heavy rains resulted in both main lines to Vancouver being washed out. Both the CNR and CPR deserve to be complimented for making repairs quickly and enabling service to be returned to normal much more quickly than expected.

• (1440)

During the next three-month period the Canadian Wheat Board will be concentrating its efforts on moving grain from Alberta. There is optimism that the CPR will be able to maintain a 1,500-car weekly program to Vancouver. During the week of January 12-17 CPR unloads amounted to some 1,586 cars, and 1,763 cars during the week of January 19-24.

I might point out that this is an excellent achievement. I am sometimes not particularly complimentary to the CPR, but I want to say, without equivocation, that this is a tremendous accomplishment, and the grain producers of western Canada, and particularly of Alberta, are very happy with these results. All we can do is hope that a similar result can be achieved in the future. We are very grateful to the labour people, who are, of course, the people who run the trains, for their co-operation in this major accomplishment.

The outlook at Vancouver for the current week is optimistic. It is planned that some 800 CP cars will be moved weekly to Thunder Bay. During the week of January 12-17, 861 CP cars were unloaded, and during the week of January 19-24, 960 CP cars were unloaded.

I have been advised by the Wheat Board that, given this program and reasonable weather, they are optimistic that the situation in Alberta will be resolved, with farmers being able to deliver the quantities of grain they wish by the end of the crop year. In other words, they will be able to market all the grain on their farms they wish to take to market. That, of course, is the way it should be, and that is the objective.

The board is hopeful—

Senator Roblin: There are six months to go, though.

Senator Olson: We will make it.

Senator Argue: Well, the CPR has had difficulties, and everybody has had difficulties. I take my hat off to the CPR and to its employees for a very great achievement, and I hope they will be able to continue these excellent accomplishments. The board is hopeful that the four CPR blocks still at the "A" quota for spring wheat will have the "B" quota in effect very soon.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate the minister on his ability to instantaneously prepare a two-page answer to a question he did not know was coming.

Senator Argue: The day of miracles is here.

Senator Perrault: There is a little vision on this side.

Senator Smith: Having produced that miracle, I wonder why he was unable to produce the same sort of miracle in relation to a speech which he wanted to make and which he knew was going to happen as well.

Senator Argue: The Honourable Senator Molgat was rather co-operative. He did not ask me to bring in a number of copies and have them distributed to all honourable senators, and he did not ask me to provide a French version of the answer. That is not a practice I think we should get into, any more than I would want an immediate English version of an answer to a question asked in the French language. I can read that answer in the subsequent translation.

So, Senator Molgat was co-operative in that respect, and the answer has been put on the record. I can tell the honourable senator that we are still working as efficiently as we can to get the answer to that other question, both in English and in French, but I occupy an office in the Senate—well, I am being waved down, but when I am criticized, I am going to respond. If you do not want responses from me, stay away from criticism.

We are doing our best. The orders have been out. The only office that I have been supplied with that can do these things is in the Transport Building which is some number of blocks away. A messenger has been sent to the office—

Senator Murray: Take it up in caucus.

Senator Argue: —and we will get that statement over here.

I hear Senator Murray mumbling, which makes me wonder whether he wanted it in the first place or not, but that's okay.

Senator Perrault: Just a little chafe.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, having given the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board the opportunity to relieve himself of the heat of criticism, I turn now to the Minister of State for Economic Development and hope that I shall be able to give him a similar opportunity and that he will be able to take advantage of that opportunity in a similar fashion.

I would like to turn to the question of energy and the construction of the so-called Alaska Highway gas pipeline. I gather from some items in the press that yesterday his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, expressed confidence that the line would be completed; that he could rely upon the assurance he had received in the past, which assurance has apparently been reconfirmed by the new administration in the United States.

I am wondering whether the government has received assurance from the new President confirming what I think was inaccurately referred to as the "ironclad guarantees" which we heard about when this matter was discussed during the debate on the so-called prebuild.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, when the additional level of commitment, if I may put it that way, was provided to the Canadian government—and, I suppose, directly to me as the minister responsible for the pipeline—back in June of 1980, we assumed what all governments assume, and that is that a succeeding government will honour the arrangements or the commitments that have been made by the preceding government in their international relations.

In addition to that, we have had some informal discussions at the officials level, somewhat below the ministerial level, and we are optimistic that the determination and the priority of getting that gas pipeline built is just as high with this administration as it was with the previous one.

I should also remind my honourable friend that when we received the support of the Congress of the United States, it was not only from one party; it was from both parties. In attendance at the meeting which I attended on June 27 of last year were the majority and minority leaders from both houses of the Congress, all of whom gave an equally high level of commitment to getting on with that pipeline.

I can tell my honourable friend, too, that the actions that have been taken since that meeting, both before and after the election in the United States, have been going ahead very rapidly. The commitment between the sponsors of the pipeline and the producers on the North Slope has proceeded; there have been massive amounts of activity and financial commitments, both before and after the election date. So, we do not believe there is any reason to believe it is going to change.

I could go into some of the details and some of the activity that is taking place in Alaska now in terms of the engineering and final design of that pipeline, as well as some of the cost factors that are related to the processing plant and the 700-odd miles of pipeline required in Alaska.

When you add it all up, as far as concerns our valuation, if that is the right word, of all of that activity, there has been no change at all, and that high level of priority and commitment still exists.

Senator Smith: From that rather lengthy answer, I assume that the minister is not able to give a short answer "yes" to that part of my question which had to do with whether a letter had been received from the new President similar to that which was placed before us in the debate on the prebuild, to which we have both referred.

Senator Olson: I could give that answer. The simple, straight answer is "no"; but I am sure I was anticipating my friend's second question. The answer I gave was perhaps in anticipation of the follow-up question, and I am sorry if that is not the way he would have liked it to flow.

Senator Smith: I don't mind whatever flows from the honourable gentleman, because it comes in such a rushing torrent, with such a lack of facts, that it is very amusing and interesting. All I want is to be able to find, somewhere in the flow of words, an answer to my question, and in this particular instance I have found it.

Senator Olson: Some members accuse me of not giving enough information, so I am pleasantly surprised that you think I am giving enough.

Senator Smith: I am not accusing the honourable gentleman of giving too much information.

EMPLOYMENT

SKILL DEVELOPMENT—ON-THE-JOB TRAINING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. On Monday of this week, in Winnipeg, the minister indicated that studies show that there will be shortages of certain skilled workers in the labour force and that he believes that companies—and I believe I am quoting him—"must give a higher priority to on-the-job training." My question for the minister is: Has private industry been consulted as to the reasons for the shortfall, and have they also been consulted in terms of solutions to the problem?

● (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is really not a matter of consulting with private industry to establish what my friend is inquiring about. Private industry is probably as keenly, and, in some cases, more keenly, aware of these shortages in some critical skills that are presently with us. The minister directly responsible for about $800 million of federal spending for training and retraining programs across the country, is leading a discussion with respect to this to try to find some better way of having larger numbers of students and trained and retrained workers take up these trades. Part of my job is to consult with provincial governments, industry and labour unions, because if we are going to find some agreeable and effective way of dealing with the problem, all three have to be involved. Mr. Axworthy, the minister responsible, will be coming forward very soon with what, hopefully, will be some adjustments to the program, and also a consensus of the three major participants.

Senator Nurgitz: I would like to thank the minister for his response. I understand what he is saying.

In regard to the question of labour, industry and government working together on it, has any consideration been given—and I appreciate that it was a suggestion of the previous government—to calling an economic summit in Canada to deal with this wide range of problems, including the shortfall in the labour force?

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, some consideration has been given to that. With respect to the human resources requirement—and there are one or two others in the constraints that I identified as the eight component parts—there is no disagreement among the labour unions, management, provincial governments and the federal government but there is a severe problem. As a matter of fact, there is very little disagreement on how we should attack the problem to relieve that constraint. So everybody agrees, but the problem is that there is not enough action being taken.

So far I have had meetings in five of the provinces. In each province I have had a meeting with some labour union leaders and also some business leaders. What we need to do is to get an action plan together because there is no disagreement about the problem, nor is there any disagreement with the overall way of getting at the problem and dealing with it quickly. As I said, we now have to get to the situation where there is some movement of an action plan, and that is what we are trying to do. My contribution is going to be meeting with the other four or five provinces that I have not been to yet, but at the moment the minister directly responsible, Mr. Axworthy, is also doing this on a concentrated basis.

GRAIN

BREAD AND WHEAT—PRICE INCREASE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the minister aware that last week Canadian bakeries announced a 3-cent increase in the price of a loaf of bread? Will the recent increase in the income of farmers who grow wheat be reflected by a further increase in the price of a loaf of bread?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I think that is a very good question, and I can assure my honourable friend and the consumers of Canada that there is no connection between this announcement today and the cost of wheat to the millers.

The announcement that affects the cost of wheat to the millers was made in this chamber some months ago, and it was to set a price for domestic spring wheat—the bread wheat—in Canada at a range between $5 and $7 a bushel. At the time it was set at $5, the selling price was approximately $5.40 a bushel. Since that time there has been a major strengthening in wheat prices in the world, and in Canada, and the price of wheat has now gone up to just a few cents above $7 a bushel, but the $7 ceiling is in effect, and it has been in that range for perhaps some weeks or months.

So there is no connection that I know of between the announcement of an increase in the price of bread of 3 cents a loaf and the price of wheat. At least from now until the end of this crop year—and after that I will probably review it again—the ceiling on the price of wheat to the millers is $7 a bushel.

Senator Haidasz: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Could he inform this chamber whether there is today a surplus of wheat or any other grain which was harvested in 1980?

Senator Argue: No, there is no surplus of any grade of wheat that I can think of in relation to even current demand—that is, up until today—and certainly not in relation to any prospect of demand between now and July 31, the end of the crop year. It is a matter of record, and it is an absolute fact, that the Wheat Board could sell on the world markets today at these relatively high prices far more grain than it has on hand to sell. The demand at high prices exceeds the supply.

Then you are faced with the problem of transportation. That system is in pretty good shape. The railways are improving the job they are doing in delivering the grain for export to terminal positions. We have on hand about 14,000 hopper cars, and there are some hundreds of hopper cars still being manufactured and produced.

The grain system, along with that tremendous announcement that I have already made today, and that I am not able at this point to refer to in any detailed fashion in the chamber, means that the grain farmer is in great shape with the policy that is now in effect. The consumer in Canada is protected at least at a price level of $7 a bushel to the miller.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister inform this house whether, in the grain inventory, there is any grain set aside for emergency purposes?

Senator Argue: There is nothing officially set aside that I am aware of, but the Canadian Wheat Board, I think, has a very good business organization. It does not sell all of the wheat it has, and it will maintain a normal inventory. Within that likely inventory, if there were a need for a program to deal with an emergency situation to save human lives, I am certain that there is an adequate supply of wheat to meet that kind of demand. When I say the demand exceeds the supply, that does not mean that every bushel has been sold. The Wheat Board is going to have at the end of July a normal sensible carryover because that is required. A grocery store cannot sell every single item it has on its shelves. It has to have an inventory to do business. The Canadian Wheat Board will maintain a reasonable inventory.

Senator Haidasz: Can the minister then state whether this inventory he has spoken about contains any grain earmarked for delivery to Poland in view of the food shortages there?

Senator Argue: I understand the great interest of the honourable senator in this question. I believe that certain requests have gone to the Department of External Affairs, but I am not fully aware of all of those details.

I suppose this is not part of the answer, but as a Canadian I want to say that I view the Polish situation in many ways as being not only an important development for the world, but a very encouraging one. I have been in consultation with my colleagues in the Senate on the whole question of providing export credits for many countries of the world. In those discussions, Poland has figured prominently.

Many years ago—almost more than I would like to remember—along with the Right Honourable C. D. Howe, I played a constructive part, I think, from the opposition benches in helping—I could go into some details but I do not intend to do that—to bring about the first sale, and on a credit basis, to a Communist country. Poland, particularly under current circumstances, has a claim on the good will, generosity and the physical capability of Canada to provide wheat whenever circumstances so require.

I am not as yet, in my portfolio, fully informed about any particular requests that have been made to the Department of External Affairs. I had a brief word this morning with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He will keep me informed, and provide me with information, so that I may be in a position to more adequately answer my honourable friend's question.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. By no means would I attempt to provoke him, as I have always found him courteous and co-operative. That has applied to any question that I have asked.

Is the minister in a position to provide an interim report on the proposed gas pipeline to the east coast, as to where the project stands at the moment and what he may have in mind regarding it?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not think I can respond to the question in the way that my honourable friend would wish. I believe it is fair to say that there is a revised application before the National Energy Board, but I am not sure about the present state of that hearing. I shall check that.

The board was holding a series of hearings on the supply of natural gas in Canada. Perhaps that stage has passed and the board can now hear the revised application. I will check tomorrow.

As a matter of fact, I should make that inquiry anyway, because I am due to appear before the pipeline committee in the other place, and I believe that some of the senior officers who are participants in the Q & M pipeline will be there.

Senator Muir: As a supplementary, would the minister bring back some information as to how long those hearings may last and what the time frame may be before we see some real activity regarding the proposed pipeline?

Senator Olson: To the extent possible, I will try to ascertain that.

PURCHASES OF OIL COMPANIES—GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. There were media reports yesterday to the effect that Seagrams was negotiating the purchase of Suncor; that CNR, through its employees' pension fund, and other of its financial tools, was negotiating to purchase Gulf Oil Canada; and that PetroCan was negotiating to purchase Petrofina Canada.

Would the minister advise us if the government is involved in any of those alleged negotiations?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice. I am not sure whether it is or not.

GRAIN

ADJUSTMENT OF INITIAL PRICES—ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR THE CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have now received copies in both English and French of the references to the announcement that I wished to make some time ago. I regret that it was not possible for Senator Roblin or Senator Asselin to remain in the chamber until I was able to make this statement. That is not said as a form of criticism, because I know that both honourable senators are at present working on committees which require their presence. The special joint committee is meeting—

Senator Grosart: And other committees are meeting.

Senator Argue: Yes. I merely point out that they are not here to respond, and if anyone who reads Hansard wonders where they were, I can say that they are dealing with business of public importance which requires their attendance at committee meetings.

This announcement is effective—

Senator Grosart: Leave is granted.

Senator Argue: I am sorry. Thank you. I seem to be making progress, but very slowly.

The announcement will be effective on Monday next. In practical terms it means, for western wheat producers, that when a farmer drives his truckload of grain into the elevator on Monday, he will receive an additional $1.10 per bushel for spring wheat, an additional $1.50 per bushel for Durum wheat, an additional 15 cents per bushel for feed barley, and an additional 75 cents per bushel for malting barley.

We are dealing with the farmers' own money. It is already in the pool and is being paid out. The Canadian Wheat Board will be processing the cheques as quickly as it can, and my information is that they will be in the mail after the middle of February and on into March.

It is an adjustment payment and it brings a major increase in the prices of the various grades of wheat. It brings No. 1 CW Red Spring Wheat to $5.35 per bushel, Thunder Bay; No. 1 Durum to $6.50 per bushel, Thunder Bay; malting barley, $3.65 per bushel; and feed barley, $2.85 per bushel.

There have been demands for increases of not just $1, $1.10 or $1.50 per bushel, but huge increases of, let us say, $2 per bushel or better. Those who have made such requests either did not understand fully the business of the Canadian Wheat Board or they did it from a political standpoint. Just because the market might go up today it does not make it possible for the Canadian Wheat Board to increase the price of wheat immediately.

In trying to establish the prices, we had to go back and look at the selling prices in April, May, June and July of last year, as well as the months since then. The price for Durum wheat, in terms of dollars per tonne, is being increased to $239 per tonne, which is about $40 per tonne higher than the prevailing prices in the months of April, May, June and July. The price that is being established today for spring wheat is $196 per tonne.

In any event, it is not possible to bring about an increase of, let us say, $2 per bushel without endangering the fund, and without at least opening the possibility of a charge on the treasury that could amount to a very large sum of money, perhaps $100 million or more.

The Canadian Wheat Board, the government, and the minister involved, had to use reasonable judgment, because had we gone too high, the recent substantial drops in the price of wheat might very weli have affected the balance in the fund. So this is considered to be an increase in initial payments, an adjusted payment, at a level to provide, at this time, an additional $450 million of income to producers, with the reasonable possibility of leaving the fund in the black so that at the end of the crop year another satisfactory and reasonable final payment can be made.

In my view, this announcement is evidence of the successful operation of the Canadian Wheat Board, and I would inform honourable senators that the cost of the Canadian Wheat Board to the wheat producers of western Canada, including salaries and pensions, buildings, depreciation, and all of the administrative costs, is estimated at three cents per bushel. In my opinion, the board does an extremely good job and requires the support of the federal government in the international negotiation of wheat agreements and in connection with the general operation of the board's activities.

I am delighted to make this announcement and to provide the information for the benefit of my colleagues in the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words, if I may, and then ask a question. I am glad to note the success of the Canadian Wheat Board and its present ability to distribute large sums of money to the producers.

I hope I misunderstood the minister when he said that anyone who disagreed with the level of extra pay either did not understand the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board or was making the criticism for political reasons. Did the honourable gentleman say that or did I misunderstand him?

Senator Argue: Demands have come from members of the honourable senator's party in the other place. They said, "You should pay $2 per bushel today"—that is, instead of the $1.10 I referred to. I have said that it was an irresponsible request, that it was based on lack of information. I do not expect honourable members of the other place to have all the information that is provided to me by the Canadian Wheat Board. The fact is that in this pool there is income from large quantities of wheat that have been sold at prices well below the present market price. We cannot enjoy a certain level for a period of one year and then say we are going to pay the highest price in any part of the year, any more than we should ask producers to be satisfied with the lower price. If I said anything that seemed to be a criticism of the Canadian Wheat Board, then I emphasize that that is not what I meant.

• (1510)

Senator Smith: I did not believe the honourable gentleman was criticizing the Wheat Board. As I heard him, he seemed to be saying that anybody who did not agree with this level of extra payment either did not know anything about the operations of the Wheat Board, or was doing it for political reasons. I resent that declaration of infallibility on the minister's part, and I did not really wish to think that that was what he had said till I gave him a chance to confirm or deny it. I hope, honourable senators, that he did not mean that, but if he did I must say that it has been a long time since I listened to a declaration of infallibility of that kind in this or any other legislative chamber.

Senator Argue: The honourable senator asked me if I was trying to be infallible or not, but before I had a chance to reply he assumed that I was trying to present this case as infallible.

Senator Smith: No, no.

Senator Argue: Let me say this to my honourable friend, that the advice I received from the Canadian Wheat Board is that prices approximately at these levels—just about exactly these levels—are prices which will not endanger the public treasury, and are prices that probably, as far as they can foresee, will still allow a modest, or moderate, final payment. I am not saying that it was irresponsible, and I am not saying that I am infallible, but I am saying that a recommendation of the Canadian Wheat Board to go to an increase of $2 in prices today, or beyond that, would have been completely irresponsible, and the Canadian Wheat Board would have been no party—I know that—to making any such recommendation to me. It is my belief that the people who understand the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board best are the commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board, just as the operations of my friend's caucus are best understood by the members of that caucus.

I get my advice, and I look over it. I do not always fully agree with it, since I do have some responsibilities. However, I give very careful consideration and full weight to any recommendations that come from the Canadian Wheat Board.

Senator Smith: I think I understand the honourable gentleman, but I do have to say, too, that what he is now telling us is that in the judgment of the Wheat Board this was the most that should be paid out. That is very different from alleging that anybody who says anything different is either ignorant or being unfairly political. After all, all of us, including the honourable gentleman, have to make judgments upon many things, and very few people that I know of, including the honourable gentleman, are able to make judgments which are beyond the possibility of being improved.

Senator Argue: Well, I think it is fairly correct to say that if the Wheat Board had made the recommendation that has been made to me by members of the Conservative Party, and I had been so foolish as to carry it forward, it might well have endangered the public treasury. I do not think my honourable friend wants a big deficit in the Wheat Board's operation—certainly the farmers do not—but that recommendation would certainly have removed any reasonable possibility of there being a final payment at the end of the crop year. The producers want their income staged in a reasonable fashion. I believe the vast majority of wheat producers, who are, after all, the people most involved, will be fully supportive of the kind of announcement that has been made today, and of the principles behind that announcement. I repeat, if anybody were to take a firm stand to the effect that the payment should be a dollar a bushel higher than it is, then they either do not understand the grain business—and I would hope they would—or they are taking that stand for some other reason. I am not saying that they are not sincere in saying that this should be done.

Senator Smith: There are lots of other things that I could say, but I guess we would not be any further forward.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the farmers, for some time, have been complaining that the price they are receiving does not even meet their costs of production. My understanding is that some farmers have even had to go out of business. Now that this substantial increase in price is to come into effect—in one case $1.10 a bushel, and in the other $1.50—would the minister be good enough to inform us as to whether this price will at least be sufficient to meet costs of production, and stimulate the farmers to maintain the production we have had up to this time?

Senator Argue: It is difficult to say what the cost of production is. It varies from farm to farm. This is a very high price, a very high level; it is the highest level in history, but so are all the other costs. The other costs, in fact, are going up so quickly that what may be a very high price today may be inadequate tomorrow. I think, however, that the Wheat Board is to be congratulated on having the wheat business in such good shape that these prices can be put into effect on Monday next, still with the likelihood that a further payment will be forthcoming.

These very large sums of money that are being paid out, however, are required. In addition to the $450 million that will flow from this announcement, the final payment last year amounted to $750 million, so in the last few weeks, and in the first three months of this calendar year, there will have gone into the economy of the three prairie provinces $1.2 billion. The costs are high; the income is required, but the income is there.

I tell my honourable friend—and he is just as sincere as I am, and I hope I am sincere in doing these things in the interests of the western economy and western agriculture—that we do know that the costs are going up; we do know that for the future we are going to have to have increasing prices for grain, or there will not be the grain produced in the quantities we require.

I have to say, as the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, as a representative of Saskatchewan in the cabinet, and as a participant in the policy discussions of the cabinet, I am very pleased indeed that we were able to remove the impediments that were attached to an embargo that was not working, and that created very definite restrictions on the sales of Canadian wheat in a particular market. Those restrictions, in a major way, though not in a full way, have been removed to the satisfaction of the producers and to the satisfaction of the Canadian Wheat Board, through the signing of an agreement that will put, I estimate, an additional $450 million to $500 million in the pockets of the producers. To have achieved that in a few months, as well as getting an increase in the two-price wheat system and some other things, is not a bad accomplishment.

I agree with my friend that costs are high. I am fearful, however, that they are still going higher. The cost of fertilizer is going wild. Even with these very high prices it is debatable as to how big an increase there can be in grain production to meet the targets for markets that are available. But if Canada, because of world prices, cannot increase its production to meet the targets set by the Canadian Wheat Board, it will not only be the Canadian economy that will run short, but there will be that much less grain available for humans in the world who require it.

My honourable friend and I have worked together very closely in the past. I will be listening to his advice and hoping that we can come forward with policies that will help meet the problems that are out there.

Senator Yuzyk: In other words, you do not sound too optimistic that this price is really going to meet the costs of production, even if we are not sure what the costs of production are going to be. My question was: Do you think that this present price—and I understand there is going to be an additional payment—will keep the farmers on the farm?

[Senator Argue.]

Honourable senators, I have another question with regard to the two-price system, since you have mentioned it. The price of wheat is going up. We are aware that the price of bread is going up. The consumer is going to be worried that this announcement is going to cause the cost of bread to spiral again in the near future. Does the honourable the minister have any comments on this?

Senator Argue: I have answered that already in response to a question from Senator Haidasz.

Honourable senators, you must get this clear. This is the farmers' own money. The Wheat Board had that money until this announcement was made, and now the board is going to send it to the people who own it. That situation has absolutely nothing to do with the cost of wheat going to the millers. That cost has a ceiling on it of $7 a bushel. That ceiling is being maintained.

With regard to the costs of production, and so on, this depends on which farmer you look at. A brand new farmer who paid $500 an acre for his land, and who is paying interest at the rate of 18 per cent, perhaps needs $10 or $12 a bushel. But I have no hesitation in saying that a farmer who is 50 years of age and has his land paid for, with these announcements and with the announcements likely to be made at the end of this crop year, will make the largest gross income and, I believe, also one of the largest net incomes he has ever made. Therefore, it depends on the individual farmer.

There will still be young farmers who leave the farm; this trend will not be arrested. However, I am proud to say that in the agricultural industry we have progressed by this announcement and the policies followed, to meet costs and to provide a lot of extra cash in the pockets of western farmers. If you want me to worry on my feet, I will start my worrying now.

One of my worries is that a small minority of farmers, who will be in the position of having a very large net income because of this announcement, will take the huge sums of money that flow from it and start bidding up the price of land. My honourable friends can cry their eyes out for those farmers who are having difficulty—and they have my instinctive support—but I also worry that one thing that flows from this kind of announcement is a large increase in the price of land, and that is self-defeating.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ANTICIPATED REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Allister Grosart: I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that an important report may be made to Parliament at the end of next week, would he indicate to the Senate at this time the plans for the sittings of the Senate for the next ten days?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am glad to be able to share with you our considerations on anticipated business for the next two weeks. The indications are that we will not be receiving any business from the other place next week. A look at the order paper will, I am sure, persuade honourable senators that there is not enough work to keep us busy for three days next week, without our receiving further business from the other place. Senator Grosart has pointed out that the following week, however, is likely to be busy, because of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, which is expected by Friday of next week. Therefore, what we are considering—and I will definitely give notice tomorrow—is not sitting next week but returning on Monday evening of the following week, February 9, so that we shall then be ready to deal with the report of that committee. A final decision has not yet been made, but that is the direction of our thinking on the subject. I am grateful to the Acting Leader of the Opposition for asking the question.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Leader of the Government along the lines of the question asked by Senator Grosart? When the report of the joint committee reaches both houses, is it the intention of the Leader of the Government that the debate will proceed in the Senate at the same time as it is proceeding in the other place?

Senator Frith: That has not yet been decided. As soon as I have any information on that, I will provide it. Certainly, I anticipate that it will be received by us as a report presented by the committee's joint chairman, Senator Hays, and that it will take its place on the order paper in due course.

As to whether the report will be debated concurrently in both houses, I suggest that the other place will have to make its own decision as to how it will proceed. Certainly, at the present time our intention is to deal with it in the ordinary course, as a committee report that will find its way on to the order paper and be dealt with accordingly.

Senator Grosart: May I ask a supplementary? In view of the fact that there is possible uncertainty as to the application of our rules to the disposition made by the Senate of a report of the special joint committee, could the Leader of the Government or his deputy assure the Senate at this time that there will be adequate opportunity to debate the report when it comes before the Senate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the proposal is to provide for adequate time to debate the report.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INAUGURATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Haidasz on January 20 concerning Canadian ministerial representation at President Reagan's inauguration. In answer to the question, foreign dignitaries do not receive invitations to presidential inaugurations in the United States. It is normal practice for foreign countries to be represented only by their diplomatic corps, as Canada was. Therefore, no Canadian cabinet minister was present at President Reagan's inauguration.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—REQUEST FOR ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Haidasz asked a question the other day about Canadian economic assistance to Poland. Further inquiries have been made on this question. I would like to confirm that on January 12 the Polish Ambassador presented, on behalf of his government, several specific requests for economic assistance from Canada. As the requests were put forward in confidence, I cannot disclose details as to their substance. These requests will be given prompt and serious consideration by the Canadian government.

IRAN—RELEASE OF AMERICAN HOSTAGES—ROLE OF ALGERIA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Macquarrie on January 22 concerning thanks to Algeria for its part in the release of the American hostages in Iran.

Canada has indeed expressed its gratitude to Algeria for its part in the release of the hostages. On January 19, members of the other place unanimously passed a motion which extended our "congratulations and appreciation to the Algerian government for the key role it played in the resolution of this difficult international crisis."

On January 20, the Secretary of State for External Affairs congratulated the Government of Algeria for "acting so effectively as a go-between in the final months."

Both of these messages were passed on to Algerian authorities through our diplomats in that country.

I have a copy of the minister's communiqué issued on January 20 last. If honourable senators would like me to do so, I will ask that it be appended to today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of communiqué see appendix, p. 1597.)

CANADIAN ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

RESIGNATION OF PRESIDENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on January 21 concerning the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

The Honourable Lloyd Axworthy sent a letter last Thursday, January 22, to the following women's groups: The National Committee on the Status of Women; The National Council of Women; The National Council of Jewish Women; The Native Women's Association of Canada; The Canadian Research Institute for the Advancement of Women; The Business and Professional Women's Club; L'Association feminine d'éducation et de l'action sociale; La Fédération des femmes du Québec; and The Federated Women's Institute. Yesterday the honourable minister sent the same letter to the Association of Women and the Law.

The text of the letter reads as follows:

> I would like to have your views on the best means of ensuring an effective advisory council on the status of women. Women's groups were the catalyst for the council and it is your views that I value as I review the recognized structural problems of the council. To that end, I would appreciate meeting with you on February 16, 1981, at 5.00 p.m. so that together we can ensure that vital independent research on women's social, economic and legal position is available to Canadian women.

I would like to emphasize, honourable senators, that the meeting suggested by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is also responsible for the status of women, Mr. Axworthy, is but the first in a series to consult women's groups to hear what kind of recommendations they would like to make as to changes that will help bring about greater equality for women in Canada.

ENERGY

NEW BRUNSWICK—HOME HEATING—CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Olson, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Thériault concerning conversion grants for home heating. The question was as to whether the minister would inquire into the progress in discussions taking place between EMR and the Province of New Brunswick with respect to agreeing who should be entitled to the $800 conversion grant.

● (1530)

Senator Olson has been informed by his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that discussions are currently under way. A formal announcement will be made when all the outstanding issues have been resolved.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer to give on behalf of Senator Olson in respect of a question asked by Senator Muir on January 21 concerning the Cape Breton Development Corporation. His question was as to why Devco is contemplating changing to oil one of its heating plants that is to be renovated.

Senator Olson is informed that the facility referred to by the honourable senator in his question is the Point Edward Marine and Industrial Park. The park is being reconverted and electrical heat will be used for the occupied units. The park was originally designed as a temporary facility during World War II. Today, less than a quarter of the facility is being used and it is no longer economical to heat the entire facility by coal. It is anticipated that the reconversion to electricity will make it more energy efficient.

With regard to the honourable senator's specific concerns about the kind of heating used, Senator Olson would want to remind him that more and more electricity in Nova Scotia is coal-generated, reducing even more the dependency on oil.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ORIGINAL WORKS OF ART—CLASSIFICATION UNDER DUTY-FREE TARIFF ITEMS

Question No. 39 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Hartland de M. Molson:

1. What is the policy of the Department of National Revenue concerning the evidence that an importer of original works of art must provide so that such works will be classified under a duty-free category such as Tariff Items 69515, 69520 or any other such duty-free category in the Customs Tariff?

2. Has there been a recent change in this policy and, if so, what was the previous policy and what was the reason for the change?

3. Supply any and all policy directives concerning this matter.

Reply by the Minister of National Revenue:

1. The Department will allow importers to enter goods free of duty under tariff items 69515-1 and 69520-1 providing the importer certifies that the goods are originals and by artists. Further, the goods must be properly described on the Customs invoice, stating the name of the artist, the medium, the dimensions, the title and the approximate date of completion. Mass produced, catalogue art, works produced by mechanical means and works not meeting these requirements are dutiable under tariff item 18000-1 (appendix "A" attached).

2. Steps were taken ordering more stringent application of policy guidelines which had been issued in 1975 (appendix "D" attached). To alleviate the burden of determining if imported works of art were originals by artists or not, the Department requested that shipments of art be accompanied by third party certification by public galleries or museums (appendix "B" attached). In view of recent representations by the visual arts community the administration of tariff items 69515-1 and 69520-1 is being reviewed (appendix "C" attached).

3. See attached appendices.

APPENDIX "A"

TARIFF ITEM 69515-1

Original sculptures and statuary, including the first twelve replicas made from an original work or model; assemblages:

The professional production of artists only and valued at not less than seventy-five dollars each.

TARIFF ITEM 69520-1

Original paintings, drawings, collages and pastels by artists;

Engravings, etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, maps and charts, printed prior to 1st January 1900;

Original engravings, etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, unbound, printed from plates or blocks wholly executed by hand, and signed by the artist or, under regulations by the Minister, authenticated by or on behalf of the artist;

Serigraphs and photographic or photomechanical representations, numbered and signed by the artist or, under regulations by the Minister, authenticated by or on behalf of the artist;

Any combination of the foregoing media, numbered and signed by the artist or, under regulations by the Minister, authenticated by or on behalf of the artist.

TARIFF ITEM 18000-1

Photographs, chromos, chromotypes, artotypes, oleographs, paintings, drawings, pictures, engravings or prints or proofs therefrom, and similar works of art, n.o.p.

For purposes of the administration of Tariff Items 69515-1 and 69520-1,

"original" is understood to mean:

—Conceived of by the artist and controlled through to completion to that individual. This does not preclude the possibility of more than one individual being involved in the execution.

—Created entirely by hand. Art wholly or partially the result of other processes is excluded (i.e. when stencils, masks or programmed instruments are involved). Original work may not be a reproduction, copy or near-duplicate of any other.

"artists" are understood to be:

—Those recognized as such by the curatorial community.

APPENDIX "B"

Telex Message dated September 29, 1980, from J. T. Vachon, Director, Machinery, Agriculture & Electrical Products Classification, Directorate I, Tariff Programs (Classifications), Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise, Ottawa:

Effective immediately, immediate release privileges are not/not to be accorded commercial importers or brokers entering goods under Tariff Items 69515-1 or 69520-1, unless such entries are accompanied by certification from an official of a public gallery or institution in a country familiar with the artist's work. Goods not/not certified are to be admitted under Tariff Item 18000-1 or according to material at time of entry. Importers will of course be eligible for refund of duty per usual procedures upon presentation of appropriate certification.

APPENDIX "C"

Communiqué dated November 10, 1980, from Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise:

OTTAWA . . . The Honourable William H. Rompkey, Minister of National Revenue, met with representatives of the visual arts community in Canada recently to consider representations regarding the Customs administration of tariff items 69515-1 and 69520-1. These tariff items provide for duty free and tax exempt entry of various designated works of art.

The Minister was sympathetic to these representations and agreed that a committee should be formed to consider the interpretation of the legislation and to define mutually acceptable procedures for administering the tariff items. The committee will consist of representatives of the arts community in Canada and officers from the Departments of National Revenue and Finance and from the Arts and Culture Sector of the Department of Communications.

The committee will present its recommendations as soon as possible. In the meantime, the administrative requirement which was introduced several months ago regarding the provision of certificates from public institutions of the arts concerning the artists and the originality of individual works of art has been withdrawn.

APPENDIX "D"

ADMINISTRATIVE POLICY REGARDING TARIFF ITEM 69520-1

This supersedes all previous Memoranda issued for the administration of Tariff Item 69520-1. Please ensure that field officers cancel previously issued related directives.

The following explanation defines the goods provided for in tariff item 69520-1 and the requirements for entry therein. Attached for your information is the present wording of the tariff item and a guide to the sales tax treatment of the goods provided for thereunder.

Under the initial provision, "Original Painting, Drawings, Collages and Pastels by artists", "Original" refers to paintings, drawings or pastels that are broadly speaking one of a kind, in that the artist has produced a work entirely executed by hand, the production of which he has controlled entirely from conception to completion. Therefore, it follows that an original painting is unique and all subsequent copies which are modelled from the original are classified under Tariff Item 18000-1.

The following examples of paintings are held not to be originals and the methods utilized for their production clearly reveals the differences between original paintings and others.

Typically, an artist is presented with a painting or a photograph and instructed to reproduce as many copies of the model as quickly as possible, according to order. That is, the paintings he is producing are often catalogue ordered for repeat business.

The artist is utilized as a tool of production while not exercising any of the functions related to originality. Plant management having surveyed the market and designed the product to satisfy that market, while at the same time factory production methods are used that are compatible with mass distribution marketing practices generated by repeat order business.

Paintings exported in quantities from South Korea, Hong Kong, Taiwan and other S. East Asian countries are produced for the Western export market and therefore the subjects are western. There are no Eastern landscapes in these shipments, neither oriental street scenes, nor portraits of orientals. Rather, the subjects are Western landscapes with and without mountains, North American forest scenes, European street scenes depicting Paris and New York, Venetian Canals and Italian Villas.

These paintings are usually oils on canvas signed with Anglophone names often misspelled, and signed not by the painter but by the factory foreman; certain signatures are ordered. Often, paintings are signed after importation.

Many of these paintings are imported through the U.S. Often a Canadian or U.S. rented truck loads up with these paintings in Detroit or New York, for sale at a Canadian Hotel. This sale has been heavily advertised the week before and when the sale is finished, of course the non-resident importer disappears.

There are some paintings originating from the Far East on velvet, but the majority of velvet paintings are produced in Mexico, usually by family cottage industries. These are manufactured in very large quantities utilizing the following methods.

The subjects are stencilled, masked and screened on the velvet and touches are then added by hand. Blending is achieved by dipping a rag in gasoline. Air brushes are often employed and the air brush splatter is plainly evident. The subjects are bulls, bullfighters, senoritas, landscapes and Disneylike characters. I am sure you have seen many examples of these in shopping plazas and furniture stores.

Factory produced paintings from Italy, Austria and other parts of Western Europe, are appearing in Canada in quantity. These are more expensive than the Far Eastern versions and are executed in oils on canvas, usually showing more attention to detail, the subjects are European alpine landscapes, seascapes and "old codger" type portraits, bearded elderly gentlemen puffing away on pipes. The frames are often from the Far East.

Paintings produced in the U.S. that are exported to Canada are usually on hardboards such as masonite, chipboard or canvas like materials. Frames are narrow, utilitarian, often of plated metals. The subjects, "cutesy, juvenile children, and animals, titled "Taffy", "Fluffy", "Little Ballerina" and so on, and usually signed with surnames only, such as Thomas. Other typical subjects include fleets of galleons, Spanish villas and semi-abstractions of birds in flight, commercial building complexes and ruins, packaged in plastic with advertising inserts attesting to their originality. The backgrounds of these U.S. produced pictures are silk screened, as are the outlines of the objects in the pictures. When orders are received which are selected from their widely distributed catalogues, dozens of these screened backgrounds are lined up and the factory artists then heavily paint out and literally cover up the screened lines. In addition to screens, templates, masks and stencils are used. When completed the production manager then signs each picture with a fictitious "arty" surname. Variations on this basic theme occur, such as certain employees in the team specializing in masking or stenciling in mountains, buildings, etc., or the foreman, in addition to signing everything produced, adds the final touches here and there.

These paintings are, for the most part, produced in California in factories called "studios" and are advertised as hand painted originals by famous California artists.

Both U.S and Far Eastern produced paintings are drummed by salesmen travelling throughout Canada calling mostly on furniture and department stores soliciting orders and assuring the purchasers that these paintings are originals and, therefore, free of duty and exempt sales tax. Of course, the actual importer of the paintings is the furniture store, who is responsible for the duty and taxes. The salesmen acting as non-residents and representing foreign exporters bear no legal responsibility.

The provision for "Engravings, Etchings, Lithographs, Woodcuts, Maps and Charts, printed prior to 1st January, 1900" applies to prints that have been produced by the following printing processes:

Engraving

A printing process where the printing plate either wood or metal or any other material that has had a design or picture cut or inscribed on its surface enabling the ink to run into the scribed portion of the plate. The untouched level surface of the plate is wiped clean and the ink in the "grooves" is deposited on paper making the print.

Etching

A printing process substantially the same as engraving except that the plate which is metal is made by a process where the design or picture is cut or inscribed on its surface by acid.

Lithography

A printing process on which the design or picture is drawn directly on a lithographic stone. The Lithographic Print, or Lithograph is obtained by pressing a paper sheet to the stone which has been inked.

Woodcuts

Woodcuts are prints obtained from a printing process using printing plates made from wooden blocks carrying a design or picture in relief, the background being carved out. This relief surface when inked will reproduce the image on the paper to be printed.

Maps and Charts

Maps and charts printed by any process may be admissible here provided they have been printed prior to 1st January, 1900.

Engravings, Etchings, Lithographs, Woodcuts, Maps and Charts printed prior to 1st January, 1900, need not be signed or numbered.

The provision for "Original Engravings, Etchings, Lithographs, Woodcuts, unbound, printed from plates or blocks wholly executed by hand and signed by the artist or, under regulations by the Minister, authenticated by or on behalf of the artist", applies to prints produced by the aforementioned printing processes. In addition, the plates or blocks used in the production of these prints must be wholly executed by hand.

Originality for the purposes of this provision is defined as the work of an artist who has performed every step in the creation of the master design on a suitable medium from which the prints are pulled. It should be noted that Original Prints are limited in edition. Where the edition is not specified, it is limited only by the number of perfect proofs that can be pulled from the plate.

Original Engravings, Etchings, Lithographs and Woodcuts to qualify for this provision must be hand signed by the artist. Usually, these are signed on the face of the print.

Prints signed "in the block" are held to be not signed by the artist. In the block means that the signature is engraved, etched, etc., in the plate and when the print is pulled from the plate, it bears the printed signature.

The provision for Serigraphs and Photographic or Photomechanical Representations applies to prints numbered and signed by the artist or, under regulations by the Minister, authenticated by or on behalf of the artist.

A serigraph is a print produced by the silk screen printing process. The silk screen in effect is the printing plate.

A Photographic or Photomechanical Representation is a print that has been produced using a printing plate made through a photographic or photomechanical process.

Serigraphs and Photographic or Photomechanical Representations must be both signed and numbered by the artist by hand to qualify for this provision. The numbered print should indicate the number of prints produced in the edition.

Under the final provision "Any combination of the foregoing media, numbered and signed by the artist or, under regulations by the Minister, authenticated by or on behalf of the artist"; articles that are produced through a combination of the techniques defined previously are provided for here. They must be numbered and signed by the artist by hand.

Obviously, combinations that will be encountered generally will be prints that have been pulled from plates that have been worked using more than one technique. For example, a plate photomechanically etched and then hand engraved.

Difficult cases should be forwarded for headquarters' attention.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1981

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-56, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other acts subsequent to 1970.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-56 is just what it purports to be in its title. The question, I suppose, is how we are to know that the anomalies and inconsistencies and so on are matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature. The answer to that question is that this is the fourth and final stage of what has become a traditional four-step process.

The first step is that the law officers of the Crown gather together those anomalies, inconsistencies, et cetera, which, as stated, fall under the generic term "non-controversial and uncomplicated." The law officers draw the information for that list from various sources: from the study of bills, from people noticing that there are inconsistencies, archaisms and anomalies, and sometimes from the fact that they appear in the course of a judgment of a court. In other words, they come to light in various ways. In any event, the important point is that for these purposes they must fall within the definition: "non-controversial and uncomplicated."

The next step, then, is for the law officers to prepare the document called "Proposals to Correct Certain Anomalies, Inconsistencies, Archaisms, Errors and Other Matters of a Non-Controversial and Uncomplicated Nature." I believe that in the other place that document is then referred to its Justice and Legal Affairs Committee, and I know that in the Senate it is referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The reference of this document containing these routine or non-controversial items to the committee is simply for the committee to verify, first, that there are such anomalies, et cetera, and then, more importantly, that they are non-controversial and uncomplicated. The committee then studies all the suggestions contained in the proposal.

In the case of the Senate, the reference was made to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in July. Senator Donahoe, the distinguished deputy chairman of that committee, presented the report of the committee, which you will find reproduced at page 612 of the Minutes of the Proceedings for Wednesday, December 3, 1980. In the report, four deletions and several additions are suggested at page 613 of the Minutes of the Proceedings.

Having given you that insight into the work of the committee, let me return to the steps followed by the law officers. The law officers of the Crown then take the results of the work of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the other place and of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs—which, as I pointed out, was in this case under the chairmanship of Senator Donahoe—and they move on to the fourth stage, which is what we have in front of us today, namely, the actual bill, the bill having been reviewed, verified and purified by this process of committee study in both places.

In the present case, Bill C-56 in fact went through all three readings in one day in the other place because of the assurance that it represented simply the final form of the four-stage process I have been talking about.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I move that this bill be read a second time now.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I support second reading of this bill. As has just been well described to us, it is an unusual bill in its genesis, so to speak, because it comes before us in a slightly different manner from that in which the ordinary bill does. It might almost be termed a pre-digested bill, because it arrives in this chamber after having had most careful and exacting scrutiny in both the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the other place and the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Ordinarily, when one rises to speak on second reading of a bill, one intends to discuss the principle of that bill. However, Bill C-56 is of such a nature that one would almost have to be a magician to say what is the principle of this bill. The purpose of the bill is to avoid a multiplicity of individual amending acts having to be passed in order to bring about the desired refinements and improvements, because, if all of those acts were dealt with in the ordinary way, it would cause a good deal of clogging of the machinery of the legislative process; whereas, by using this procedure which Senator Frith has just described, we have anticipated all of the changes and have gone into them carefully.

If I may say so, honourable senators, this particular bill, the subject matter of which, I understand, forms an annual or roughly annual bill, has had close and exacting scrutiny. I should like to be honest with the house and admit that, when the bill first reached us, there were some in the committee who were of the opinion that the bill could be accepted as having had considerable scrutiny before it ever reached the Senate and that, therefore, an exacting insight into it was not required on the part of the members of the Senate committee. There were, however, others on the committee who were, I like to think, more conscientious and who felt that that was not doing justice to the obligation put upon the committee when the matter was referred to it by this chamber.

It may be invidious of me, or improper for me, to mention individuals, but there developed what one might almost call a self-constituted committee of one in the person of Senator Smith, who undertook to do a close and exacting review of the material. Subsequently, he furnished the committee with a written summary or précis of the results of his review. The committee then spent considerable time giving its thought to the comments brought forward by Senator Smith on the various clauses of the bill. As a consequence of that study, the committee saw fit to make one or two further deletions from the bill, as Senator Frith has alluded to, and, as I mentioned on a previous occasion, opposition to any one clause of the bill by any one person was considered sufficient cause for deletion. That was the policy followed before the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the other place, and the same policy was followed when the matter was before our committee. Some members of the committee thought that one or two clauses went beyond merely being the removal of anomalies and so on, and that they perhaps entered into matters of substance and were not appropriate for treatment in this way. Consequently, those were deleted. One or two other clauses were added because they had been brought forward having belatedly been realized to be appropriate material for inclusion in this bill.

● (1540)

I do not know if I have said anything that is informative in any way to anyone, but it does explain why I am of the opinion that it is perfectly proper that second reading be given to this bill. I would, therefore, urge all honourable senators to agree and vote for second reading.

I suggest that there is no necessity whatever for referral of this bill at this stage—as would ordinarily be the case—to a committee for consideration, that, as I have said, having already been accomplished before the bill reached us this afternoon.

I, for one, would support second reading of this bill. Furthermore, it would seem to me to be entirely appropriate, if anyone saw fit, that immediately after second reading third reading be proceeded with. I would have no objection whatever to that course being followed, although I do understand that some members of the chamber wish to say a word on this bill before it proceeds further.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, in a moment I propose to move the adjournment of this debate. I very much appreciate Senator Donahoe's kindly reference to myself in connection with the bill. There are, however, some matters the committee disagreed with me upon. Unfortunately, I had to attend another committee meeting, and through no fault of the committee I did not have an opportunity to present those views verbally. I do not know whether they will be any more persuasive if presented verbally than they were in the memorandum the committee very patiently examined at the request of Senator Donahoe, but I should like to consult the memorandum I made and have an opportunity to make a few comments concerning one or two matters contained in this bill.

The gist of my remarks will be that there are some matters contained in the bill which, although they may seem to be perfectly innocent, have substantial implications for many people in the country. That is a consideration which, I believe, ought to be before, not only the drafters of the bill but also before anyone who has to do with the legislative process.

Having given that very brief explanation today, I move that the debate be now adjourned.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on Bill S-15, respecting The Royal Canadian Legion, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, before the report is adopted, I should explain to you why the committee suggested an amendment.

On Wednesday, January 21, 1981, the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science met to consider Bill S-15, respecting The Royal Canadian Legion. We had as witnesses the President of the Dominion Command, Mr. A. L. Harvey; the Secretary of the Dominion Command, Mr. J. E. A. J. Lamy; and the Administrative Officer of the Dominion Command, Mr. Stanley Walpole.

As you know, Bill S-15 was introduced in the Senate on November 13, 1980; on November 19 second reading was moved by Senator Godfrey; on December 9, Senator Marshall spoke on the bill; on December 10, Senator Macdonald spoke on the bill; and on December 16 Senator Godfrey closed the debate and moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. As a consequence of the carrying of that motion, the committee considered the bill and reported it with one minor amendment.

As you will note in column II of Schedule II of the original bill, in describing one of the trade marks of the Legion, namely, the poppy, it states:

> The petals are red and the centre portion is black.

We were advised by the Dominion Command that the Legion wishes to have that wording amended so that column II of Schedule II will now read:

> The petals are red and the centre portion is green.

We were advised by the Dominion Command that originally the petals were red and the centre portion was green. Some years ago the handicapped veterans who made the poppies for the Legion ran short of green material and changed to a black centre portion. Now that the green material is in plentiful supply, the Dominion Command has requested that the poppies revert to the original colours of red petals and a green centre portion.

This amendment was accepted unanimously by the committee, and I was authorized to report the bill, as amended, to the Senate.

Motion agreed to and report adopted, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John. M. Godfrey moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

STATE IMMUNITY BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator van Roggen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, for the second reading of the Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to provide for State Immunity in Canadian Courts".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, this debate stands adjourned in the name of Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition, who, as honourable senators know, is away in Washington this week on public business. There is no intention whatsoever of holding up any further discussion on the bill. Senator Flynn adjourned the debate in case any other honourable senator wanted to participate.

Therefore, in view of the fact that we may not be sitting next week, if any other senator wishes to participate in the debate at this time, I would say on Senator Flynn's behalf that he would be glad to yield.

Senator Frith: Including tomorrow?

Senator Grosart: Yes.

Order stands.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, might I ask that this item be placed on the Orders of the Day for February 9 in the name of Senator McGrand? The order now stands in my name on behalf of Senator McGrand, but I understand that he will be back then.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMUNIQUE No. 7

JANUARY 20, 1981

AMERICAN HOSTAGES' RELEASE IN IRAN: CANADIAN REACTION

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Dr. Mark MacGuigan, today welcomed the safe release by the Iranian authorities of the 52 Americans who have been held hostage in Iran since November 4, 1979.

In expressing his relief that the long ordeal of the hostages and their families was now over, the Secretary of State for External Affairs noted that this happy outcome is a vindication of international law, which Canada and other countries have sought to uphold. He congratulated the Government of the USA on the patience and wisdom it has shown in the negotiations for the hostages' release, and the Government of Algeria for acting so effectively as a go-between in the final months.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs confirmed that the Government would shortly review all those measures to curtail relations with Iran which have been implemented since the hostage-taking began. He noted that at the time a number of these measures were announced, on May 22, 1980, the Government indicated it would act to remove the restrictions then being imposed once the hostages were released. The question of re-opening the Canadian Embassy in Tehran will also be examined.

The termination of sanctions would in no way constitute a change in Canada's wish to remain strictly neutral in the conflict between Iran and Iraq, or in Canada's support for the UN Security Council Resolution calling for mediation between the two sides.

The Canadian Government hopes that these developments will make possible the full resumption of normal relations with the Islamic Republic of Iran in the near future.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

(For text of messages, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Agreement between Canada and Portugal on Social Security, done at Toronto, December 15, 1980, together with Order in Council P.C. 1981-78, dated January 15, 1981, approving same.

Report of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 5 of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources Act, Chapter E-6, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, February 9, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

He said: Honourable senators, for the benefit of senators who might not have been in the chamber yesterday when the Acting Leader of the Opposition asked about our business for the next couple of weeks, this motion is being proposed today because the other place has advised us that we cannot expect any business from them next week. As I mentioned yesterday, a quick perusal of our order paper indicates that there is not likely to be enough work to keep us fully occupied for three days next week.

For those two reasons, plus the fact that the following week promises to be busy, since the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution will likely have reported by Friday, February 6, we are proposing that we not sit next week, but that we resume early the following week, at 8 o'clock in the evening of Monday, February 9.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is little I can add to the statement made by my honourable friend, except to say that I agree with him that the work of the Senate is in good shape. We are up to date on all our pressing undertakings, and I agree that it would be appropriate for us to adjourn in the fashion he suggested.

I do not know whether I should get into a discussion with him as to the likelihood of the joint committee's reporting by February 6. There have been suggestions that that date is not practicable. However, leaving that to one side, I would say that we would be glad to support his proposal.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, before the motion authorizing the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to sit during adjournments of the Senate is passed, may I, in order to keep you fully informed of the consequences of the adjournment motion we have just passed, advise you of the various committee meetings that I have been informed are scheduled for next week? They are as follows: the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, and the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

The Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada has within its terms of reference now the power to sit while the Senate is adjourned, so there is no problem in that respect. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments also has the power to sit during adjournments of the Senate, so there is no problem there either. Whether it will or will not sit, I am not aware. I understand that the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications was to be routine in nature—I do not say that in any deprecatory way—and would not require the attendance of witnesses from distant points; or, at least, witnesses would not be inconvenienced if the committee were not to sit.

The motion before us now is simply to give the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders the power to sit in case that committee wishes to sit during the adjournment period.

Senator Smith may have some remarks to address to us with respect to the Transport and Communications Committee. Perhaps I was not quite accurate in what I said concerning that committee.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I thank the deputy leader for his invitation to make a comment or two. It is my understanding, which unfortunately I did not confirm before coming into the chamber, that it is likely there will be witnesses from outside this area in attendance at the Transport and Communications Committee meeting scheduled for next week. Consequently, I should like permission to raise the matter again after I have had a chance to ascertain what the situation is. I feel it will likely be the wish of the committee to postpone that meeting next week in view of the circumstances, but not being absolutely sure of that I should like the opportunity to ascertain the views of the members, if I may.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that proviso is entirely acceptable. Either that committee will postpone its meeting for next week, or, if it wishes to meet, it will ask for authorization to do so.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: May I just inform the Senate that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will be meeting next week?

Senator Frith: Was I correct in saying, Senator Godfrey, that it does not need to ask for permission?

Senator Godfrey: That is correct.

Hon. Allister Grosart: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has been given the power to meet while the Senate is adjourned?

Senator Frith: I was not aware that that committee was scheduled to meet next week, honourable senators.

Senator Grosart: If my information is correct, Senator van Roggen intends to have that committee meet at 1.30 p.m. on Tuesday next. That information came to me not long ago. Perhaps the deputy leader would care to check into that.

Senator Frith: The information I gave you a moment ago I obtained from a memorandum given to me by Senator Lafond. I had asked him yesterday to check the various committees, but it may be that someone overlooked that particular meeting, if it is scheduled. Certainly, if Senator van Roggen wants the committee to meet, it should be given the power to do so. Senator van Roggen not being here, perhaps we should give the committee the power to meet, in any event, because it does not have to meet just because it has the power.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I must say that I am somewhat embarrassed by this particular motion owing to the fact that just today I circulated a memorandum to the members of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee informing them that the next meeting of the committee would probably be early next week. In fact, I believe the committee members have only just received this memorandum and I should now say that I am sorry it came out prematurely. However, that was my understanding.

• (1415)

I should say to the chamber that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, following the instruction to consider the matter of how the report from the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution can be dealt with, has held five meetings of reasonable length and has done a great deal of work on this subject. It is most anxious to present its report to the chamber before the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution is presented, because it is undesirable that the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution should to be received before the report of the Rules Committee on how we should deal with it.

Under the circumstances that have arisen, where there is no clear understanding as to the views of the members of the Rules Committee, I accept the fact that the best we can do is meet on Monday, February 9, before the Senate sits, in the hope of being able to present a report at the beginning of the sitting and before the presentation of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, a good deal of the embarrassment, as the chairman of that committee has pointed out, is caused by a little contretemps today because Mr. Belzile telephoned me to ask about the meeting for Tuesday. I had to tell him and the chairman subsequently that one of the desired objectives of the committee could not be met by Tuesday. For this reason the committee will have to meet on Monday, February 9, in order to have that committee's report appear ahead of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution on the order paper.

I support what Senator Molson has said, and accept part of the blame for the position in which he finds himself.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was just going to raise that point but it has now been clarified by my honourable friend and I thank him for the clarification.

Since the committee most certainly will not meet next week, may I suggest that if the committee does meet the following week, it meet on Monday afternoon rather than on Monday morning because of the transportation requirements of some of the members of the committee?

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I see that the President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, a former President of the Canada West Foundation and former Liberal member of the Manitoba legislature, has been making pronouncements; and in the last week Mr. Roberts joined Mr. R. M. Thomson, the Chairman of the Toronto Dominion Bank—and a good many other people, I may say—in saying that the National Energy Program would produce, "a national disaster." Those are Mr. Roberts' words, not mine. He accompanied his statement by the prediction that exploration will decline by one-third. He claimed that the government's failure to move closer to world prices defeats the goals of conservation and, in addition, discourages private investment in research and exploration.

My question to the minister is: Are we going to continue to hear the rhetoric of the government, expressed last week by the Minister of Energy, about going to all lengths to reach an agreement with Alberta, or may we hope that the government will modify its policies so that the energy industry can be convinced of the government's genuine concern that Canada become energy self-sufficient?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not think I should comment directly on some opinions that have been expressed by the gentleman who has been named by the honourable senator except to say, perhaps, that we disagree with his conclusions. When he uses terms such as "national disaster", I would hope that he puts the same interpretation on those words as I do.

• (1420)

I also point to some earlier statements that were made by the same gentleman. I think it is fair to say that most of his predictions have not materialized.

I can give my honourable friends opposite an update of what has taken place in the drilling activities this year. There were 532 active rigs in Canada on January 20, 1981, compared to 496 on January 22, 1980. In effect, drilling activity has been maintained at an appreciably higher level than it was during the same period in 1980. What is going on as of January 20, 1981 represents a record high level for the time of year.

It was stated in the Speech from the Throne, and in the book entitled The National Energy Program, that the energy sector will be, indeed, part of Canada's economic expansion in the 1980s. We believe that to be the case still. The figures which come out from week to week bear that out. There is, of course, a problem with respect to some of the activity as compared to last summer related to what might happen in 1981, but let me remind you that the Executive Director of the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors stated last October—long before the National Energy Program came out—that the association expected a 30 per cent reduction in wells being drilled in 1981 as compared to 1980, and that this related directly to the surplus of natural gas wells.

I have said in this house previously that there are some 9,000-odd capped wells in Alberta now. The industry recognized long before October that continuing the rate of drilling, especially the development of known existing gas fields, had gone on for a number of reasons that I will not explain again. That had gone on to the point where any further capital investment at those levels was unjustified until there was a higher cash flow from higher market sales in that sector.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the minister for his sanguine interpretation of what is going on in the oil exploration and energy development fields.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Accurate; not sanguine.

Senator Donahoe: I noticed that in describing what is taking place, he made no reference to recent events that would, it seems to me, have a serious and deleterious effect upon the pursuit of energy in this country. Only yesterday, the United States removed its final controls on oil prices. This sets the stage, obviously, for a boom in energy investment in that country. We know the Canadian dollar fell by half a cent.

I do not know whether it is true or not, but in some quarters it is alleged that the decline in the value of the Canadian dollar is attributable to the action of de-control having taken place in the United States.

In light of these developments, is the minister still firm in his conviction that the regime created by the National Energy Program remains sufficiently attractive to promote growth in drilling rig activity during 1981?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the preamble that it is alleged in some quarters does not give the question a sound basis. So, I will disregard it for the moment.

Senator Donahoe: There is no doubt that the dollar fell.

Senator Olson: You are trying to attribute certain factors to that. If you want to take the responsibility for that adjudication, that is fine. To say that it is alleged in some quarters does not impress me too much.

Senator Perrault: It is pretty shadowy stuff.

• (1425)

Senator Olson: In any event, there is also a comparable change that takes place some place else when that kind of decision is made, and in this instance it was that gasoline went up three cents a gallon immediately, with the probability of further increases.

If my honourable friend wants to tell us publicly that he supports that kind of activity—just let the consumer pay any amount, regardless of the cost or any calculation with respect to the impact of such costs in the country where it is produced—let him have the courage to say that.

An Hon. Senator: A Tory policy.

Senator Donahoe: A supplementary. No one is interested in what my opinions may be on those matters, but a great many people are interested in the opinions of the minister, and my question was whether or not he believes that what is transpiring in the United States is in effect going to be a further deterrent to energy development programs in this country.

By making the energy development programs in the United States that much more attractive, does it not follow that they become correspondingly less attractive in this country?

An Hon. Senator: That is the issue.

Senator Olson: That is not all that is involved in the question, because however one replies to that question, that is only one side of the consideration. The other consideration relates to the speed at which we concur in the escalation of energy prices in this country.

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—EFFECT ON CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Lowell Murray: A supplementary, honourable senators. Will the minister say whether it is his contention that the energy policies of the federal government have the effect of exerting upward pressure on the Canadian dollar, downward pressure on the Canadian dollar, or whether the effect of those energy policies on the Canadian dollar is neutral.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): If you are going to ask that kind of a question, you have to put it in a time frame.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. C. William Doody: I am not sure whether that last comment of the minister was an answer to the question, but I have a question for the usually forthright minister responsible for Economic Development. My question deals with the research and development situation—

Senator Donahoe: Unusually forthright.

Senator Doody: Well, he usually is forthright.

Senator Donahoe: There is nothing usual about his forthrightness.

Senator Doody: He usually is, I must say. Very loquacious—not informative, but loquacious.

Very recently the Minister of State for Science and Technology announced that the 1978 objective of the Liberal government's policy of having 1.5 per cent of GNP devoted to research and development was nothing more than a pious hope. That was a quotation attributed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology—

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It must have been a Tory minister, because our target is to get there by 1985.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): An allegedly rumoured statement.

Senator Doody: I do not know what is being attributed to the Tory party—whether it was the pious part of it or the hope part of it.

An Hon. Senator: You need a lot of hope.

Senator Doody: In any event, the statement was made by the Liberal minister. The second part of the minister's statement was that he hoped to move the research and development budget ahead by offering a series of "sticks and carrots" to the Canadian public.

I certainly do not commend him on his choice of words. It is most ineloquent and not very complimentary to the Canadian public. In any event, I am wondering whether the minister can tell us what his colleague means by "sticks and carrots."

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not know that I agree that it was said in that way, but if my honourable friend would like some words that would more accurately and literally describe what is there, the words "incentives" and "disincentives" could be used.

Senator Perrault: Carrots help your vision, for heaven's sake.

Senator Doody: Was that an intervention, or were you trying to be helpful?

Senator Perrault: It is a bit of wisdom flowing forth.

Senator Doody: If the government leader wishes to attempt to add some wisdom to his usual statements, I shall certainly be pleased to sit down and listen to him. It would be a welcome change.

Since we did not get very far with the sticks and carrots, perhaps the minister responsible for Economic Development, who is Chairman of the Economic Development Committee of the government, can explain to us how arbitrary cuts can be made in what appears to be the cornerstone of an economic development policy, the research and development program of the government, without having put an industrial strategy or a development strategy in place.

Is there an inconsistency there, or am I missing the point?

• (1430)

Senator Olson: There is no inconsistency there at all. I am not sure whether the honourable senator is missing the point or not. He will have to make that decision for himself, even though I may have some views on it.

The attainment of 1.5 per cent of GNP for R & D by the end of 1985 is not a pious hope but a declared target by this government. My honourable friend should also be aware that it was never said, expressed, implied or intended that the entire 1.5 per cent of GNP devoted to that purpose should come out of the federal treasury. It would come from the federal government, industry and other participants in economic development, perhaps including the provincial governments.

The one thing that I am concerned about, and I have indicated this at all of the meetings I have attended with businessmen, labour unions and provincial governments across this country—I have been to five of them so far—is that we ought to be using increased federal expenditure—and the minister directly responsible agrees with that view—for the purpose of incentives to induce or promote greater interest and financial contributions by industry, because we think this is so important for economic development. It now becomes clearer and clearer that it is going to be at very high levels across this country within a few months.

Senator Doody: If I may, I have one further supplementary. Am I to gather from the minister's reply, for which I thank him, that the 1.5 per cent we are aiming at now, which was originally aimed at for 1978 but which now, apparently, is hoped to be achieved by 1985, will not be contributed in whole by the federal government; that the federal government's participation will be considerably less? Some time ago I was encouraged to hear the minister say that Canadian industry hopes to achieve growth by getting involved in such new technology as fibre optics, silicon chips and micro-chips. Is there a sufficient base in Canadian industry to enable it to finance this sort of breakthrough on its own? Is the government going to get involved in that, or are we going to head toward another branch plant fibre optics and silicon chips sort of economy?

Senator Olson: The brief answer to that question is that the government is already involved in R & D support for fibre optics. We have already made contributions to that. I have to be a little more specific about the R & D respecting silicon chips. In fact, quite a lot of that is going on. The federal government has made some contributions to that in the past. I know there are requests for substantially more federal funding of that R & D. The minister will be making the announcements as they are authorized by cabinet.

FINANCE

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—INTEREST RATE AND REDEMPTIONS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning redemptions of Canada Savings Bonds. Over the last two weeks they have totalled $462 million. Could the minister indicate to us whether the government is planning to do anything about this worsening situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice. I acknowledge that the Minister of Finance has stated there has been a significant increase in those redemptions—and the reasons are obvious—but whether he deems it necessary to take any action is something I would like to refer to him and ask his opinion on.

Senator Charbonneau: I presume the minister will come back with some sort of answer very shortly.

Senator Olson: Right.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary, will the minister also indicate whether there is any foundation to the projection that is being made in some quarters that for the full fiscal year, when redemptions are taken alongside sales of Canada Savings Bonds, there will be a net drain on the treasury of some $2 billion, or an amount in that area?

Senator Olson: I will include that in the answer.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, this afternoon is seemingly a very agreeable one; almost, as a Highland Scot, I would say a fey one. As Senator Muir knows, in the other place we used to find the last hour of the week the one in which the best speeches were delivered to the fewest listeners. I was impressed by the charm and wit displayed, and quite impressed by the fact that the minister who reports for the Wheat Board, Senator Argue, who has come clean of late, has decided, whether just by coincidence or not, not to stay in the front bench. Lest Hansard get this incorrectly for posterity, I want it to be known that I am referring only to the tonsorial operation, if that is what a clean shave means. There is nothing beyond that. We are delighted with the changes that can be made, and as one who could never grow even a half decent moustache, I admire him for the versatility he is able to display.

• (1435)

Senator Donahoe: He was beginning to lose face. He had to do it.

Senator Macquarrie: Whether he should or should not, since it is such a pleasant afternoon, I would not like to engage upon the argument.

I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government—

Senator Argue: I am so disappointed.

Senator Macquarrie: —and I must confess that we may at times be unfair to those ministers. We tend to load upon the three of them questions which their far more numerous colleagues in the other place often, in my judgment, make a poor hand at answering. Perhaps there must and should be, or could be, some better way of having more direct information for this chamber. In other words, there is no reason why we should expect Senator Perrault to be able to, or need to, tell us all that is going on in the government. Perhaps the less he knows about some of it the better—but that is just an off-the-cuff remark.

I should like to say, in my question to the Leader of the Government, that something that has disturbed me more than anything since I have come to this illustrious chamber, and more than anything for a long time, concerns recent reports, particularly documented in the last issue of University Affairs, to the effect that the post-secondary institutions in this country are facing a very bleak future. It is to the effect that the Social Development Committee of the cabinet is now looking at a proposal which, in one fell, outrageous swoop will reduce the contributions of this government to post-secondary education from $3 billion to $1.5 billion.

I say right now, if I may integrate it in a question, that this country can do without that kind of austerity, and that our universities cannot tolerate that sort of thing. I am sure that Senator Hicks, who was here a moment ago, and Senator Cameron are not the only ones who will feel outraged by this. I would ask our friend, the honourable government leader, our representative in the cabinet, as he should properly be described, if he could convey to his cabinet colleagues our sense of anxiety, outrage, concern and fear that such a project will for a moment be contemplated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I suggest that if honourable senators became outraged every time a rumour surfaced in a magazine about some alleged anticipated action by the government, the chamber would be in a constant state of outrage and turmoil.

Senator Grosart: Aren't you?

Senator Frith: We are not.

Senator Perrault: May I point out that we are not? Indeed, earlier this afternoon the minister was described as being sanguine. It seems to me that there should be a greater degree of moderation and sanguineness among honourable senators. I have not read the article referred to by Senator Macquarrie. Perhaps he will be good enough to provide me with a copy.

I can say that certainly to my knowledge there are no Draconian cutbacks in grants to universities being anticipated. However, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if the minister is telling me that University Affairs, one of the most prestigious intellectual journals in the country, is totally wrong in this, I shall be delighted to have them wrong on this matter of such significance to our young people and our basic educational institutions. If the events in future prove that I am wrong, that will be a small price for me to pay, although, like most politicians, I have a degree of vanity, but to be wrong in such a good cause, honourable senators, I shall be delighted. I shall count on the Leader of the Government to prove University Affairs wrong, and his government, on this issue, at least, not wrong by tinkering with that which at the present time is pretty good.

Senator Perrault: We shall not insist on the honourable senator's entering the chamber in sackcloth and ashes if he is proven to be incorrect and his fears ill-founded. However, in view of the honourable senator's distinguished academic career, and his demonstrated concern, over the years, for standards of excellence in our institutions of higher learning, I know that he will acknowledge the superb record of this government in assisting institutions of higher learning down through the years. I assure him of the continuing interest on the part of this government in promoting academic excellence.

● (1440)

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am inspired to say, I think by legitimate interpolation, that the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent and the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson were distinguished friends of education, and did splendid things for the universities of this country. I will grease my palms and be ready to applaud that which the minister suggests, but I will not take a full dose any time, because I have very sensitive palms, being a thin-skinned man.

Senator Murray, a little while ago—on an interpolation from another minister, when I said that the Conservative Party always has plenty of hope, otherwise it would not be what it is—said "but with perhaps too much piety," and I demurred from agreeing with him completely on the piety part, because, at my age, dare I repudiate anything that may help me later on?

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I am having a great deal of difficulty trying to keep my head above this sea of verbiage on this most important question.

Yesterday I received a delayed answer from the Deputy Leader of the Government, on behalf of the Minister of State for Economic Development, in reply to a question I asked on January 24 with regard to the changing of heating systems at the industrial park under the aegis of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

While not completely happy with the answer, I would like to proceed further and ask the minister if he would take it upon himself to ascertain what plans are going ahead for the approximately 20 employees who will be relieved of their jobs because of this change. What assistance will be provided for them by the Cape Breton Development Corporation? I would also like to ask if there are any alternative jobs to which they may be assigned.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has the duty of developing industry and providing employment. Under them, the Cape Breton Development Corporation also had the mandate to provide employment. I was wondering if the honourable minister could find out what can be done for those who will be displaced.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will try to find out if there is available some information along the lines my honourable friend has requested that is directly related to those employees; but I think my honourable friend ought also to take into account the fact that there are large amounts of coal being used for the thermal generation of electrical power, and, of course, what that means is that there will be more jobs rather than less, in total. That does not entirely satisfy the immediate problem of those employees at the industrial park, but I will try to obtain that information.

Senator Muir: A supplementary, honourable senators. I agree with the minister, to a certain extent, that more jobs will be created by the thermal generation of power; but that does not assist those who may be on the street after many years of service with the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last Tuesday I asked him what was the rush on the part of the Canadian government to re-establish our embassy in Tehran, and he told me that there had been no rush. On the other hand, I read a statement, reported in the Gazette of January 28, attributed to one Mr. Nabavi, an Iranian minister, to the effect that there had been a request by the Canadian government to re-establish such an embassy, and that the government had asked for a guarantee of security before doing so. Which of the two statements is correct?

I would also like to know whether we have received a guarantee from Iran concerning security for the staff, and if so, what the value of it is if, for instance, Iranian students were to make a raid on the Canadian embassy in Tehran.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if in fact such a statement was made by the Executive Affairs Minister of Iran, I suppose it is a case of whether one accepts the credibility of Canadian statements or Iranian statements. May I say, however, that the assertion by the Iranian Executive Affairs Minister that Canada has asked to send diplomats back to Iran is completely without foundation. As I have stated before on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the government believes there is no urgency in activating our embassy in Tehran. Before we make any decision on this we shall have to assess carefully the degree of risk to our staff there.

Similarly, there is no foundation to the statement made by Minister Nabavi that we have asked for Iranian assurances on the safety of the staff we eventually send back. The Iranian government is already party to the Vienna Conventions on the immunity of diplomatic staff. However, it would be equally important for us to assess over the coming months whether the Iranian government is really willing or able to live up to its obligations. This is a key consideration, and the honourable senator touched upon this in his question.

In stipulating that Canada should not itself engage in certain activities, and I quote the minister's words, "kidnapping, transferring people secretly and engaging in espionage," the government assumes that Mr. Nabavi was talking about the sheltering and extrication of the six Americans. We do not see any need whatsoever to give assurances on this score to the Iranians or anyone else. We consider that what we did to assist persons entitled to the protection of international law was fully justified from a legal as well as a humanitarian standpoint.

[Senator Olson.]

May I express, on behalf of the government, the hope that circumstances similar to those that existed between November, 1979 and January, 1980, when the six Americans took refuge with Canada, will not arise in the future.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, unless Senator Denis has a further question as a supplementary to his most excellent and perceptive main question, may I ask a supplementary of the minister so that we may have this matter clarified as fully as possible? Can he advise me if any discussions have taken place between the Iranian and Canadian governments on this matter, and if at any time any representative of the Government of Canada has entertained, listened to or accepted the suggestions made currently by Mr. Adeli, the Chargé d'Affaires, that the basis upon which the resumption of full diplomatic relations would be entertained was the repudiation of what he calls "kidnapping and helping to escape"? I think this is very important, and I think Senator Denis must think so too. This is a matter that must be outside the purview of any discussions, formal or informal.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, events are moving fairly rapidly and, because of that, that question will be taken as notice; but I have been provided with material as of this afternoon on this particular subject, and I did make reference to the reported allegation that Canada, as a condition of having its embassy reactivated in Iran, must not engage in "kidnapping people secretly and engaging in espionage." I have just been given the official statement on that matter. More material will be obtained, however, if it becomes available.

I do have some additional material which has just come to hand on the question of the protection of Canadian interests in Iran. Perhaps that should be provided to the Senate as well.

Since February, 1980 the Danish embassy in Tehran has been providing emergency consular assistance to the 30 Canadians and dependants still residents in Tehran, as well as to visiting Canadians. It has also attended to administrative and visa questions on our behalf. The assistance of the Danish embassy people has been magnificent, and we are greatly in their debt.

Since Canada has never broken off diplomatic relations with Iran, the Danes are not in a formal sense our "protecting power" in Iran. However, in order to protect our property and local staff, they have, with our full knowledge and acquiescence, established a de facto "Canadian interest section" in the Danish embassy, by posting a notice to this effect outside the embassy and by temporarily installing a Danish diplomat in our official residence. We are very grateful for that kind of co-operation.

Some members of our mostly Iranian local staff have been laid off, but approximately 13, excluding part-time contract gardeners and watchmen, are still on the payroll. They have continued to be employed under the supervision of the Danes in handling immigration and visitor visa applications, helping visiting Canadians, maintaining Canadian-leased property and Canadian-owned vehicles, furnishings and so on.

The requirement for local staff has been kept under review in consultation with the Danes. We have not laid off more staff because at various times a solution to the hostage crisis seemed sufficiently close that we wished to have experienced staff on hand with which eventually to resume operations in Tehran. We will, of course, continue to keep this question under review.

• (1450)

Honourable senators, I have additional information on Canadian trade with Iran, about which questions were asked earlier in this chamber. I have sought and have just received today's latest statement on that.

Between January and November, 1980 Canada exported $Can40.5 million of goods to Iran, compared to $Can22.4 million in 1979. In actual fact, there was a substantial increase in Canadian exports to Iran in 1980. Wheat worth $Can29.9 million was by far the largest element in this trade. Flour worth $Can1.3 million and pharmaceuticals worth $Can3.2 million were other major items. Wheat and pharmaceuticals were among those items which were specifically exempted from sanctions at the time the export embargo was announced on May 22, 1980.

No country imposing sanctions, including the United States, placed an official embargo on the shipment to Iran of humanitarian items such as food and medicine during the period of the crisis.

The remainder of the $Can40.5 million consisted of goods exempted from sanctions or shipped before permits were required by the imposition of our export embargo.

This is all the material that has come to my attention today. As I stated earlier, the additional questions asked by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie will be taken as notice and answers will be sought.

Senator Macquarrie: Thank you.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. G. I. Smith: I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development arising out of the exchange between us yesterday, which can be found on pages 1583 and 1584 of Hansard. In particular, he expressed considerable confidence that the Alaska Highway gas pipeline guarantees—or whatever word you want to use—upon which we rely, from the United States are still as good as they were previously. My question has to do with confidence regarding the financing of the pipeline. I suppose that if one is confident, as the minister appeared to be yesterday, that the pipeline is going to go ahead as planned, and one can rely on the United States to do that, one has to have confidence in the financing thereof. This leads me to ask: Is the minister able to say whether there are any assurances that, if private financing is insufficient to do the job, the United States government will provide such further guarantees or other financial assistance as may be necessary to see that the pipeline is completed on time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot give a definitive answer to a question which has never been asked. The question of whether the United States government needs to underwrite the financing of the pipeline has never been put to the United States government in that form. The sponsors of the pipeline, with the support of the producers of the gas on the North Slope, have indicated that they will be able to put together a financing package sufficient to complete the entire line. My honourable friend should also know that there have been four major sponsors added to those already involved in the pipeline, including TransCanada PipeLine.

With the support that has been given by the producers—and there are several major companies involved in that consortium, if I may use that term,—we do not have any information which would lead us to believe that all these major, financially-strong companies are unable to finance the whole project. That is why I say that the United States government, or the Congress, has not been asked to underwrite the financing.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman. I certainly hope, as I am sure we all do, that his confidence turns out to be justified in the event. Perhaps I could ask him if the government has a target or an opinion as to the date on which the construction of the Alaskan portion of the pipeline will begin.

Senator Olson: No, I cannot give that date now, although perhaps after some inquiries I shall be able to. What I can say is that the activity leading to the completion of the engineering requirements and the design, both for the Alaskan portion of the pipeline and the pre-conditioning plant, which is also essential, has been going along at a greatly accelerated pace. Indeed, from our observations, it would appear that they are doing all things and such things as are necessary to meet the undertakings they gave, which is that the line will be ready for operation by the end of 1985.

Senator Smith: Perhaps I could ask the minister whether it was the target date, or the opinion as to the probable date, when we were discussing the prebuild a few months ago, that the Alaskan portion would be under construction sometime in the winter of 1983.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure from memory, but I will check that and try to give my friend an answer.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—APPEAL BOARD

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Some time ago he told us that there would be an appeal board with regard to applications under the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program, and I now have the information sheet giving further details on that appeal board. I am very happy to see that it is functioning. I note, however, that its office is in Regina, and that the members of the board I see listed are Saskatchewan residents. It is not that I have anything against Saskatchewan, but in this particular case much of the drought problem was in the province of Manitoba.

I wonder if the minister could indicate to me what procedures or arrangements there are for farmers not resident in Saskatchewan. I presume the board will deal with all of them, but Regina is a considerable distance from Manitoba. Is there Manitoba representation on the board or any arrangement for farmers to appear and appeal before people from their own province?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): In reply to Senator Molgat, I can say that the appeal board is composed of eight producers: one from Alberta, three from Saskatchewan, two from Manitoba, and two from Ontario. I suppose one reason there are three members from Saskatchewan and only one from Alberta is that there was very little drought in the province of Alberta. The drought area was largely in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The two representatives from Manitoba are Norman Edie, past president of the Manitoba Beef Producers Association and a beef producer himself; and Ray Sigurdson, a retired dairy farmer, reeve of the Regional Municipality of Gimli, and president of the Interlake Development Corporation. One of the producers from Ontario is Telford Advent, a beef producer and a director of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, and the other is Irving Skene, a beef producer. From Alberta there is Mr. Clarence Jesperson, a beef producer and reeve of the Municipality of Taber. The chairman of the board is Clarence Hookenson, president of the Saskatchewan Municipal Hail Corporation, a beef producer and grain farmer, and past president of the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture. He is also a member of the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee. Other members are: Mr. Evans Thordarson, a beef producer and president of the Western Canada Cow/Calf Association; and Mr. Hans Seitz, who is acting as operations manager and who is a dairy producer and president of the Saskatchewan Milk Producers Association.

● (1500)

I might say that there are many appeals to be dealt with. When considering the type of person who should be on such an appeal board, I was firm in my recommendation that it should include livestock producers, beef producers and dairy producers; that it should be sympathetic to those appealing to it; and that it should not be comprised solely of people learned in the law or retired civil servants. Personally, I wanted the board loaded on the side of the beef producers; I wanted it to be sympathetic to them and to be just as determined as I am that payment would be made whenever a reasonable case was presented. As a consequence, the beef producers, as they should, have full confidence in the personnel of the board.

The board's offices in Regina are located at 540 Midtown Centre. The telephone number is 359-6695.

An Hon. Senator: What's her name?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Argue: Well, you know, honourable senators, in the past Regina has been passed over, but perhaps Regina should not be entirely forgotten.

I should inform honourable senators that the offices of the appeal board have been situated a reasonable distance from the PFRA offices in order to assure producers that the appeal board is taking an unbiased and independent look at the many appeals now before it. The board is so constituted that three members can deal with appeals. An office has been established in Brandon to undertake the appeals in that area. That office will operate with at least three members of the appeal board, which should be a sufficient number to undertake the appeals there. I certainly support that idea.

A moment ago I gave you the address of the operation in Regina. That may not seem very revolutionary to you, but it was revolutionary in some respects in that previously there had been only a Zenith number to call. We have decided that, even if the mails are slow, it is necessary for people to know its location. We have, therefore, given it an accurate address and proper facilities. Although I have not been on the premises, I understand that the facilities are excellent and that the staff is now working full-time. Obviously, there will be many appeals to deal with, and it may be necessary to make recommendations to Treasury Board to modify the rules. If that is necessary, it should be done.

I should add, for the information of honourable senators, that the matter of bringing in PMU units and dairy goats was approved by a cabinet committee, and a submission is being taken to Treasury Board. I am optimistic; I think we can get that through Treasury Board. As a member, I will certainly be promoting it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am fairly intimidated. I had intended to ask my honourable friend a supplementary question with respect to his board, which at one time is "loaded" and which at another time is "unbiased and independent." I don't know how he accomplishes that marvellous balance. However, I am intimidated, as I have said, and I will not say a word about his board.

GRAIN

NEGOTIATIONS RE CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board about a subject in which both he and I have an abiding interest, and that is the Crow rate. I see that he has been dealing with that matter recently in western Canada. He produced a very interesting suggestion, if the reports of his speeches are correct.

The Canadian-Press says:

> The Saskatchewan senator also emphasized his view that negotiations on the rail rates for grain movement named after the 1897 Crowsnest Pass Agreement should be handled in secret to increase chances of success.

My question is: Who would he recommend be invited to this secret meeting?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Well, I don't intend to get into that. All I was endeavouring to say was that negotiations of a sensitive nature like this should be held in camera. Very often I think that is necessary. I do not think they should always be held in front of a television camera. If "secret" is the word used, perhaps that is not the best word to use. I think they should be confidential meetings. I do not think everything has to be open to the press. My honourable friend may disagree with me if he likes, but I really feel that very often much greater progress can be made in meetings held in camera.

In my short experience in the cabinet, and in my short experience in dealing with a number of important questions, I feel that if you bring people of goodwill together in camera, you can often accomplish more than by having a meeting that is open to the press on all occasions. That is exactly what I meant.

Senator Deschatelets: If you want a secret meeting, you might hold it in the Senate.

Senator Argue: Just so long as there is no press; that's all.

Senator Roblin: That is a very eloquent defence of the principle of secret agreements secretly arrived at. I am interested to know that this new philosophy is starting to make headway in the ranks of the present cabinet. But perhaps that is not new. Secrecy has been one of their fortes for a long time.

I want to tell my honourable friend that if he thinks secret negotiations in the matter of the Crow will satisfy the affected people in western Canada, he may be disappointed. As the people at the meeting told him after he had made his speech, they will want to see some action and they will want to see the federal government taking the lead. They will want to see this matter discussed openly and frankly, because it is far too important to be disposed of in such an unsuitable fashion as that.

Having expressed my opinion on that point, I go on to ask my honourable friend another question. He has floated again, as he has so many times in the past, the proposition that before the railways can have more money there should be an independent inquiry. Leaving aside the merits of the point, I ask my honourable friend what the policy of the government is. Several times he has mentioned this independent inquiry into railways before the Crow is settled. If he really intends to do it, why does he not get on with it? He has been talking about it for four or five months.

Senator Argue: Who is "he"?

Senator Roblin: You!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: All right.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend! I could say "Saskatchewan Hazen, the Saskatchewan Boy Scout." I don't know how else I would describe him.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: Anyway, he has been most assiduous in this matter and he has intrigued me; he has attracted my interest. If he intends to have an inquiry of that sort—and I leave the merits of it to one side—he should get on with it. What is he going to do?

Senator Argue: It is not my responsibility, and I don't suppose that is news to the honourable senator who is making the inquiry. I believe making such a proposal is really the responsibility of the Minister of Transport. But certainly I support a public inquiry—an inquiry not held in camera in this case. That proposition was supported by an overwhelming vote at the recent national convention of the Liberal Party of Canada. It has been strongly supported by my colleague, the Minister of State for Economic Development. I believe it has substantial support within the cabinet. But a decision has not yet been taken, and I am not able to say when such a decision might be taken.

I do not hesitate to make my position clear. As the honourable senator has suggested, it is a kind of old record which I have been playing for the last few months, and I intend to keep playing it, because I intend to stay with that position.

Senator Donahoe: For a few more months!

Senator Argue: Whatever it takes! I will stand by that position because, in my opinion, such an inquiry has tremendous merit and should be pursued.

Senator Roblin: Doesn't my honourable friend realize that he is contributing to the climate of uncertainty in the whole of this Crow situation? For example, how could he possibly ask the people who were at his meeting the other day to decide the matter for themselves, rather than having it decided by means of a government stated policy? How could he tell the farm groups to settle their own issue themselves, when the extremely important issue that he has raised in connection with examination of the rail situation is still up in the air, floating around, uncertain, unsettled? My honourable friend has a responsibility to contribute to the solution of the problem and not to confuse it. I would ask him to keep that in mind.

• (1510)

Senator Argue: Well, now, that is a nice lecture from Senator Roblin! I have no intention whatsoever of retracting my recommendation that there should be a CP inquiry; I believe it is absolutely necessary. If the honourable senator thinks it confuses the issue and leaves everything up in the air, that is okay; that is his opinion.

I believe the producers of western Canada, who have a great, historic stake in this, should be able to find out how much CP has made on all those millions of acres of mineral rights it has and holds; the money flow that is coming in; the profit that is coming from them; and the asset value. If you are a railroad, you can say, "Okay, let's get rid of the Crowsnest rate. You have got to change it; it is obsolete." But there is no suggestion from the CP that the arrangements made back in a somewhat similar time should not be looked at and perhaps changed. I think what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander.

If the government is even going to consider putting an extra cost on to the producers of western Canada, it should look at the CP. In my humble judgment, the CP is more capable of paying than the wheat producers of western Canada.

I make no apologies, certainly not to the honourable senator, for having gone to that meeting and saying to the grain producers and the livestock producers that it is better for them to take some responsibility and leadership and not try to palm it all off on the government. They have seen what happens. It is all right for my honourable friend to make suggestions to the government, but once the government inquiry starts and the task force is established, will there be support for the task force from my honourable friend? Of course not. There will be criticism as soon as it is established. He won't like the personnel; he won't like the travelling schedule; if there is an in camera meeting, he will be against it; and if it is an open meeting he will say that it won't work.

We are not going to get any support from western provincial governments or the opposition when we start down this road. All I said to the grain producers and the livestock producers, who have so much at stake, was that if they could agree among themselves on the stand the government should take in regard to a change, if any—and I am not sure there should be any change—then that would be a much more satisfactory way to proceed than to send a task force out in orbit, only to have provincial governments and the Conservative party saying, "Well, aren't we in great shape? We have the Constitution out there and we can really raise hell about that, and we can get our separatist meetings going with prominant Conservatives."

Senator Murray: Careful now!

Senator Argue: I don't have to be careful, I am just putting some facts on the record—but I can leave them; that's okay. Maybe the Tories in Saskatchewan are a different breed than they are in Ontario. I think they are.

Senator Grosart: Go on!

Senator Argue: When the Unionist Party wants a leader, it goes to the Saskatchewan legislature and it gets the Conservative leader, and he converts himself into a separatist pretty fast.

Senator Murray: What about converting yourself?

Senator Argue: I have always been a Canadian. I think it is a good country and the Tories can flirt with separatism, their members can be converted, and they can send well-known Tories to stir up a separatist meeting for Knutson out in Saskatchewan—that's okay with me. I am a Canadian, and I will stay that way. I am very happy to have given what I think was some rather constructive advice to my many and good friends in the farm movement in western Canada who have worked with me so closely. I used the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program, with the kind of people on the appeal board, as a way to do business. It is the Liberal way; it is not the Conservative way.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: If I had the same thin political skin as my honourable friend, I would be on my feet complaining about his unwarranted slander of a great Canadian political party. I would, indeed, take umbrage at that, but I take note of who is making the remark. I know that kind of remark is just a little airy persiflage by which he seeks to shroud the real issues which are under consideration.

I want to remind my honourable friend that he is not in the opposition; I want to remind my honourable friend that he is not a backbencher; I want to remind my honourable friend that he is a minister of the Crown, and that involves certain responsibilities. One of those responsibilities is the responsibility for policy. If he is intending to deal with the Crow, either by secret meetings—which I see he is going to back off from now—

Senator Argue: In camera.

Senator Roblin: —or by his new study of the railway rates, or by some task force which I have heard nothing about so I am not able to complain about it, in spite of the rodomontade of my friend, as a minister of the Crown it is his duty to pay attention to policy; it is his responsibility to stand up for the things he is supporting and get his cabinet colleagues to support them. It is no part of the constitutional process that I know to have a minister such as my honourable friend going around the country making these statements and then disclaiming any cabinet reponsibility for them. His duty is to lead. It is perfectly true that he cannot go so far ahead of his troops that they are not following; it is perfectly true that he does not want to exacerbate regional feeling on most points—on those points I do not quarrel with him; but I do not think he did any good on that subject here this afternoon.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: Insofar as his goal is concerned, I am not going to fault him on that because I believe in it and I believe that he is a good Canadian. However, I tell him that he is doing Canada no good by making the kind of speech he has made today.

I would suggest to him that if he has a policy he wants to promote in connection with the Crow, he should remember that he is speaking as a government minister, with the power and authority to carry out the policy of the government. Then people will respect his party. I can tell him that they do not respect his party now in western Canada, but I will keep out of that argument because it is not germane to what we are saying here. I merely want my friend to be responsible for his policies and to make sure that they represent the view of the government and that they are not mere kite-flying on the part of my honourable friend.

Senator Argue: After that nice lecture from my honourable friend, I would tell him that I don't need that kind of lecture. I am willing to operate in this chamber and in this country on the basis of my parliamentary experience, which includes 18 years in the House of Commons.

Senator Grosart: Oh, dear, dear!

Senator Argue: Oh dear—oh, yes. The Tories think it is okay if you are over there, but if you are over here it is, "Oh dear, dear!"

I have heard the lecture, and I consider my position to be very responsible. I have accomplished many things of which I am very proud since I came into the cabinet a few months ago. I am not saying that the government has a policy until the government does have a policy. I have not been one to forecast when policies will be arrived at. The policies are under consideration. I take my position and make my recommendations, and when the cabinet has decided on a policy, that will be the policy for all the members of the cabinet. I don't know how the Tories operate.

Senator Grosart: Do stop that nonsense.

Senator Argue: In the government of which I am a member, the ministers are not throttled.

Senator Grosart: You are in the Senate, not on a soap box.

Senator Argue: I am in the government.

Senator Grosart: You are not on a street corner.

Senator Argue: More lectures now; more interruptions.

Senator Grosart: Who is complaining about interruptions?

Senator Argue: I am not complaining; I am just pointing it out.

I hope that in the days ahead I will be able to make further statements in this house. I also hope to have the literature circulated in both English and French. I further hope to be able to make another announcement before too long to go along with the announcement made yesterday concerning the huge figure of $450 million. You know, the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

AGRICULTURE

IMPORTATION OF RACCOON DOGS—HAZARDS

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government and it does not concern the Crow; it concerns another kind of animal.

Some months ago 135 creatures called "raccoon dogs" were imported into Canada by a fur farm in Ontario. These dogs are not raccoons, although they look like them since they have the same markings and they are also omnivorous—they eat everything.

These animals were originally introduced by the Russians because of their fur value. They have proliferated at a great pace in Europe, since they have litters of about 20 puppies. They are now sweeping from Romania right across Europe and are expected to arrive in western Europe because they are very hardy, propagate rapidly and are omnivorous.

There is a real fear, particularly in my province, that if any of these animals escape and breed, because they are not indigenous, they will destroy our indigenous animals, as has happened in other countries. I would also remind you that if you bring in from other countries animals which do not belong in your country, you create problems such as occurred with the importation of the rabbit into Australia and the mongoose into Barbados.

I would remind honourable senators that rabies is endemic in eastern Ontario and in parts of Quebec, and if these dogs escape—and it is very likely that some of them will—we shall be in a very difficult situation.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us what has been done to prevent more of these animals being imported, and also what effort is being made to destroy the existing animals and to compensate their owners?

● (1520)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Bird for giving me notice of this question. May I say at the outset that there is no official government policy on the matter as yet. The material which I have been able to gather at this point is unofficial. It represents only some of the preliminary thinking of the various government departments.

I can assure the honourable senator that the subject is being followed with interest by several of those departments, including the Department of Agriculture, the Department of National Revenue, and the Department of the Environment. There is presently consultation going on involving those departments, I understand, with a view to an eventual revision of Customs Tariff (C), which would, in effect, include all non-native species of animals and specifically exempt those that could be imported.

In this specific case, I can say that the animals involved appear to meet with all set health standards, including rabies vaccinations. There is some controversy as to whether or not these so-called raccoon dogs could pose a threat to native fauna if they were to escape.

Apparently, there were two incidents of escape in Europe, and the animals are doing very well indeed. However, I am informed that if such an escape occurred in Canada the animals could conceivably head south to a warmer climate. So it is not beyond possibility that they would head for some southern American state—perhaps Florida. The problem seems to be that we know of no cases in North America where the animals have escaped and have done well.

I hope that this is of help to the honourable senator. Again, may I say that this information has not been cleared with all ministers' offices involved, but it is preliminary material that has been received from officials of these departments. I would be pleased to furnish appropriate material provided by ministers if and when it becomes available.

Senator Bird: I have a supplementary question. I am doubtful that they will take flight to Florida, because I have been told by the mammalogists at the National Museum of Science that these animals partially hibernate. They come from Finland, which has a climate similar to that of Canada and is not a bit like that of Florida. It seems that they would adapt themselves well to Canada. I ask the minister to continue to bring pressure on the government so that something is done about this menace.

Senator Perrault: While no such action is contemplated at the present time, apparently the Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources encouraged this project. There was no alarm raised, as I understand it, until four or five weeks before the dogs were due to be imported. The owner of the farm has invested approximately $100,000 in excellent facilities. However, the Canadian Wildlife Service remains very concerned and is closely monitoring the situation.

HERD MAINTENANCE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—APPEAL BOARD

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I had a supplementary question to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board before the interesting interlude which occurred.

I thank him for his statement regarding the appeal procedures. I gather now that Manitoba producers will be able to make their appeal to the office in Brandon. That will certainly be helpful to them.

I thank him as well for his reply to my question of some time ago regarding the PMU producers. I hope that the final decision of Treasury Board in that regard will not be long in coming.

Insofar as the appeals are concerned, will there be some way of notifying those farmers who have been rejected that they can appear in person? I ask this because of the necessity of having broad rules. As I understand it, these are based on the average rainfall which occurred in a certain district at a certain time. The weather stations are not always as widely distributed as they might be, and there are areas of the province with serious problems that have been disqualified. If there were a possibility of these farmers knowing that their cases were coming up and knowing that they could appear with evidence from their region, I think this would give an opportunity for fair treatment to the people who have been rejected.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): As far as the office in Brandon is concerned, I want to make it clear that I am not certain whether a decision has been made to put a branch of the appeal board in Brandon. I do not want to mislead the honourable senator, because that is something that the appeal board will decide itself in consultation with the PFRA offices.

There might be good reason for them to be located in Regina because all the data is there. If having an office in Brandon is more convenient for the producers in the Brandon area, and will assist them in having their claims processed, then I think that is a logical thing to do.

As far as individual appeals are concerned, as I understand it, a letter over the signature of the chairman of the board has gone out to all of those who have been rejected to give them the address and explain the appeal procedure. That says that whether individuals appear in person or not, the board will be looking at all the rejections. They will automatically be looking at them. They will be approving, I would hope, a substantial number of those which have been rejected without a formal appeal, and without the appearance of the individual farmers.

The board has also agreed that before any application is rejected finally there will be a notice or letter sent out to this effect: "We have reviewed your application and it is our intention to reject it. If you wish to make an appeal in person, that opportunity will be provided."

It can be understood that, with a great many appeals, it might be physically difficult to handle every one personally, but I am confident that anyone wishing to appeal and take his case to the board will be able to do so. The board is endeavouring to look at all rejections in a sympathetic manner.

What my honourable friend has said about rainfall is absolutely correct. There is not a rain gauge on every farm. Sometimes the rain gauges are some distance apart, and the rain does not follow the rain gauges.

I have argued this with the officials time and time again. That is a good point and the producers understand it, even if my honourable friends opposite do not. This will be considered, as far as I am concerned. Unless rain gauges are on every farm in respect of which application has been made, consideration should be given to what is very often probable—namely, that the rainfall on the farm was not the same as the rainfall recorded some distance away.

THE CONSTITUTION

REFORM OF THE SENATE—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have good news and bad news for the Senate. The good news is that I am not going to make the speech that I had intended to make later this afternoon on the inquiry standing in my name.

An Hon. Senator: Reconsider.

An Hon. Senator: Explain.

Senator Murray: I shall put that off until we meet again. The bad news is that I have another question, this one for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I want to ask it now since we will not be sitting next week and since, when we return, we will probably have before us the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Will the government leader report to us on the negotiations that have apparently been taking place between the Minister of Justice and members of the Senate concerning possible amendments to the government's resolution as it affects this house?

I ask the question in view of references to those negotiations made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in the course of a press conference held with Canadian journalists while he was overseas.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the way the Minister of Justice has been in continuing contact with various members of the Senate with respect to this very important constitutional package is very heartening.

Senator Donahoe: We never heard from him.

Senator Perrault: Certainly, the contribution by members of the Senate, from both the government side and the opposition side, to the special joint committee has been quite outstanding. A number of comments have been made about the excellence of Senate participation.

I have discussed with the Minister of Justice certain questions arising from the Senate report prepared by the subcommittee of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. The views expressed by members of that subcommittee through the report have been of great interest to the Minister of Justice and other members of the government. A number of ideas based upon the report and other sources have been studied in relation to the constitutional package.

Senator Murray: The Right Honourable the Prime Minister referred specifically to negotiations that were taking place between the Minister of Justice and the Senate. He alluded, as well, to specific propositions that were being made with his—that is to say, the Prime Minister's—authorization by the minister to the Senate.

I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate now to advise us of the nature of those propositions and who represented the Senate in these negotiations with the Honourable the Minister of Justice.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure, are aware of the fact that there has been a great deal of consultation involving not only members of Parliament from both houses but various individuals representing organizations from coast to coast. A number of senators, including those in opposition—

Senator Murray: Including?

Senator Perrault: —including those in opposition have discussed, from time to time, the role of the Senate in Canada. That has been the principal nature of the discussions with the minister. There is no final draft of any proposal in existence. Perhaps the future role of the Senate and its place in the new Constitution are matters that could be discussed with the opposition at some point.

Senator Murray: I do not want to pursue this too far, or further than is necessary, but we are not getting much information from the leader on a matter that the Prime Minister felt quite free—quite free—to talk about in discussions with journalists on board his plane on January 13 while en route from Dakar to Brasilia.

Reference was made by the Prime Minister to "negotiations" with the Senate, and reference was made by him to the "few" senators who are not satisfied, and he went on to say that he did not know whether the particular proposition that was being made by the Minister of Justice, with his authorization, would satisfy those "few" senators who are not satisfied, et cetera, et cetera. I could quote chapter and verse from the transcript. I will not do that, except to say that the Prime Minister was discussing the possibility of a specific amendment, or perhaps several specific amendments, relating to the Senate. Let me read a couple of sentences.

One of the problems is that some of the questions that were asked of the Prime Minister were inaudible for purposes of preparing the transcript, but the Prime Minister's response, which is in French—and I would ask the government leader to pay particular attention to what the Prime Minister said—was as follows:

[Translation]

> I must say frankly that this was one of the proposals put by Mr. Chrétien to the Senate—

I repeat "to the Senate".

> —with my authorization. I do not know what the situation is at the present time, but the reply to your question is yes, probably. This depends on other aspects of the negotiation—

Once again, I underline the word "negotiation".

> —but as for this particular idea which had been submitted, Mr. Chrétien and myself have examined it and have given our authorization. However, I cannot give you the exact details of these negotiations with the senators. What I am saying basically is that I do not know whether this would satisfy the few senators who are not satisfied, and if not, whether it would be worth it to make this particular change. And it is probably on this point that the negotiations are still going on.

[English]

The questions I put to the leader will, I think, be obvious, and will be of interest to all honourable senators, and they are: What proposition was the Prime Minister talking about? To whom was it made? Who was purporting to speak on behalf of the Senate in these negotiations?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there have been negotiations with the Honourable the Minister of Justice and discussions concerning such matters as the future of the Senate as presently constituted, the bicameral nature of Parliament, proposals for future change and reform in our parliamentary institutions, the relationship between the Senate and the Queen and the Office of Governor General, regional concerns and other matters of that kind.

When the Prime Minister made his statement, there was not any agreed upon proposal in existence. Discussions were, however, under way. There have been a number of senators who, as individuals, have been in contact with the Minister of Justice, and perhaps members of the opposition have written to the Minister of Justice, or perhaps they have communicated their ideas through their representatives who serve on the joint committee. Certainly, many submissions have been made with respect to the Senate.

The discussions with Mr. Chrétien have not been restricted solely to the position of the second chamber in Parliament. They have related to other matters of interest to honourable senators, such as referendum procedures and a number of other matters of the type which have been discussed at great length in the committee. The subject matter of these negotiations will be debated in this chamber once the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution is before us. I would welcome the opportunity to meet with the Leader of the Opposition to discuss with him his views with respect to the various sections of that committee report, including those sections relating to the Senate. Whatever meetings have been held, whatever negotiations have been held, they have been designed to make the position of the Senate on a number of matters better understood by Mr. Chrétien and other members of the government, and to enhance Canadian parliamentary democracy and the position of both houses of Parliament in that democracy.

Hon. Allister Grosart: I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government if there have been any undertakings made on behalf of the Senate in these negotiations.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I cannot say there is an official undertaking on behalf of the Senate. I think honourable senators have demonstrated in the past that they vote according to their consciences and according to their views, and I think most honourable senators are waiting for the report of the joint committee to appear. Honourable senators want to see what is in the report.

I would find it very difficult to give any ironclad guarantees or firm undertakings before a report has been prepared. That, it seems to me, would be a mindless type of guarantee. While I think many of us, through witnessing the committee proceedings, have some views as to some of the recommendations which may come from the joint committee, the report has yet to be written. When that report arrives in the Senate, then I think the senators of both parties represented here will be in a better position to decide what they are going to do. However, a formal undertaking delivered to the government with some ironclad guarantee is not in existence.

● (1540)

Senator Grosart: I have a supplementary. Has there been any kind of informal undertaking given of official support from the government majority in the Senate?

Senator Perrault: No.

Senator Grosart: I have a further supplementary. Would the Leader of the Government not agree that there appears to be an incongruity between his statement that it would be quite improper to enter into any undertakings while the matter is under consideration by a special joint committee, and his statement that negotiations are taking place in exactly the same context?

Senator Perrault: No, I do not think there is any incongruity.

[Senator Perrault.]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, despite the announcement by my friend and colleague, Senator Murray, that he is not in fact going to speak and therefore there is an hour or two available to us, I am not going to reopen the Question Period in any substantive way, but I would like to put forward what might be called housekeeping inquiries to my good friend, the Leader of the Government.

In light of the fact that we have a week free from our own deliberations, could he give me some undertaking as to when he might be able to provide an answer to the question I put on the order paper on May 16 last year in reference to Irish moss, and to another question of many weeks ago as to how many public servants were subsidized to go across the street and hear that modern and modest Metternich, Dr. Henry Kissinger.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, was there a question about Irish moss again? Let me assure honourable senators that after the question on "mossification" was asked the other day, or the status of Irish moss, I again inquired about it. I regret, indeed I am embarrassed, to say that the information has not been forthcoming. Apparently, the question is of a rather obscure nature. It entails a good deal of investigation to produce the information required by the honourable senator. I find it difficult to establish a plausible reason why the information has not been made available.

With regard to the suggestion that there was subsidization of various public servants to attend Mr. Kissinger's lecture, I know of no such subsidy.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, years ago at university I was called an incisive questioner, but I had no idea that I could bring the whole process of government information to a standstill for seven or eight months. I would like the honourable minister to obtain an answer to this Irish moss question a little before St. Patrick's so we can celebrate the good answer, and we will wait for the other answer about attendance at Dr. Kissinger's lecture.

Senator Perrault: At the rate of current progress it could be Orangemen's Day, July 12.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

POLAND—CANADIAN WHEAT EXPORTS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have some additional information regarding the question asked by Senator Haidasz yesterday referring to credit sales to Poland and so on. Poland today has an outstanding credit of some $725 million for the purchase of grain. Approximately $470 million of that credit has been used. The amount of credit being used is increasing rapidly as shipments are made under the government agreement for one to one-and-a-half million tonnes of grain annually in the next three years on the basis of credit. These sales and shipments commenced on January 1, 1980.

I have a table, honourable senators, which informs you of the quantity of grain that was exported to Poland under credit arrangements in each of the last number of years, and I would ask to have it made part of the record.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

RECOMBINANT DNA RESEARCH—REGULATION

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government, and it arises from the reports by Senator Bonnell and Senator Hicks on their attendance at the North Atlantic Assembly and the meeting of the Subcommittee on Genetic Manipulation.

Is the Government of Canada considering any form of guidelines concerning the recombinant DNA research that is taking place? I ask this because the draft report of the subcommittee which was presented by Mr. Robert McCrindle described a number of nations that do have such guidelines. Mr. McCrindle feels that the potential benefits heavily outweigh the risks, but he is not prepared to give the research a clean bill of health. He feels there should be a set of flexible guidelines concerning the safety of the research, because there is the possibility that dangerous pathogens could escape and have harmful effects. I know that the Medical Research Council has been working on a series of guidelines, and I wonder if we could learn how far they have gone, and what is the view of the government with respect to them.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question must be taken as notice because of the detail involved.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Just before the Orders of the Day are called, may I say that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will probably not be sitting next week. Consequently, Senator Smith has told me that he does not require authority to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Just to tie up that loose end, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs does have the power to sit during adjournments of the Senate, and I refer to the Minutes of May 1, 1980, at page 73, that reference having been given to me by the Clerk of the Senate, for which I thank him.

To complete the record, the following are the committees with power to sit during adjournments of the Senate: Agriculture; Constitution (Special Joint); Foreign Affairs; Health, Welfare and Science; Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration; National Finance; Northern Pipeline; Regulations and other Statutory Instruments; Retirement Age Policies; and Standing Rules and Orders.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Smith calling the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (The British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submitting that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask leave to tie up a loose end that was left dangling as a result of questions put by Senator Thompson at the conclusion of my intervention on this inquiry, which was the last intervention. I ask for leave because I am sure that Senator Smith is preparing a reply to my intervention, and he might as well have the whole target instead of nine-tenths of it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the question that Senator Thompson asked is found in the Debates of the Senate—

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not know how long the Honourable Senator Frith intends to speak, but I wish to inform the Senate that there might be a reason for proceeding as quickly as we can.

Senator Frith: I will be 10 to 15 minutes.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is my duty to inform the Senate that there is apparently a security problem in this building. So, if something happens, you will have been informed. I do not mind, because I will be sitting here all the time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am prepared to proceed. I may say, if I can speak to that question, that I do think it is a mistake for us to respond to that kind of threat, because I think it encourages more of the same, so I feel that we should just proceed. In any event, I will be that length of time, and if what has been announced persuades honourable senators that we should respond to this kind of thing I will not continue, but I think I should.

● (1550)

Some Hon. Senators: Continue.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the question that was asked by Senator Thompson will be found in the Debates of the Senate for January 15, 1981, at page 1535. In order to understand the question, I should briefly state the propositions upon which my intervention was based, and the footing for the conclusions I reached, that the reasoning in the British Columbia Reference case with regard to provincial rights to offshore minerals applies to the Province of Nova Scotia, so as to defeat any claim to such rights by that province.

The propositions are as follows: First, that we are not talking about the territory of a province, or its inland waters, bays and estuaries. Without any doubt, the rights with regard to those areas belong to the provinces under our Constitution. We are talking about the territorial sea, which is the sea and underwater three miles beyond the low water mark, in customary international law. In 1970 that was extended to 12 miles. However, that is not relevant to this inquiry because, whatever rights Nova Scotia has, it had as of 1867, when the territorial sea consisted of three miles.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, at this stage, after seeing what is left on the Orders of the Day, unless the Deputy Leader of the Government says it is so important that he must finish it, I shall adjourn the Senate. The debate can be resumed at another time. If by chance or bad luck something distasteful happens, you might find that I was perhaps imprudent in not informing you. Thank you for your understanding.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I do not know how important it is to Senator Frith that this information be available before we adjourn, but if he cares to ask that the comments he was about to make be taken as read and be placed in Hansard, and perhaps made available to Senator Smith, we would certainly have no objection.

Senator Frith: I thank the honourable senator. The observations I was about to make are not in form of a text. I was merely going to follow certain outlines or headings. The matter can be adjourned and I will deal with it at some other time, because it is not one that needs to be settled in the next week or two.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, February 9, 1981, at 8 p.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—EXTENSION OF REPORTING DATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Frith, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

That, notwithstanding any previous Order, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada shall complete its work and make its final report no later than February 13, 1981; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, I point out that the motion before us is virtually identical to that which was passed in the other place yesterday. By agreement of the leaders of all three major parties, that motion was not debated. I would ask that the same agreement be made here, so that the committee will have adequate time to complete its important work.

The motion will permit the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada properly to complete the fine work it has been doing, by extending the deadline for making its final report to February 13. I think most honourable senators share the view that the work of this committee, to which members of the Senate have contributed so much, has proceeded in the highest traditions of parliamentary dedication and excellence. As I say, it is hoped that the motion will permit the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada properly to complete its work and make a final report by February 13.

Some honourable senators may want to know exactly where the committee is in terms of its clause-by-clause study of the resolution. The information provided to the Senate is that as of 12:30 this afternoon committee members were through section 50 of the resolution, and that leaves sections 51 to 59 to be dealt with.

This request for a time extension is reasonable in light of the circumstances, and it is to be hoped that the committee will finish its work post haste. I therefore urge all honourable senators to support this motion so that the committee may complete its work and report back to Parliament as soon as possible.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has suggested that there be agreement that this motion be concurred in without debate. He has, however, made a statement on it, which, technically, under our rules, might constitute debate. I am sure he will not object to a statement from this side in response to his remarks.

Senator Perrault: Not at all.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I thank my honourable seatmate for his intervention, because I am glad to speak briefly to the motion that is before us.

Perhaps I ought to begin with a reference to one of our colleagues, Senator Austin. When the question of the procedure of the committee, and the time it would take to do its work, was before the subcommittee on its activities, I was present on one occasion and made an impassioned plea for an extension of time. It was proposed on that occasion—at least, the idea was floated; perhaps "proposed" is too strong a term—that we should meet all day Saturday and all day Sunday and continue our work under considerable pressure and a considerable head of steam. I asked Senator Austin if he would use his undoubted talents to secure an extension of the committee's time, and he has delivered the goods. I want to say that I much appreciate his intervention in this respect.

I should tell the house that at the same meeting of the committee the question of a debate on the motion that we have before us now came up, and although I may have exceeded my authority I was bold enough to say that there would be no extended comments on it from our side of the house, and I think that will be the case today.

The Honourable Senator Grosart, who has a special competence in these matters, has drawn my attention to the fact that the words "complete" and "final", referring to the work of the committee, are in the motion. Those words, I think, have appeared previously. So far as they go, of course, they are correct, but I think I should enter the caveat that there is provision, after we have received the complete and final report, for referring that report back to the committee, which would have to be specially revived for that particular purpose.

In order to make sure, therefore, that we have an understanding on that, Senator Grosart advised me to mention it, and I think that is a sound piece of advice.

Honourable senators, I am a member of the committee, and I appreciate the fact that we are being allowed more time in which to complete our work. We will proceed with all due despatch, and I am glad to support the motion.

● (1510)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, just for the record, regarding the procedural point that was added on behalf of Senator Grosart, I agree with his analysis, but I hope he will not think me picking virtually invisible nits when I say that technically the report would not be referred back to the same committee because any such referral would require a reconstitution of the committee. However, that is simply to complete what I think is generally understood on both sides, namely, that the procedure described by Senator Grosart is quite right, and no doubt he meant that to be included as a corollary thereto.

Senator Grosart: Of course, it was my intention to agree that there would be no debate.

Senator Roblin: Of course, if we must deal with these points of minutiae, the word is "revived." That is the word used in Beauchesne, so I think we would have to revive the same old dead body.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the bill that has just been read the first time will not, of course, be available for study by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee until it has received second reading. However, it has been our practice when dealing with complicated legislation, consistent with the parliamentary tradition that Senate committees give particularly careful consideration to such measures, to refer the subject matter to a committee in advance.

Senator Asselin: Has the subject matter of this bill not yet been referred?

Senator Frith: No, it has not.

Accordingly, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of the Bill C-54, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax", or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Hayden will not be here next week, but either Senator Barrow or Senator McIlraith will be able to chair the committee when it begins its advance study of this bill. The committee will be meeting next Tuesday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock, when officials of the Department of Finance will give their usual opening explanations and answer questions. That, in any event, is the plan.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I would ask honourable senators to note that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which was scheduled to meet at 5 o'clock on Monday afternoon, will now meet at 3 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

• (1515)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 10, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, because of the extension we have just given the Special Joint Committee to enable it to complete its deliberations, the intention is that the Senate sit on Tuesday evening instead of Monday evening, and that it sit at the usual hour on Wednesday and Thursday. It may be necessary to sit on Friday to receive the committee's report.

Senator Asselin: The committee may report before Friday.

Senator Frith: We hope it will report before Friday, but, if it does not the Senate may have to sit on Friday simply to receive the report. Having consulted with my honourable friends, I suggest that we would then adjourn until the following week.

I believe there is a good chance that the committee will present its report before the Friday deadline. The motion reads "not later than," so the committee can report at any time before February 13.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if an opinion has been obtained as to whether any legal or constitutional necessity exists for the Senate to be sitting at the time a special joint committee makes its report?

Senator Frith: I have asked for guidance on that matter, but I have not been given a precedent or a clear opinion on whether it is necessary for the Senate to be in session on the deadline date in order to receive the report of the committee. If I receive a firm opinion, I will share it with my honourable friend.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the deputy leader would share it with the Senate on the earliest possible occasion, because it is of some importance for us to know whether, having constituted with the House of Commons a special joint committee, we are committed to receiving the committee's report at any time the committee feels it necessary to report.

Surely, it is not correct to say that we must be sitting to receive the report of that committee immediately upon completion, because that does not seem to apply to any other committee.

Senator Frith: Perhaps I misunderstood. I am not suggesting that we have to be sitting when the committee is ready to report but it may be necessary to receive the report on the deadline date. In other words, if the committee is ready to report on Tuesday, we do not need to sit on Tuesday to receive the report, but the deadline is Friday and it may be that we will have to be present on Friday so that it cannot be said that the committee did not report by the deadline because the Senate was not sitting.

From preliminary advice I have received I do not think there is any such problem, but if I have anything more definite I will share that information.

● (1520)

Senator Grosart: I am suggesting that there surely cannot be such a problem because I do not see how any committee can tell the Senate or the House of Commons when they shall sit.

Senator Frith: No, but the problem is that the Senate and the House of Commons can tell the committee by what time it shall report.

Senator Grosart: Of course.

Senator Frith: "Report" in accordance with the wording we have, means "submit its report."

Senator Grosart: Yes.

Senator Frith: Therefore, if the Senate says to a committee, "Thou shalt submit thy report by a certain date," then the question is: Does the Senate have to sit to receive the report, at least by the time of the deadline that is set? In my opinion, it does not.

Senator Grosart: Agreed.

Senator Frith: However, I do not have a perfect answer to this yet.

Senator Lamontagne: Does the Deputy Leader of the Government think, if we receive the report before Friday, that the Senate should sit on Friday in order to accelerate the debate on its adoption?

Senator Asselin: Before Friday.

Senator Frith: I think that is a very good suggestion. We will have to discuss this when we see exactly what happens. However, I understand the point raised by Senator Lamontagne. Depending on what day of the week we do receive the report, we should give thought to whether we proceed with the debate.

The other issue that exists, of course, is that some senators may think we should wait for the debate in the other place to take place before we debate the matter here.

Senator Asselin: That is a good point.

Senator Frith: I do not share that opinion, but I respect the view of those who do, and I want to hear what they have to say about it. That is certainly included as part of the question raised by Senator Lamontagne.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not think there is any necessity to debate the last point at any length this afternoon because we do not yet know what the proposal from the other side will be.

I only wish to reserve my position because I have some doubt as to whether I am fully in accord with Senator Lamontagne on the point he put forward. I do think that we on this side would like to reserve our position to fully debate the matter when it comes up.

Motion agreed to.

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA AND PRIME MINISTER OF GREAT BRITAIN—NOTICE OF QUESTION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, it had been decided that there would be no question period today, and I respect that decision. I want to give the Leader of the Government verbal notice of an important question. So I give him notice now that next week I will ask him to make a formal statement on the contradictory statements made in the other place by the Prime Minister and other ministers regarding discussions with the Prime Minister and other ministers of Great Britain about the admissibility of the resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate on the Constitution. I therefore give notice that next week I will ask for a statement from the government.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the courtesy of Senator Asselin in giving me notice of his intention to ask a question respecting certain allegations that contradictory statements have been made. I hope to provide compelling evidence next week that there is nothing contradictory about the position of the government or the Prime Minister with respect to this matter.

Senator Asselin: I can tell you right now that I am not too sure.

Senator Steuart: Be of good faith.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 10, 1981, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 10, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR STANBURY

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I wish to speak briefly on a question of personal privilege pursuant to rule 34 of the Rules of the Senate.

Those of you who have seen or heard various reports in the Ontario media for the past ten days will understand the anxiety my family and I have experienced as a result of the false and misleading nature of those reports. Many of you have been kind enough to express to me, both by telephone and letter, your concern and confidence in me, and for this I am most grateful. These expressions have made me realize that I am not the first person in public life to have been subjected to such treatment over the years.

During the same ten days erroneous comments by two members in the other place have added to the confusion and innuendo relating to the situation.

The various comments that have been made in the media and in the other place relate to the application for incorporation of Astra Trust and falsely suggest that when I was president of the Liberal Party of Canada I used political influence to obtain the charter for that company.

The facts are as follows: I retired from the presidency of the Liberal Party of Canada in November, 1973, and at no time during the events under discussion was I president of the Liberal Party of Canada. Early in 1974 I resumed the practice of law with the firm with which I now practise. I had already been engaged in the practice of law for 25 years.

When that law firm agreed to act for the Astra group in 1974, we had no premonition that six years later, in 1980, the company would go bankrupt. As far as we were aware, the group was a reputable client. That opinion was obviously shared by many other people at that time.

I did not have the responsibility for administration of the file, but I was consulted from time to time over a period of months by the partner who did. For about a year before the charter was issued in 1976 I had lost touch with the matter almost completely.

I can assure honourable senators that at no time did I make any representation on behalf of the applicants to any minister, official or agency of the Government of Canada. I can also assure you that I acted, in all respects, in accordance with the laws of Canada, the requirements of the Law Society of Upper Canada and the standards of ethical behaviour expected of senators. Any suggestion that I acted otherwise is completely contrary to the facts.

Recently, I voluntarily gave testimony under oath before the Administration of Justice Committee of the Ontario Legislature in an effort to assist that committee, but the highly charged political atmosphere of the proceedings resulted in vicious political attacks on me personally during the hearing and flagrant misinterpretations of my evidence in many of the media reports. I appreciate that because of those factors it may be difficult to sort out fact from fiction. Therefore, I felt obliged to make this statement to you in order to clarify the situation to the best of my ability.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE PENNELL—FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL OF CANADA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, you will pardon me if this is an abuse of my privilege, but I should like to draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of a former Solicitor General of Canada, the Honourable Mr. Justice Larry Pennell.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

February 10, 1981

The Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which is empowered by Rule 67(1)(e) "on its own initiative to propose to the Senate amendments to the Rules from time to time", held five meetings between November 20, 1980 and February 10, 1981, to consider the procedure to be followed in the Senate when the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada is presented to the Senate.

These meetings were held as a result of a suggestion made during Question Period in the Senate on November 4, 1980, and again during debate on November 5, 1980, that your Committee examine the Rules of the Senate in order to determine if an amendment to the Rules is needed to clarify the procedure for dealing with the report of a special joint committee and, if an amendment is not needed, to specify the proper procedure to be followed.

In addition to the quorum, your Committee had, for its deliberations, the benefit of the services of the Clerk of the Senate, the Law Clerk, the Clerk Assistant and the Director of the Committees Branch. Considerable research in authorities such as Beauchesne, Bourinot and May, and in Parliamentary precedents, was undertaken and, in addition, inquiries were made regarding the practices followed in the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

In the motion that established the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, both Houses of Parliament ordered the joint committee

". . . to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" . . . and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen."

Until the actual text of the report is known, it is not possible to determine in advance all of the options that may be open to the Senate for dealing with the report. However, certain matters were considered by your Committee that bear upon the manner in which the report may be treated in the Senate.

Your Committee is of the opinion that the Senate can deal with the report in one of at least seven ways:

(1) it can adopt the report in its entirety,

(2) it can adopt the report in part only,

(3) it can reject the report in its entirety,

(4) it can decide that consideration of the report will take place "this day six months",

(5) it can refer the report back to the committee for further consideration,

(6) it can propose and adopt amendments to the report and then refer the report back to the committee giving the committee power to amend the report accordingly, or

(7) it can refrain from taking any action on the report.

Where the report is referred back to the committee for further consideration or amendment, the relevant motion would have to include a provision that the committee be revived for such purpose and that a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the proposed action.

There are a number of authorities for the method to be employed in exercising the second option. Beauchesne's

Fifth Edition, citation 652(2), states that "A report may be adopted in total or in part".

Bourinot's Fourth Edition states, on page 479, that "A report has been sometimes adopted only in part".

May's Nineteenth Edition states, on pages 664 to 665 that "On the consideration of a report motions may be made expressing the agreement, or the disagreement of the House with the report as a whole or with certain paragraphs thereof, or for agreeing to the recommendations contained in the report generally or with certain exceptions . . ."

There is also the precedent of June 25, 1924 where the Senate agreed to the Third Report of the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament with the exception of the last paragraph thereof. (Senate Journals, June 25, 1924, p. 362).

Consequently, should the decision of the Senate be to agree to the report of the committee in part, the motion would be worded as follows:

"That the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada be agreed to, with the exception of . . .

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly."

Beauchesne's Fifth Edition is the authority for the method to be employed in exercising the sixth option. Citation 658, subparagraph (2), reads as follows:

"A report from a committee may not be amended in a substantive manner by the House: it must be referred back to the Committee."

Citation 663 states:

"A special committee ceases to exist at the moment its final report is presented to the House. Therefore the report cannot afterwards be sent back to the committee with instructions to amend it in any particular way unless the House agrees to revive the committee by adding the following words to the motion for recommittal: 'and that the Committee for such purpose be revived.' "

Thus, if the decision of the Senate were to refer the report back to the committee, the motion would be worded as follows:

"That the Report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the Committee with instructions that the Committee has power to amend it so as to recommend that . . .

That the Committee for such purpose be revived; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action."

The Rules of the Senate do not set out any specific procedure in the case of a report from a joint committee. However, Rule 1 reads as follows:

"In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof."

Your Committee examined the precedents in both the Senate and House of Commons and found that there were instances where the reports of standing Senate committees were referred back to committee for further consideration and there were also instances where the report of a standing joint committee was amended by both Houses following the presentation of the report in each House. However, no precedents were found where the report of a special joint committee had been either amended or referred back to committee.

The precedents in which the Senate and House of Commons directly amended the reports of a standing joint committee occurred in respect of various reports of the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament presented to Parliament in 1873, 1892, 1902 and 1904. In all of these cases, the same amendments were made in both Houses.

There are, however, precedents, and indeed the Rules of the Senate cover the point where a report of a committee is received and no motion for consideration follows its presentation.

Having examined the rules, precedents and the statements of the authorities on Parliamentary practice as set out above, your Committee is of the opinion that an amendment to the Rules of the Senate in the present circumstances is not necessary. Your Committee considers that each of the seven alternatives described earlier in this report is an acceptable procedure within the power of the Senate and may be followed when the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada is considered in the Senate.

Respectfully submitted,

H. de M. Molson
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molson: I ask leave to have this report taken into consideration now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Does the honourable senator mean now, before Question Period, or as the first order of business?

Senator Molson: As the first order of business.

Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration later this day, and that it be the first order of the day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CABINET

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure you all share my regret that Senator Perrault and Senator Olson are unable to attend this evening's sitting. They are on their way back from British Columbia. I expect Senator Olson will be here tomorrow, and I hope Senator Perrault will be here as well. I undertake, of course, to forward to them any questions you may wish to ask.

Hon. Martial Asselin: The best one is here.

Hon. Lowell Murray: We have a number of questions we would have liked to address to the Leader of the Government in the Senate or to the Minister of State for Economic Development, but they can wait another 24 hours or so.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We can survive.

Senator Murray: We will ask them tomorrow.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have one question for the minister who is present, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I ask the question, not because the subject matter comes directly under his responsibility, but because he has commented on the subject on several occasions.

Last summer the minister indicated that the government was considering the eventual sale of shares in Petro-Canada to individual Canadian citizens. In view of the fact that the government is now considering how to finance the purchase of Petrofina, and whether to impose the Canadian ownership tax, and, if so, when to impose it and to what extent to impose it, I should like to ask the minister if he knows whether the government is considering following the course he suggested last August of selling shares in Petro-Canada to individual Canadian citizens to raise at least part of the necessary financing.

● (2015)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have no knowledge of what the government may be proposing, if anything, with regard to the subject matter of the question raised by my honourable friend. However, I shall be happy to take the question as notice—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Raise the price.

Senator Argue: —and send it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for his reply. However, when the Minister of State for Economic Development returns perhaps he can answer it directly.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY GENERAL OF NATO—COMMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers that I can present on behalf of Senator Perrault.

On December 16, 1980, Senator Haidasz asked a question about statements made by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Honourable senators, there is no difference of substance between the statements of the Prime Minister and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the western approach to the situation in Poland. Both reflect the Canadian view that the crisis in Poland is one for the Poles themselves to work out, and that all states must refrain from interference in Polish domestic affairs. Both also indicate the inadvisability at spelling out specific countermeasures the west would adopt in the eventuality of a Soviet military intervention in Poland.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—SPACE OCCUPIED BY NEWS MEDIA—RENTAL VALUE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Lang on December 17, 1980, concerning space occupied by the news media in the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.

Honourable senators, approximately 3,000 square feet are occupied on the third floor of the Centre Block by the media. This space forms a part of the space assigned to the House of Commons.

There is no direct market comparable for accommodation on Parliament Hill. However, the value of similar space in the Wellington-Sparks Streets area would be approximately $7.75 per square foot per annum.

The media does not pay rent for this space.

The Canadian taxpayers are subsidizing the cost pertaining to the use of this space. However, it is understood that the media have been provided with this space and location to enable them to supply the Canadian public with immediate, efficient and factual reporting of the news. The media space is located close to both the House of Commons and Senate chambers, as well as the main cabinet ministers and Leaders of the Opposition for both chambers, who are located in the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY GENERAL OF NATO—COMMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on December 17, 1980, concerning the alleged statement by the Secretary General of NATO on the Polish situation.

With respect to the press conference given by NATO Secretary General Luns at the time of the December foreign ministers' meeting, it would appear that he was misquoted in certain press reports as having said that the alliance would respond "diplomatically, economically and militarily" to Soviet intervention. What Dr. Luns actually said was that the alliance would respond "politically, economically and diplomatically." At no time did he mention any possible military intervention on the part of the west.

At that meeting the alliance agreed on a strong reaction to any Soviet military intervention, but as stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it was considered imprudent to specify the details of the response. The minister went on to say:

> We do not assume that the Soviet Union is inevitably going to interfere in Poland. We are hopeful that it can be deterred from taking any such step, and we certainly do not want to give grounds to the Soviet Union for believing that we were interfering with Poland. We believe that Poland should not be interfered with by anybody east or west.

This was also the gist of the message the Prime Minister conveyed to President Brezhnev.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

EDUCATION OF INDIANS IN SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA—REPORTS OF AUDIT SERVICES BUREAU

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on January 14, 1981, concerning a report by the Audit Services Bureau dealing with Indian education in Saskatchewan.

The operational review of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's education program in Saskatchewan has been reviewed, and a series of consultation meetings with Saskatchewan Indian band authorities is now underway on the subject.

The Federation of Saskatchewan Indians is co-operating by arranging the consultation meetings in Saskatchewan with funding of $29,000 provided by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Most districts have now had one or two sessions.

● (2020)

A report is expected from the FSI on the results of those meetings. Following that report, action plans will be developed based on the recommendations made in the report and on the results of the meetings.

The department has not received a first report on operational review of Indian education in Manitoba. When it is received the department's approach to the recommendations will be developed in the light of the Saskatchewan experience.

Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer, but I will hold that for Senator Perrault.

Senator Flynn: What about the Irish moss?

Senator Frith: I am looking ahead here to see if there is anything on Irish moss.

Senator Flynn: Don't look ahead; look back.

Senator Frith: I will try to see that the delayed reply that I am not going to include in today's record of proceedings doesn't gather any.

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DERAILMENT—REPORT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—CONSIDERATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question on the Grange report asked by Senator Smith on January 22. The reply consists of three paragraphs, which I ask to be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

1. In his direction to the Advisory Committee the Minister made the following statement as to the Committee's Terms of References—"To advise the Minister of Transport on the implementation of recommendations of the Mississauga Railway Accident Inquiry, and on behalf of the Minister, to monitor implementation". As you can see, the Advisory Committee is charged with considering all recommendations. In fact, the Advisory Committee has already indicated to the Minister its initial response to all the recommendations. I attach a copy of their First Report to the Minister for your information. As you will see, the Committee is supportive of the majority of the recommendations.

2. The Government shares Judge Grange's sense of urgency. The Minister has stressed this point on several occasions in the House and before the press. In fact, much action has taken place already, as you will note in reading the Advisory Committee's First Report. For example, the CTC has tackled the first three recommendations by issuing a Show Cause Order on recommendation 3 and a request for detailed information on the other railway recommendations to permit swift action on these as well. The Advisory Committee's Report also provides information on the activities of Transport Canada regarding escape control plans for shippers, provision at the scene of dangerous goods accidents of inspectors certified by Transport Canada, simplification of the dangerous goods code and an analysis of the available facilities for implementing the research recommendations.

3. Concerning the time frame, as indicated in the response to question no. 2, the Advisory Committee and the Government will be working as quickly as possible to ensure minimum delay in the implementation of Mr. Justice Grange's Report. As well, the Advisory Committee will remain together during the period of implementation in order to monitor and appraise progress of implementation and to report thereon to the Minister.

THE CONSTITUTION

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA AND PRIME MINISTER OF GREAT BRITAIN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to the question of which Senator Asselin gave notice at the last sitting of the Senate. He gave notice that he wanted an explanation from the Leader of the Government, and I quote:

> I want to give the Leader of the Government verbal notice of an important question. So I give him notice now that next week I will ask him to make a formal statement on the contradictory statements made in the other place by the Prime Minister and other ministers regarding discussions with the Prime Minister and other ministers of Great Britain about the admissibility of the resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate on the Constitution.

Honourable senators, the answer about the position of the government is that given in the other place—

[English]

Hon. Martial Asselin: On a point of order, last week I gave notice that I was expecting a statement from the Leader of the Government. If a statement is issued, I hope he will send me a copy of it in advance so that I can prepare a reply.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: The answer is that which has been provided; it was the same position as that taken by the Prime Minister, but I can quote from what he said. His statement can be found at page 6822 of the House of Commons Debates for February 3, 1981:

> From now on the position I am taking in this House, and I hope my ministers will take the same position, is that the British can speak for themselves. I do not think they need the Tory party in Canada to speak for the British parliament or the British government. As far as we are concerned, we have stated our views. I will not enter into any more cross-questioning about private meetings between our ministers, or between the British Prime Minister and myself.

That is all as far as answers are concerned, Mr. Speaker.

Senator Asselin: I will merely say that this is a biased answer and that I was expecting something different from the government.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—SPACE OCCUPIED BY NEWS MEDIA—RENTAL VALUE

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a supplementary, honourable senators, with regard to the question by Senator Lang concerning the space occupied by the press.

Since the taxpayers are paying for the space occupied by the press, I am wondering if there is a contract between the government and the press as to the responsibilities of the latter. Do they have a responsibility with regard to what they will cover on a parliamentary basis, rather than on a House of Commons basis? Is there another side to the contract? I wonder if there has been any investigation done with regard to comparable space paid for by the government that is not being used. Was the figure that the Deputy Leader gave us $7.25?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the figure was $7.75.

Could I have some clarification as to what the honourable Senator Marshall means by "what they should cover"? Does he mean what floor space they should cover?

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I was referring to the duties and responsibilities they have, in exchange for the free space they occupy on a parliamentary basis.

Senator Frith: The honourable senator will remember that the question itself sets out what is expected in exchange for that space. I doubt that there would be any contract limiting the subjects they could cover. If there is any such provision I will certainly let the Senate know about it. I would be surprised, however, if he is talking about subjects the press could cover. I doubt if there would be such a contract. However, as I say, I will try to find out.

Senator Marshall: I am wondering what their responsibilities are in exchange for that free space. I want to know why they have free space in Parliament, and whether there is another side to the contract in terms of the responsibilities they are expected to fulfil in exchange for that space.

Senator Frith: The Honourable Senator Marshall will remember that the answer says:

> —it is understood that the media have been provided with this space and location to enable them to supply the Canadian public with immediate, efficient and factual reporting of the news;—

That is all the information I have.

Do I understand that Senator Marshall wants to know what the source of that is, whether it is contractual, and whether there is more detail than is furnished in this answer?

Senator Marshall: My point is that the press are certainly not telling the public about everything that goes on in Parliament. They may be telling them about what goes on at one end of the building, but certainly not at both ends.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders which was presented earlier this day.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson moved that the report, be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I have today put in your hands a copy of the report of the Rules Committee. You may consider this procedure to be slightly unusual. I have done this, however, because I think all the circumstances from which this arises are somewhat unprecedented. In the first place, we have not discussed our Constitution very often in recent years; and, in the second place, it is unusual in that, being faced with the problem of dealing with a report of a special joint committee, we found there was no clear-cut method by which this chamber could deal with such a situation.

● (2030)

This report arose because, in discussing the possible treatment of a report from the Joint Committee on the Constitution, it was suggested that, as there did not seem to be any clearcut procedure, the matter should be studied by the Rules Committee and possibly a rule or rules prepared which would cover the situation.

Your committee met five times. At those meetings we examined the Rules of the Senate, and consulted the precedents and authorities such as May, Bourinot and Beauchesne. We had the benefit of the advice of the Clerk, the Law Clerk, the Director of Committees and the Clerk Assistant, and we consulted other houses of parliament whose procedures might have some bearing on what we do here. The net result was that we discovered that it would probably be unwise, unwarranted and unwanted to create a special rule to deal with this situation. Rather, we formulated seven possible options available to this chamber, which are set out at the bottom of page one of the report which you have before you.

I think it may be said that, as a result of the study made by the Rules Committee, these recommendations are perfectly sound. Above all, I think they make clear the possible courses available to the Senate to deal with the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution when it arrives here.

It seemed very important to your committee that it should be known how the Senate could deal with the report of the joint committee when it is finally received. For that reason, your committee felt that this report should be made before consideration of the report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. I would like to add that the report of the Rules Committee is a unanimous one and I commend its adoption.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had the honour to serve on the committee with Senator Molson during the deliberations that led to this report. I wish to congratulate him and the other members of the committee on the long hours they put in and on the positive and productive result that he has presented to us today. I also urge honourable senators to support the adoption of the report.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): At first glance, I agree with Senator Molson and Senator Frith. However, since some members of the Senate have not had a chance to read the report and reflect upon it, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved the third reading of Bill S-15, respecting The Royal Canadian Legion.

He said: Honourable senators, I would just like to speak to one aspect of this bill, and that is the clause which in effect gives the Legion the opportunity to widen its membership. In that connection, I would like to correct a false impression that I gave in my speech on second reading. It was my understanding that if this amendment were adopted there would be by-laws subsequently passed, pursuant to the enabling clause, which would set out the details of the membership. In fact, I said in my speech that the Legion will no doubt lay down detailed requirements in its by-laws as to who will be accepted for membership. The evidence given before the committee reveals that that has already been done, but the Legion did not realize that it did not have the legal authority and power to do that.

I would like to refer to the evidence given before the committee by Mr. J.E.A.J. Lamy, who is the Dominion Secretary of The Royal Canadian Legion. He said:

> Over the years—not just lately, but over the years—our conventions have made other categories of people eligible to join the Legion—people who they thought deserved to join. They did not really know about the act of incorporation, and they have taken people who were not covered under the act.
>
> . . . Those people who are now Canadian citizens or Commonwealth subjects who had active service in a force of Her Majesty's allies in a conflict in which Canada took part—in other words, the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War. Someone who served, let us say, in the American Army in the Second World War and is now a Canadian citizen was admitted to the Legion. Also those who have served in an actual theatre of war, during a war in which Canada was engaged, in some non-military service, such as the Mercantile Marine, the Merchant Navy, the Newfoundland Rescue Tug, the Deep Sea Salvage Tugs, the Fishery Patrol Service, the Corps of Canadian Firefighters, the War Correspondents; auxiliary services which comprised the Legion, YMCA, Salvation Army, and Knights of Columbus; the Canadian Red Cross, the St. John Ambulance, the Ferry Command, and those members of the Newfoundland Forestry, (Overseas Units), who had at least six months service overseas, the British Home Guard, the National Fire Services of Great Britain, and the Air Raid Wardens.

Over the years we have also admitted people who have participated in the United Nations or Commonwealth police action in Korea, the Congo, the Gaza strip, Cyprus, or any other area that may be specified by Dominion Command.

Therefore, honourable senators, there is a common thread, in that the additional people the Legion has accepted who are not strictly covered by the by-laws are all people who have actually served in a theatre of war or who have participated in some kind of police action and have been subjected to physical danger. They are, therefore, naturally congenial to the members of the Legion, and the members do not intend to open up to any Tom, Dick or Harry.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving the second reading of this bill, I am somewhat overwhelmed by various factors, some of which are apparent and some of which are not apparent. Anyone who looks at the bill, sees its thickness and tries to read some of its clauses must be somewhat overwhelmed by it, at least if he has any appreciation of taxation law.

● (2040)

I had not expected to be moving second reading of the bill, and it is only because of rather unexpected circumstances that I am. Consequently, when I should have been preparing my remarks for second reading today I had other commitments to attend to, and I hope honourable senators will bear with me as I try to present what is the appropriate approach to the handling of the bill.

This is the first legislative measure arising out of the budget of last October 28 to come before the Senate for consideration, but that is only part of the story. The bill contains many income tax amendments, some of which are relieving to the taxpayer, some of which are more restrictive and some of which are purely technical.

The story goes even deeper than that, because that is only one aspect of the strange story of this particular bill. It has its origin in three different speeches of two different finance ministers. There was the budget presented on December 11, 1979 by the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Crosbie; there was the speech—I suppose it could properly be termed a mini-budget speech—of the present Minister of Finance on April 21, 1980; and there was the budget as delivered by the present Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen, on October 28, 1980. It was a matter of gathering up items from earlier budget speeches and embodying them in the last budget. However it was done, that is the origin of the bill. Naturally, with that kind of origin, it is understandable that further changes have been made in some of the budget proposals since those budget speeches were delivered, even including the last speech. It is in that kind of atmosphere, then, that we begin our consideration of the bill.

Because of some of the slightly changed circumstances and because of the considerable lapse of time since December, 1979, I thought I might usefully take a little time to try to gather up some of the changes in thinking or development of thinking that might have come forward since those times. I refer to certain factual changes. My purpose in doing that is solely to put the bill itself into proper legislative context; it is not with any intention of trying to debate those subjects. Rather, it is to bring the origins of the bill into better focus for our examination.

Let me refer now to the last budget. Its basic policy strategy recognized the difficult economic situation that faced Canada, and indeed other national economies as they affected Canada. The approach sought to be moderate and carefully balanced. The Minister of Finance sought to emphasize the need to deal with inflation, and at that time the budget speech envisaged the possibility of some increase on the price front owing to the more rapid increases in energy and food prices. In fact, developments since that time indicate that there has been even more pressure on food prices than he forecast. There are several reasons for that, including the low yield of certain crops, the reduced marketing of cattle and hogs, and other similar factors.

In our examination of this bill, the one fact that is clearer than it was at the time of those earlier speeches is that inflation is the most serious and stubborn problem facing the Canadian economy. I mention that partly to bring the bill into a more up-to-date focus because of the long intervals of time since some of these measures were first brought forward in a budget, and partly because of the unusual aspect that they are only now being legislated into law, as opposed to the normal procedure in which a budget is delivered and then, within a matter of weeks, the consequent tax legislation is in place for examination.

There have been some other changes of a more encouraging nature which I could discuss at great length, but I do not want to begin developing a budget speech or anything of the sort. That is not my role here tonight. I merely want to try to give an indication of the nature of the bill sufficient to enable us to examine it in its proper context.

Taking the package in its entirety, I think it is clear that it is an attempt to reduce gradually the rate of inflation and to promote employment and productivity growth; and the approach that is sought to be reflected in the bill is that it would be wrong to yield to urgings that we should apply greater economic stimulus at this time, at the expense of seeking to curb inflation, because that could get things out of proportion. It is a matter of trying to balance all the factors. Thus, it is a matter of trying to steer a moderate course between the two extremes, on the one hand advocating greater economic stimulus, and, on the other, advocating more restrictive fiscal policies to combat inflation, which would imply a combination of higher personal and corporate taxes and severe measures to cut government spending, which, in turn, would undoubtedly disrupt important public programs, thus putting a severe strain on employment, or, to put it bluntly, contributing to more unemployment.

Involved in that, of course, are government restraint policies on expenditure that, although perhaps not germane to the bill directly, are of considerable significance. However, although I am quite free to do so, I do not intend to deal with them at this time because I feel they are not entirely germane to what we are considering this evening.

Of significance, honourable senators, is the change in the element of government expenditures consequent upon its attitude towards restraint. The growth rate in total spending, including budgetary expenditures and loans, investments and advances, is projected to decline from 13.2 per cent in the current fiscal year to 12.8 per cent in the coming year and to approximately 10 per cent by 1983-84. These projections are within the trend rate of growth of gross national product, and this policy will bring the government's share of total outlays in the gross national product down to an estimated 20.3 per cent of the gross national product by 1983-84, which is the level it was at in 1979-80. That may reflect a slight change in some of the figures, and I mention it for that reason.

One of the things contributing to this slowdown in government spending growth is the removal from the federal treasury of the burden of financing petroleum import compensation charges and placing the cost elsewhere. It is quite true that that burden will be shared directly by consumers, but they will still pay less for energy than if we had moved toward world prices more quickly.

There are things I could say about the new expenditure management system which makes easier and better both the general restraint in spending and control over the order of priorities in spending. By doing that there is an attempt to finance new initiatives in the priority areas of energy and economic development. In any event, over the next three-and-a-half years the estimate is that the government will be allocating $8.4 billion from new energy taxes to help achieve security of supply and reduce our vulnerability to oil price shocks.

I do not know that I need go on to the new expenditure management system as it applies to economic development with a view to bringing about growth in productivity and restraining cost increases. One of the figures in this respect is rather interesting. Over the next few years, about $1.5 billion will be allocated to major expansion programs for industrial development, research, export promotion and transportation. Another $350 million has been allocated to industrial restructuring and manpower retraining. Two billion dollars will be available to the western development fund for initiatives to expand and diversify the economies of the western provinces. I think that is as much as I need say on that subject at the moment. My purpose is to bring the background of the bill into context.

I could say much more about the budget speech. In addition to this measure we will require two bills that will be very significant, and it ought to be borne in mind when we are dealing with this income tax bill that it is only the first part of the package. The budget speech made reference to improving our economic performance and bringing the deficit under control, and it set out the National Energy Program. The main legislation concerning that part of the budget speech is contained in two bills which have not yet come before us. I refer to Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Act, and Bill C-57, which implements the 8 per cent tax on petroleum and gas revenues and the new gas and liquid gas excise legislation.

It is true that the income tax amendments in the bill before us do contain some provisions relating to exploration and development expenditures that flow from the National Energy Program contained in the budget speech. However, they are not where the main thrust of that subject is contained; they are only part of it. The other two bills are the legislation dealing mainly with energy policy.

I should mention, insofar as the bill before us is concerned, that there is one change relating to the oil and gas sector from what was proposed in the October budget. At that time, a change was proposed in the tax treatment of well-drilling costs that qualify for 100 per cent write-offs as Canadian exploration expenses. This was to apply to expenses incurred after 1980. However, the industry has expressed its concerns as to the possible adverse effect of making this change before the new petroleum incentives program becomes fully operational. In other words, the two acts which should work together were not coming forward together. As a result, the income tax changes relating to exploration drilling expenses have been postponed until 1982. That has been a pretty well received and approved change. It should be quite helpful to any exploration activity.

Honourable senators, I come now to the bill proper. I apologize for having taken a few minutes in getting to it, but I thought the information would be helpful. Many of these measures affect the 1980 personal income tax liabilities of Canadians, as do some of the measures announced in last October's budget.

I say this to indicate a problem which is bothering me and it is that many of these factors affect the individual returns that have to be made before April 30. The benefits of these changes are of great significance to individual taxpayers or certain groups, and they must be reflected in the returns made. Curiously, some of these returns have to be made before February 28, but most must be made before April 30, and the forms must be printed and sent out before that date. There is some urgency in this respect. We do need to examine the bill with all reasonable speed, and that can probably be done. I only mention that so that we will not be caught by surprise later on with a demand to speed up the hearings of the committee.

I might add that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee met today to commence its study of the subject matter of the bill in advance of its being read the second time. This approach should be helpful.

I should perhaps mention some of the different classes of individuals who will be affected by the returns they file in the next couple of months. There are changes in the deduction paid to a spouse by a person carrying on a non-incorporated business. This would seem to be not very extensive, but it is important to those concerned.

● (2100)

There are other changes to be made to the whole area of support payments made pursuant to a court order and payable to certain persons under the more recent legislation. Those changes relate to the family law field.

There are changes in the provisions concerning a bequest of cultural property to a designated public institution, such as a museum or art gallery. There is a change in the capital gains provision. It will be seen, again, that it is not an extensive tax, but it can be very important in the small number of cases where it arises.

There is a change made in overseas employment income, and the treatment of it. There are certain conditions set down, such as a Canadian resident being employed for at least six months continuously overseas. There is treatment of the formula reducing part of his income that is taxable. Again, this should help the employment situation for Canadians. Of course, it must be a Canadian employer as well as a Canadian employee.

Then there is a change in the refundable abatement for taxpayers in Quebec. There are changes relating to property transferred between spouses, and deductions for travelling expenses of part-time employees. There are deductions allowed for volunteer firemen, and so forth.

I mention these things to indicate the range of this bill.

There are some important measures affecting the corporate tax field, and most of them apply to 1980. So, until this legislation is passed, there will be delays not only in tax assessments, but also in a good number of business transactions and corporate plans. A number of business transactions cannot be completed until the law is in place because this will affect corporate planning or, at least, the carrying out of corporate plans. There is an element of importance in that regard.

There is a provision for the owners of small businesses to deduct salaries paid to spouses, and other such matters.

Interestingly enough, most of these measures affecting corporations were first introduced in the budget of December 11, 1979, and honourable senators are familiar with them in a general way. I do not think it is desirable that I list them, although I can do so. However, I should, out of fairness, draw attention to two in particular.

I referred earlier to one which has to do with the 100 per cent deduction of Canadian exploration expenses, and the change of the date of that. I think that has a significant effect on certain exploration work. There is another that affects the payments by companies to acquire oil and gas resource properties. It deals with the method of deducting the cost at a reduced rate of 10 per cent on a declining balance basis. This change has to be correlated with the other legislation. It is quite important and I draw it to your attention.

Of course, there is the new investment tax credit to encourage new manufacturing investment in poor regions. There are some changes in tax rules affecting credit unions, and so forth. There is a further favourable change affecting small businesses in that it permits them in certain circumstances to treat interest paid on a bond issue as if it were a tax-free dividend. That can have a significant effect when one bears in mind that small businesses have quite a favourable tax base as compared to larger corporations.

There are many other changes in the bill. I have not attempted, you will be grateful to know, to set out all of the changes proposed in the bill, but I think I have indicated the thrust and purport of the bill, and that is what I sought to do.

I hope this measure is dealt with within a reasonable period of time. I am one of those who do not like to see legislation of this nature drag on for years, as the banking legislation did. I shall be glad to see it cleaned up.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your patience, and I commend this bill to your consideration.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1981

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-56, intituled: "An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970".—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I called Senator Smith about this item and found that he has suffered a bad bout of the flu. He told me that he was going to see his doctor today, and that he would let me know what to do with this item. While I did not talk to him on his call-back, his secretary left the clear message that he would not be here this week, and "he wants you to go ahead with the bill and not to hold it".

I spoke to Senator Macdonald about this matter, and I apologize for not speaking to Senator Flynn about it. In these circumstances, I am wondering if we should go ahead with third reading of the bill and then give Senator Smith an opportunity to make any sort of postscriptum notes or comments he might wish to make when his health is restored to him, and he is restored to us.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do you mean on third reading?

Senator Frith: As I understand it, the subject matter of this bill has been studied by the committee. Senator Smith said that there are certain comments he wishes to make before third reading but, because he cannot attend, he now wishes us to go ahead with the bill and give it third reading. He will make his comments when he returns.

Senator Flynn: I have some difficulty with what Senator Frith is proposing. As far as I am concerned, the bill can receive second and third reading. However, this is a special type of bill. It must receive unanimous support because it is of the essence that it not be controversial. I would rather like to discuss this matter with Senator Smith, because if he has any reservations then I think that creates a problem. However, if he has no reservations, I have no problem.

I would prefer that this order stand. I shall try to speak to Senator Smith tomorrow. As I say, as far as I am concerned this bill can receive second reading and third reading, and be passed. However, it is of the essence that it receive unanimous and complete support. Therefore, I would like to clear the matter up with Senator Smith.

• (2110)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understand the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition, and I agree with him that that is exactly the nature of the bill. I assumed that Senator Smith knew that too, and that is why he said it was all right, but let us not take that for granted. It would be good to get it passed this week, but certainly that does not have to be done tonight. I believe we should have that absolute assurance from Senator Smith for the reasons advanced by the Leader of the Opposition.

Order stands.

STATE IMMUNITY BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator van Roggen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, for the second reading of the Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to provide for State Immunity in Canadian Courts".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not believe there is any rush to deal with this bill tonight. Therefore, I will deal with it tomorrow.

Order stands.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 29, 1981, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Smith calling the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (The British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submitting that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall that my intention in speaking to this inquiry was to simply tidy up some loose ends that were left as a result of my earlier intervention that particularly related to some questions asked by Senator Thompson. I expected that Senator Smith would want to deal with my earlier intervention, so I told him that I would put on the record what I described as the whole target for him to shoot at instead of just nine-tenths of it.

What I propose to do is to continue from where I left off when this debate was adjourned on January 29. At that time I indicated that I wanted simply to review the basic propositions upon which my intervention was based and the extent to which those propositions dealt with the question raised by Senator Thompson. That question is to be found at page 1535 of Debates of the Senate for January 15, 1981, and it concerns certain grants that were made with reference to the seas around Nova Scotia and how they fitted into the position that I had taken, namely, that the reasoning in the British Columbia Reference case applied fully to Nova Scotia, although the case itself was not binding on Nova Scotia, for the reasons that I set out then. I do not now propose to give all the authorities that I gave then because Senator Smith will want to deal with them also, but simply to give the propositions and say how I see them answering the question raised by Senator Thompson.

Those propositions are as follows: first, that we are not talking about the inland waterways or the land territories of the province. Clearly, under the British North America Act, the rights to the resources in those lands and inland waterways belong to the province. We are talking about two areas. One is called the territorial sea, which was from the low-water mark to the three-mile limit until 1970, and thereafter to the 12-mile limit. That is the territorial sea. For purposes of our discussion we are talking about the three-mile limit because the effective date is 1867. The second area we are talking about is the continental shelf. The question we are dealing with is: Who owns the resources in those two areas.

The next proposition is the crucial date. For Nova Scotia it is 1867, because that is when it entered Confederation. For the western provinces it is a later date, and for Newfoundland it is an even later date. For Nova Scotia it is that date because of the British North America Act, which provides in section 7:

> The Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have the same Limits as at the passing of this Act.

So that is proposition 3.

Proposition 4 is that the principles in the British Columbia Reference case are as follows: First, with reference to the territorial seas, the limits of Nova Scotia must be based on the proposition in the Keyn case, which was accepted by the Supreme Court of Canada—and as a matter of fact by other Commonwealth countries, particularly Australia, when dealing with the same question. It is important to know that the principle in the Keyn case is in these words:

> I think that usage and the common consent of nations which constitute international law, have appropriated these waters to the adjacent State to deal with them as the State may deem expedient for its own interests.

Then it goes on to say that the only way—this is in the Keyn case and the British Columbia Reference case—those limits can be extended is by an act of the Imperial Parliament, not by an order of the Sovereign in Council.

With regard to Nova Scotia in 1867, that province, so far as I am aware, has never been able to produce evidence of a British statute that extended its limits beyond the common law limit, namely, the low-water mark.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Where did Canada get its authority?

Senator Frith: You and I discussed that before. The answer is in the British Columbia Reference case. I am attempting to demonstrate that the reasoning in the British Columbia Reference case applies equally to Nova Scotia. The reasoning is very clear. There was nothing to prevent the British Parliament from giving that authority to Nova Scotia, but not having given it, it belonged to Canada. That is so by reason of the British North America Act, and as a successor in international law to the British Crown. I can only say that is what the court said.

Senator Flynn: But it is your interpretation of it that I do not agree with.

Senator Frith: I submit that it is not my interpretation; it is precisely what the court said.

In the case of Nova Scotia the same reasoning applies, namely, that only an act of the British Parliament could have extended that province's limits beyond the low-water mark, because the court adopted the principle enunciated in the Keyn case.

Senator Flynn: A province needs an act of the British Parliament, while Canada gets it without any authority at all.

Senator Frith: No, according to the Supreme Court of Canada, it gets it through the British North America Act plus the succession in international law.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Flynn: That is quite different.

Senator Frith: That is what they said.

Now, that same reasoning—and I emphasize the word "reasoning"—applies to Nova Scotia because that province has not been able to produce such a statute any more than British Colombia has.

Senator Flynn: It is quite different.

Senator Frith: At that point it is the end of the matter, in my submission, but Senator Smith mentioned two other reasons why the limits of Nova Scotia should be extended. In my submission, they are irrelevant because the matter ends at proposition 4. It ends because Nova Scotia, like British Columbia, was unable to produce such a statute. Even taking the two additional points that Senator Smith based his position on, that there were treaties that extended that, the Keyn case, which was approved by the Supreme Court of Canada, said:

> —nor could treaties with all the nations of the world have that effect. That can only be done by Act of Parliament.

So, again, you are back to "Act of Parliament."

To review that, if there is no act of Parliament, that is the end of it. Senator Smith asks "What about treaties?" The Keyn case, approved by the Supreme Court of Canada, says that treaties cannot do it.

The final matter that Senator Smith dealt with was the two commissions. The first commission, in 1621, did refer to "seas". A subsequent commission—and, again, using commissions is, in my submission, irrelevant—in 1763, the Wilmot Commission, clearly put the limit as being the Atlantic Ocean, just as the limit in the case of British Columbia had been the Pacific Ocean. So, again, the reasoning in the British Columbia Reference case applies equally to Nova Scotia, and the rights of Nova Scotia, because of that reasoning, are the same as those of British Columbia—namely, none. Those rights are in Canada.

• (2120)

That is now the full target for Senator Smith and the Leader of the Opposition, the former Minister of Justice, to take a shot at. That completes my submissions on this inquiry.

Senator Petten: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure that Senator Petten does not want to applaud that.

Senator Petten: I was applauding my friend.

Senator Flynn: But you are certainly not speaking for your province when you applaud what Senator Frith has just said about the limits.

Senator Molgat: Just on general principles.

Senator Petten: He said that—

Senator Flynn: You tried to make that speech in St. John's, to tell them they had no rights to offshore resources. If you come back, you will be lucky.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada, Volume II, Annual Statements of Property and Casualty Insurance Companies, for the year ended December 31, 1979, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, Chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Trust and Loan Companies for the year ended December 31, 1979, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, Chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 22 of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion Act, Chapter R-4, R.S.C., 1970.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL—EXPORT AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND JAPAN—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Olson wishes to make a statement, copies of which have been circulated. It might be the subject of some questions during Question Period.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to make a statement to the Senate respecting the signing of a protocol in Vancouver yesterday respecting a huge coal development for western Canada. What I propose to do, if the opposition agrees, is to read the statement that I made at the ceremony, which will take me less than five minutes—

Senator Marshall: How long did it take you in Vancouver?

Senator Olson: It took quite a bit longer, because it had to be translated into Japanese along the way. I think that was a very useful thing to do, since there were a lot of people there who understood it better under those conditions—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: You are tempting me to make a different kind of speech. This is just a factual statement, but the project is such a great economic development for Canada that I could redesign it and give it that way. But if honourable senators would like me to read it exactly as I gave it in Vancouver, I will do so.

Senator Asselin: Why do you not stick to your text?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators will realize—

Senator Frith: The opposition do not want to be part of history unless they are making it.

Senator Olson: You will realize, as I read the statement, that it was designed for, and, of course, targeted to, the audience that was at the ceremony, which means that it will sound slightly different from the way it would have sounded if I had designed it to be read in the Senate. The statement reads:

> I am here on behalf of Prime Minister Trudeau and the Government of Canada to congratulate the Canadian and Japanese companies on their successful negotiation of the largest export agreements ever achieved between our two countries. I endorse Mr. Nemoto's remarks both now and during the negotiations of the importance of these agreements to the healthy and growing trade relationship between Canada and Japan.
> It has been an honour for me to lead the federal government's involvement in this project. I had the constant encouragement and support of the Minister of Transport, Jean-Luc Pepin, who, while he cannot be here today, has ensured the full co-operation of the National Harbours Board and Canadian National Railways for which he is responsible. In Senator Perrault, who will be making his own comments in a moment, I want to say that this project and British Columbia have had an effective spokesman.
> I have just released to the media a copy of a telex I sent to the companies and the B.C. government yesterday outlining the basis for the federal government's involvement in the northeast B.C. coal project.

The federal government has always maintained that we would honour our commitments to provide the port and rail infrastructure essential to the success of this project. These investments will open up a second corridor for exports not only of coal but also grain, potash and many other resources from British Columbia and other provinces. We are participating in the northeast B.C. coal project in several ways:

—through a $35 million coal terminal at Ridley Island to be provided by the National Harbours Board; —through $10.1 million in associated offsite services;

—through a contribution by DREE of $4 million for an access road to the terminal;

—through a guarantee of an indexed throughput charge of $3.00 per tonne for six years for the coal terminal at Ridley Island;

—through $72 million for upgrading of the CN mainline from Prince George to Prince Rupert, another $85 million for train sets, and an estimated $50 million for new CN plant capacity, all of which are to be provided by Canadian National.

I want to stress all of CN's investments will be recovered through the commercial freight rate it has quoted to the companies. With respect to any public investment related to the terminal, the government has directed the National Harbours Board to fully recover it in the throughput charges to be calculated after April 1, 1989. Moreover, it has always been a primary objective of the federal government to ensure that these investments would in no way alter the competitive positions of other coal producers in British Columbia and Alberta.

It would be difficult in these few short moments to enumerate all of the economic and social benefits which could flow from these coal agreements for the province and the country as a whole. There are the $9 billion in exports, the 2,400 jobs during the construction phase, the foreign exchange benefits, the industrial spin-offs for companies right across the country, especially in transportation and port equipment.

Let me focus, however, on three points which matter greatly to me.

One is the way in which the native people of the area will participate in the development while, at the same time, complementing their traditional way of life. It is my view that when major economic projects occur in this country—projects involving taxpayers' dollars—more care be taken to ensure that the people living in the area can take advantage of the unprecedented opportunities represented by the project.

In the case of the northeast B.C. coal project, my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will be assessing the manpower needs and designing training programs for local workers. As well, I am establishing a consultative process with the native groups in the area to plan for their involvement in this project and the Alaska pipeline project.

Secondly, I want to emphasize that the federal government will undertake to exercise all of its responsibilities relative to the protection of the environment in the northeast B.C. region.

The final point I want to make is that this major project contributes significantly to the unity of this great country. Senator Perrault and I came to British Columbia last spring to talk to Mr. Phillips and the B.C. government about the expansion of Roberts Bank, about the construction of the Ridley Island grain terminal and about northeast B.C. coal. Indeed, yesterday we met again to discuss British Columbia's economic development priorities and how these fit into the national framework.

As of today, and in only a few months of hard but effective work between the two levels of government, I am happy to report that those problems have been resolved. This country does work. The national government does listen to the provinces and does respond as best it can.

For me, and I am sure for all of my colleagues in the federal cabinet and indeed for the people of the country as a whole, the northeast B.C. coal project marks a step toward our greater prosperity as Canadians and the stronger interdependence and unity of our many parts.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hardly think it necessary for me to congratulate the honourable minister, because he has clearly congratulated himself quite well. In fact, he has left nothing out.

There are some points in his statement which I think must encourage all of us, because what he said with respect to the native people of the area and the problems of environmental preservation are statements that we are all glad to hear because they are aspects of resource development which, over time, we have learned are more important than they seem to be at first. If those problems are solved in connection with the coal movement in British Columbia, that will be good for everybody. I certainly hope it will be good for the people of Alberta and the people of British Columbia whose coal is being sold in this way.

I should like to ask my honourable friend one or two questions about the financing of the project, because he left me with the impression that he expected the contributions of the government to be self-financing. I believe that is the policy he is following, and I should like to inquire about a couple of items in that connection.

I am not clear that the $10.1 million in associated offsite services and the contribution by DREE of $4 million for an access road to the terminal are part of that self-financing package. Perhaps he could tell me if that is the case.

I should also like to know the tonnages on which the amortization of the Canadian National investment is to be based, because I see that Canadian National is to recover, through its commercial freight rates, its out-of-pocket capital costs. The reason I am interested in the tonnages on which the calculation is based is that the Government of British Columbia has made it clear that British Columbia will not be recovering all its costs from the coal that is planned to be moved under this arrangement. I believe that approximately 11 million metric tons more of coal—either coking or thermal, and I do not suppose it matters which—will have to be moved in order to bring the British Columbia accounts into balance. My inquiry is really whether there is any problem of that kind in connection with the Canadian National situation.

I was glad to hear the minister enumerate the economic benefits that flow from natural resource developments of this kind. That is an important thing for him to have done. He also emphasized the benefits that accrue from that, not only in British Columbia but all over the country and particularly in central Canada, and that, too, is a good thing to have done. If he were to apply the same line of reasoning to the development of new projects that are in the deep freeze right now in respect of oil, and were to tell the people of Ontario and central Canada of the enormous advantages that would accrue to them when those policies are freed up and put into operation, I think he would be doing us a good turn.

● (1415)

Perhaps he could give us that information without ascribing—and I am not ascribing—any blame either to the Alberta government or the federal government. In this particular comment regarding the holdup involved, I leave the question of blame to one side because I think it would be inappropriate to mention any disagreement in connection with successful coal development of this kind. If the minister could tell the people of central Canada what they would have to gain if the oil and gas projects got the go-ahead, I think he might help reduce the ice jam that presently seems to afflict the energy policy.

Naturally, I am glad to see the development of any part of this country. If he could throw any light on the problems I have raised—which are perhaps relatively small points—I would be grateful to have the minister's statement.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would be very glad to comment. Perhaps there are other senators who would like to ask further questions during the Question Period, but we are not at that stage yet. However, I would reply directly.

The $10.1 million for infrastructure and the $4 million for the access road are not to be calculated in the cost recovery in the first instance.

In order to make some calculations—and I want to be careful about this—two things had to be done: one was to give the coal companies a freight rate; and the other was to give them a port loading charge so that they could negotiate. We now believe that there are two million tonnes more immediately available under these two contracts than the original calculations were based on. Therefore, it follows that the higher the tonnage the lower the cost per tonne. However, we have not yet worked out the exact calculation. The amount that we are talking about from these two companies alone—that is, Teck and Denison—is now up to 7.7 million tonnes annually. In addition, we have had some further inquiries from at least two other companies which also want some space at Ridley, when it is completed, to load coal.

[Senator Roblin.]

It would not be unfair of me to estimate that by the time the port is in full operation—which would be in 1984 or, perhaps, 1985—we could expect to have offered in excess of 10 million tonnes to be loaded at that port. However, I want to make it clear that that is my view of what is coming in behind, because the demand for thermal coal, from all around the world—the Pacific Rim, parts of the Mediterranean, Europe and other places—is becoming very strong indeed.

The other point that requires some explanation is the $3 per tonne maximum charge that we offered to the coal companies for six years from the commencement date so that they could negotiate. Indeed, the escalation factor is based on April 1, 1980, so that by the commencement date, 1983 or 1984, it will have escalated from the April 1, 1980 figure to whatever the level is at that time.

We have also offered the companies 80 per cent escalation, rather than 100 per cent escalation, over what really turns out to be a nine-year period of escalation, because although it is to apply for six years, it will be three years before we actually get to the point of loading the coal and charging for it.

Senator Frith: What is the index for the escalation?

Senator Olson: The index for the escalation is the CPI.

If we have any losses because of guaranteeing that $3 maximum plus escalation charge, then we will set a commercial rate after April 1, 1989, which will take care of whatever the costs are then plus the recovery of any losses that we may have suffered.

● (1420)

I hope that is clear, because we may have some losses. We are going to forego some interest charges on the original capital investment of $35 million, but if there is a loss to be recovered we are going to get it back in the charges after 1989.

As far as concerns the comment with respect to how we should present the gas, oil and mega projects particularly, as being of economic benefit to Canada, I say, in a non-partisan way, that I concur with what the honourable senator has said. We are going to try to do that.

I conclude by saying that, at the beginning of the Alaska Highway pipeline project we sent out specific press releases to every town that was going to be affected. We sent them to Welland, Stratford and Hamilton. We knew that some of the compressors were going to be built at those locations. We also sent them to Montreal because we knew that the engines were going to be built by Rolls Royce. I think it is extremely important that it is understood that a large part of these economic benefits flow right across this country.

Senator Roblin: I thank the minister for his statement. I can say that I find it encouraging. I should like to make a supplementary point. I think what I want to get at is whether we are exporting energy at cost, below cost, or at some concessional price. Obviously, the minister and I agree that we should not export energy at a concessional price, and I think what he tried to tell me is that he is not doing so in these circumstances.

I should like to have a breakdown, particularly of the railway costs, showing how the $3 a tonne relates to the 7.7 million tonnes he talks about, because if the British Columbia figure of 11 million tonnes shortfall for covering their costs has any relevance at all to the federal picture—and I am not sure that it has—then it would be disclosed by whatever figures the minister could give me on that. If he could give me the tonnages being moved and the relationship between the cost recovery to the railways' capital costs, carrying costs and operating costs, I could then form an appreciation as to whether or not this coal is being moved at what I call economic rates.

The minister may have that information, and if he does, I would be pleased to have it.

Senator Frith: The 11 million tonnes they will move?

Senator Roblin: To answer Senator Frith's question, the statement from British Columbia is that they would need over and above the 7.7 million tonnes sold now—or even the 10 million tonnes—another 11 million tonnes, which means more than double the amount, in order to clear their books in terms of making sure it is a fully economic non-concessional proposition with respect to exporting these large quantities of coal to Japan.

Senator Frith: In relation to the costs?

Senator Roblin: That is right. I am anxious to find out whether there is any gap of that kind in the federal cost picture, because, from what the minister has stated, it is not clear to me what the facts really are. So I would appreciate having that information.

I think it is important to establish the rules of this coal exporting game now that the government has taken such a large role in it. I agree with the minister when he says that the prospects for the future are very buoyant with respect to coal, and I think we want to get off on the right foot.

In another capacity I have had some experience negotiating with the Japanese on the price of coal, and, believe me, they know how to do that. So, if we have a deal with the Japanese that is fair to the Canadian economy, then I think that that is a pretty good mark.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can partly answer that question. The coal that is being sold by Quintette starts out at a base price of $75 per tonne f.o.b. Ridley Island. That is an amount, depending on which contract one looks at, which is from $2 to $10 per tonne above any other price at the moment. Indeed, some people would say that this is a premium that the Japanese will pay for the supplies they require because they want access to that port to be open.

• (1425)

Senator Roblin: Just to clarify that, when my honourable friend talks about a premium, there is a time element involved. What set of prices is he comparing it to? Is it the price of Ridley coal two years down the road compared to what he estimates current contracts will be, or what current contracts actually are today?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this is one of the problems you get into, namely, the base. We have to start somewhere even if you are going to escalate.

Senator Roblin: I want to know what your base is.

Senator Olson: The base is $75 a tonne in April 1, 1980 dollars. The price that they get will be escalated at an index no less than the CPI, but perhaps more. I cannot say exactly which index will be used above the CPI. The other contract, as I understand it, was for $75.50 a tonne because there is a little more trucking involved with that one than with Quintette.

I just received the hand-outs—that is, the information handed out by Quintette Coal Company and Teck Corporation—and I believe there are copies available. I would be pleased to send copies to my honourable friend opposite if he does not get them directly from the companies.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend, but could he also give me the government's calculations on the CNR? I would be pleased to have them also.

Senator Olson: I can do that as soon as we have them, but let there be no misunderstanding that these are the best estimates that can be made. As far as the CNR is concerned, it is far more predictable. They know how many train sets they are going to buy and what the price is going to be. In any case, the CN's rates will be escalating at some index too over that period—perhaps from 80 to 100 per cent—whether it is the CPI or some other index. They are intending to set it up in such a way that there is no cost recovery on their part, although obviously, they have to make some capital investment, and its return will be included in the price.

Senator Roblin: I want to ask one final question, and I thank my honourable friend for his patience. I am concerned about this question in more ways than one. Most of these contracts have a clause which enables the shipper to decline to accept volumes of coal if the market in Japan for steel, for example, falls off. They are not fixed quantities in the sense that the buyer cannot vary the quantity from time to time. Are there any such qualifications in the two deals we are talking about?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have to be careful what I say concerning what is still under negotiation and what has already been made public information with respect to—I think this is what you are talking about—"take or pay."

Senator Roblin: That is right.

Senator Olson: I know that that is part of the negotiations, but I cannot attempt to announce anything until the company is ready to say what that may be, and it could obviously be a plus or minus figure from the 100 per cent figures that are in the contract.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, the minister in his reply to me on January 27, 1981, when he was reporting on the progress of this sale to Japan, said:

> There is every indication that this contract will be highly beneficial economically, and will require very little subsidy, even in the initial stages.

May I ask him to whom that subsidy will be paid? Is it to the Canadian coal companies, and is it money that will have to be paid back over the years?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, how to define "subsidy" is always a good question, because obviously there is going to be some capital investment in what I have described—more specifically, for infrastructure such as access roads, and also the preparation of the site on Ridley Island. Some people will claim that is a subsidy. What we are confident of is that the charge levied for loading the coal will be high enough to recover all of that money, but we have set a maximum of $3 a tonne plus escalation starting in 1983 or 1984. If there are any losses during the first six years—that is, to April 1, 1989—it is clear we will adjust that price not only to take into account the commercial requirement for doing it based on the cost then, but also to begin the recovery of any losses that we might have had earlier.

● (1430)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wonder—

Senator Thompson: May I ask the honourable senator—

Senator Frith: Perhaps the honourable senator will excuse me for a moment. He may wish to respond to what I am about to say. We have anticipated Question Period to some extent with this statement, but, in my opinion, it has been useful to have an exchange between the minister and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and also the questions asked by Senator Thompson. Do honourable senators agree that we should proceed to Question Period, as there is nothing on the order paper between this item and Question Period?

Senator Grosart: Why?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: Why change the rules?

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL—DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I appreciate the minister's suggestion concerning the ambiguity of "subsidy", and how it could be broadly defined. May I be more specific? Is there to be an actual financial grant, to be paid back to the government over a period of time, of so many millions of dollars to help the coal companies to get started?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there will be no grant or payment made directly to coal companies in the beginning, and therefore there would be no recovery. Any capital investment at the front end would be through the National Harbours Board for the port and, I suppose indirectly, through the railway in the purchase of the equipment it needs. The exceptions which I mentioned are minor compared with the totality of the program—that is, for some infrastructure related to the island and the access road. The rest of it will be subject to cost recovery.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

IMBALANCE IN EXPORTS TO AND IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the minister. It will probably be considered by him to be naive, but nevertheless I shall ask it.

About 15 years ago I served on a provincial trade mission that travelled to Japan. In the course of that visit there was much discussion about trade relations between Canada and Japan. The thing that seemed to exercise the minds of most people at that time was the fact that what we exported from Canada to Japan was in the nature of unprocessed or raw natural resources—

An Hon. Senator: Right.

Senator Donahoe: —and that what we imported from Japan was in the nature of highly processed manufactured products, which came into the Canadian market and made things difficult for the manufacturers of this country.

One cannot help but be impressed this afternoon by the extent to which here again we are arranging to export to Japan vast quantities of our unprocessed raw resources. I noted, when the minister spoke, that he said this would lead the way to other exports to Japan. I was struck by the fact that each of the new exports that he said might follow in the wake of the coal was, in its turn, an unfinished, unprocessed, natural resource.

My question is: Is there anything in this deal which will tend to assist in the imbalance of the nature of the exports to Japan, as opposed to its imports? In other words, does the Canadian manufacturing industry have anything to hope for in the export market as a result of this deal?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the coal that will be exported will be in as highly a processed state as it can be. I understand that when it reaches Japan, it will be put into their steel furnaces. Therefore, if we are unwilling to sell them the coal in this state of process, then we are unwilling to sell it to them, period—unless honourable senators feel there is some way in which we can sell them the steel instead of the coal. It is for plants that are already in operation.

There will possibly be a capability to load potash and sulphur at Ridley. Potash will be largely in the state in which it is put into the ground to fertilize the soil. It leaves me a little bewildered as to what kind of upgrading honourable senators would want of that resource, because that is what it is used for. It is either put in the ground, wherever it is taken in the world, or it is not sold.

I am sure my honourable friend knows that most of the sulphur that is exported is used for the making of sulphuric acid, which is the backbone of industry around the world. It is far easier to ship it in that form than in the form of sulphuric acid. We could add a few more to this, but it seems to me that the honourable senator has picked the wrong set of commodities if he is arguing that they should be upgraded, because they are upgraded to the highest level possible for the uses that will be made of them.

Senator Donahoe: In view of the minister's reply, may I say that I was not in any sense suggesting that there was anything wrong or improper about the sale. I was interested to note from the minister's reply that the commodities he mentioned are all products of the extractive industries; they are all part of our natural resources that are produced through the extractive industries. I was referring to products manufactured in this country, and asking if, in addition to the great boom that the minister says will be created in the extractive industries in this country, there would be any corresponding increase in our sales of manufactured products on the export market.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there will be a great deal of material and equipment— a wide range of supplies from equipment to steel products of many kinds—that will be required for this deal—

Senator Donahoe: For use in Canada.

Senator Olson: —including several hundred hopper cars and locomotives, and that sort of thing. All of that will be widely spread across this country.

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL—RECOVERY OF GOVERNMENT INVESTMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the minister how much and how soon will the federal government recover from this huge investment in the sale of British Columbia coal to Japan?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not have the figures before me, but hopefully everything necessary to get the project under way will be done relatively quickly. For example, last Thursday the National Harbours Board began a series of newspaper advertisements calling for proposals concerning the private operator who will be actually doing the loading at the port. However, I cannot give any specific dates with respect to this. All I can say is that the preparation of the site at Ridley Island is already under way, and I expect that the CN has probably already put out calls for the equipment it is going to buy.

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL—PROCESSING AND SOURCE OF MINING EQUIPMENT

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I commend the minister for his statement and I hope this project will have vast economic benefits for the whole of Canada.

Having said that, may I ask a question along the lines of Senator Donahoe's questions? If this is strip mining, will the drag lines be made in Canada, or will the equipment come from Japan? If the coal that will be produced is to be shipped in its raw form, will it be sized in Canada, therefore providing employment, and will it be treated in Canada with oil, therefore providing employment? In connection with all of the preliminary work that will be done in the production of the coal for export to Japan, will there be much Canadian content with respect to machinery and labour, or are we just going to fill the ships with the raw material from western Canada?

• (1440)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this government has always, consistently, attempted—and, indeed, has been successful in doing so—to maximize the benefits to Canada of such undertakings, insofar as this is possible, and that will be done in this case, too.

Senator Muir: That is one of the finest non-answers I ever got, either here or in the Commons.

GYPSUM EXPORTS

Hon. Robert Muir: Further to what the minister has just said, may I ask him why the government has not done the same thing with regard to the gypsum industry in Canada, which has poured out millions of tonnes, under the same administration, for many years, none of which was ever processed in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will have to take that question as notice, because I am not sure that the situation is as my friend describes it.

Senator Muir: I have stated it correctly. None of it was ever processed in Canada. It was just shipped out.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development about the Petrofina purchase.

There has been considerable concern expressed by both business and political people about what appears to be a very high price per share in this transaction. Even the founder of Petrofina expressed his amazement last week at what he called the exaggerated price paid by the government to Petrofina for these shares. My understanding was that $80 to $82 would have been considered a good market price, and that a price in the order of $90 to $100 would have been a fair bonus for active participation in that market. The price of $120 a share seems to be an outright gift from where I stand, and sounds like an exaggerated price to the president of the company concerned.

I wonder if the minister can comment on that. There are some very serious concerns in that area.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I could comment at length on what the honourable senator has said, but I certainly cannot give a full and complete answer under the rules in the context of the Question Period. I think it is fair to say, however, that the price that was arrived at for the purchase of a sufficient number of shares to acquire the desired percentage of control was that which was negotiated, and I think the negotiation was done in good faith by good negotiators. If that is the comment the honourable senator wants, it seems to answer all the questions he has asked so far. Perhaps tomorrow afternoon I could bring him a somewhat more detailed explanation of some of these factors.

Senator Doody: I have a supplementary question. I certainly think it would be appropriate to elaborate on the comments that the minister has made to date.

He says the negotiations were conducted in good faith. That really begs the question. I think that somebody, some time ago, said that faith without good works does not mean a great deal, and we certainly do not have much in the way of good works in this particular transaction, where a price of $80 has been exaggerated to $120.

My understanding is that the Canadian public will now have to pay for that purchase at the gas pump, and that 50 per cent exaggeration, if you will, is going to be reflected in the price of a gallon of gas. It seems to me to be a kind of a cynical way of treating the promises made during the last election campaign. I remember very well being told that this new government, when elected, would not go anywhere close to the increase of 18 cents a gallon which caused so much concern at the time. As I understand it, the price has already increased by more than 23 cents a gallon, that the cumulative increase is up over 32 cents per gallon, and now we are talking about another 4 to 8 cents per gallon on this particular boondoggle, as some people have called it. In addition, the price of home heating oil will go up another 6 cents per gallon, and all we are told in this chamber is that it has all been done in good faith.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary of the minister in connection with the purchase of Petrofina by Petro-Canada?

I notice a statement by Mr. W. H. Hopper, the Chairman of PetroCan, to the effect that he intends to ask the federal government to raise $1,460 million to enable him to complete this purchase that he has embarked upon. As my honourable friend Senator Doody has made quite clear, the price becomes a matter of some public concern if public finances to that amount are to be dedicated to this purpose.

I notice that in his statement to the press Mr. Hopper, in reply to some questions about valuation, said that the price was based on a report prepared by an outside consulting firm, and he believes it to be fair.

[Senator Doody.]

I ask the minister whether he would undertake to let us have a copy of this outside consulting firm's advice to PetroCan, because if we are going to be asked to supply $1,460 million we had better have a pretty good idea of just how that sum was arrived at.

Senator Olson: I will try to get more information for my honourable friends tomorrow. I have a fairly detailed memorandum respecting some of these matters in front of me now. I believe that this has, for the most part, been made public in any event; but it seems to me that I should look at these questions fairly carefully, both as to how they are asked, and as to what information they ask for, and make sure that I get specific answers to them. I can tell my honourable friends, however, that the answers will probably be a whole lot more elaborate than that, because there are a few things the honourable senators have left out.

Senator Doody: There are a few things we do not know.

Senator Roblin: I admit that. There is a great deal I left out, but I am trying to keep my questions pretty short and succinct.

Senator Olson: For a change.

Senator Roblin: "For a change," my honourable friend says. I am doing my best. I would like to get any information that he is able to offer, however, in connection with PetroCan, because $1,460 million is still a great deal of money, and if the taxpayers of this country, through the gasoline filling stations of Canada are being asked to provide this, as is possible, then I think we need to know more about it than we have been told so far.

Senator Olson: There are a great many assets involved, of course.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, my question is also for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

What would be the revenue expected from the acquisition of Petrofina, as compared to the sale price, and, secondly, what are the taxes we are going to lose? Petrofina, of course, used to pay taxes to the government, but from now on it will not have to do so, and those taxes will be lost. I would like to have answers to those two questions.

Admittedly, the price paid for Petrofina is high, but if the revenues are going to be pretty high as a result, then it is a good thing for us to have bought it. We must, however, take into consideration that the taxes Petrofina paid to the government will no longer be available.

Senator Flynn: How much will you have in your pocket?

Senator Olson: I take that question as notice, and will try to find those particular figures.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, when the minister is preparing this more comprehensive statement on Petrofina that he referred to, I would like to ask him to include one other aspect to which very little reference has been made so far.

Last summer Petrofina stock could be bought on the open market at $46 a share. The price shot up from $46 to over $80.

This was due, not to any significant change in the operations or the assets of Petrofina, but, as I think is generally recognized, almost entirely, if not wholly, to rumours that were spread around to the effect that Petro-Canada was thinking of buying Petrofina. At the point when trading in the stock was suspended, when the deal was under way, the price was up over $80. The comparisons we are hearing today are between $82 or $88 and $120, and references are made to a 50 per cent premium.

• (1450)

I draw the attention of the house to the fact that the value of that stock on the open market just last summer was merely $46. If that is the fair market price as set on the exchange, then the price Petro-Canada is paying for this stock is not a 50-per-cent premium but a 150-per-cent premium, the difference between $46 to $50 and $120. If that is the situation, I think all honourable senators agree it is a matter of serious concern to the Canadian people, who are now being asked to pay an additional charge on energy products to cough up the money to pay $120 a share. I do not want to belabour the point, but I would appreciate the minister looking into this matter, because it is causing concern to a lot of people.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is one interpretation which can be made on the value of these shares. I am not arguing, at the moment, whether the prices went from $46 to $82 or $87 or any other number, on the basis of rumours that Petro-Canada was interested in an acquisition. That may or may not be a fact. I know there are such arguments made from time to time when the market responds to certain stocks, whether it is Petro-Canada or any other company involved in the process of a take-over plan. I think it can be demonstrated—and I will dig up the figures—that the value of this company's assets, both in terms of today's dollar and the future value of the dollar, considering that the price of gas and oil is surely going to escalate, probably forms part of the basis on which the $120 per share was arrived at. We cannot simply say that there is something wrong in Petro-Canada getting involved in one of these acquisitions, and disregard the fact that every time there has been an acquisition there has been an increase in the value of those shares. There is nothing unusual about that.

Senator Roblin: The taxpayer is paying for this.

Senator Frith: It is a good deal for the taxpayers.

Senator Olson: I would like Senator Murray to do an assessment of the acquisitions that Petro-Canada has made prior to this time; take the value of those assets at the time they were acquired and compare it to their value today. I think he should swallow that kind of comment, which I regard as completely unfair in the context here. I think, too, that honourable senators know very well that quite often what the market responds to, in determining the shares on the board, has something to do with dividends and distributed earnings. We will have to look into that, too, and the situation may be completely different with respect to the assets of Petrofina when it becomes part of Petro-Canada. Therefore, as a result of owning, controlling and using the distribution system, the cash flow into the company may be substantially higher than it was before. That also has to be taken into account.

I will take the question as notice. I think my honourable friends opposite will probably want us to look also at the reserves, additional land values, and all of the other assets that go along with that, divide that by the number of shares and see what it comes out to.

Hon. Lowell Murray: I would like to ask the minister about the financing of this take-over. The head of Petro-Canada has made it clear that that company is not in a cash position to finance the take-over and that the taxpayers will have to finance it. I think the government, through the Minister of Finance, has confirmed that it is the Canadian ownership account under which the government is apparently seeking authorization to put a tax of as much as $4 a barrel on oil which will be used to raise the money for this.

I want to ask the minister to confirm that it is through the Canadian ownership account tax that the money is going to be raised for this, and to tell us what the extent of the tax will be. Will they immediately put the $4 a barrel on, thereby raising the $1.4 billion in six months, or will they put a lower tax on and spread it out over a longer period? If the latter is the case, who is going to pay the interest charges on the money that will have to be borrowed from the banks in order to provide interim financing for the take-over? This must be considered, because I think there will be very considerable financing charges. Will that money also come out of the Canadian ownership account tax?

Senator Olson: Many of the questions that Senator Murray has just asked, of course, are still in—

Senator Murray: Limbo.

Senator Olson: No, they are not in limbo. They are part of a normal acquisition negotiation that is announced in all its final details when it is completely consummated. I think that that has to be taken into account. My honourable friends know that. Some senators complain that the price of Petrofina shares went up substantially because of rumours that Petro-Canada may be in the position of making an acquisition. That has now been put to rest and some kind of offer has been made for sufficient shares so that the acquisition can materialize; and now they want all the rest of the details. Of course, my honourable friend knows there are some further details, such as those he has just asked about. As rapidly as those details become public information, I will see that the Senate is informed of them.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development on a slightly different aspect of the matter we have just had under discussion. Yesterday in the other place the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that the matter of Petro-Canada's acquisition of Petrofina came before the government and was dealt with on the same day. He said that day was Thursday, January 29. Having said that, he also said that the government provided no direction to Petro-Canada with regard to the Petrofina purchase price. As Senator Murray has just indicated in a question, the president of Petro-Canada has announced that his company is "pretty well strapped with debt." He expects that the revenue from the Canadian ownership charge will be used to pay the entire $1.46 billion purchase price of Petrofina.

If all those things are correct, and I believe they are, would the minister indicate whether Petrofina will be allowed to continue to enjoy a régime under which it is entitled: first, to select targets; second, the negotiate a price independently; and, third, to cause taxes to be levied at the same time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think I should answer that question by saying, as I said a few minutes ago, that when all of those details are known they will be brought to the attention of this chamber. However, one or two of those questions are really quite easy to answer. I can say that Petro-Canada does not levy taxes; the Parliament of Canada does that. A proposal will be made to the Parliament of Canada, based on the budget, for acquisition, when the time comes. Furthermore, it is not difficult to understand why the president of the company would like to have maximum equity with respect to the deal, because that, of course, gives him much more latitude. Whether that is just speculation, or whether it would be $1.46 billion or, say, half of that, $700 million, has not been made public information, probably because an agreement on the ratio has not yet been reached.

● (1500)

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. I had intended to ask the question in any event, but I am now impelled even more strongly because of the cogent intervention of Senator Manning. My question concerns the price at which the Petrofina shares were acquired. Surely it must be obvious, even to the Minister of State for Economic Development, that there is a considerable body of thought that it was a leak of Petro-Canada's intentions that drove up the share price of Petrofina.

The Minister of Energy has told us repeatedly that that is not the last purchase to be made. He hopes that Petro-Canada will make other similar purchases.

Can the minister indicate to this house what action is being taken to ensure that the Minister of Energy, in creating this acquisitive climate, will not contribute to unrealistic stock price increases of prospective future targets?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it has always been the view of this government that such acquisitions should be made. Apart from that, I believe the honourable senator will find the answer to most of his question in his own notes, if he is willing to accept what the minister said, that the proposal was put before the government and dealt with in one day. If that is so, then whatever else he was arguing about must have occurred before the proposal was put before the government. I am sure that if he looks at his own notes he will find a clear-cut answer to the question he has just put.

[Senator Donahoe.]

Senator Donahoe: In dealing with constitutional and other matters we often find leaks, and there may well have been a leak in this case.

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—OFFICIAL CEREMONY

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I understand that a few days ago the Minister of State for Economic Development attended a ceremony in Spokane, Washington, which was sponsored by Pacific Gas. Can the minister tell us the significance of that meeting?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators. On Monday evening of this week I was in Spokane attending an official ceremony to mark the construction of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline in the United States. Many miles of that 42-inch pipeline have already been welded and placed in the ground, but the significance of the ceremony, in my view, is that it is a justification or an exoneration—or whatever the right word might be—of the action that this government took last July when it authorized the beginning of the construction of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline in Canada. They have gone forward with that pipeline at an accelerated rate in the United States. Indeed, even in Alaska, where the most difficult construction area and climatic conditions are to be found, a significant amount of activity has taken place at an accelerated rate with respect to the design and engineering of the conditioning plant and certain other considerations respecting the line itself. According to my information, the pace at which that work is proceeding is beyond what was anticipated even last summer.

THE ECONOMY

CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA FORECAST

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, by way of a delayed answer I should like to respond to a question raised on January 20 by Senator Nurgitz concerning the forecast made by the Conference Board of Canada.

I am informed that the Conference Board indeed published a forecast in December of 1980 that predicts that the increase in the consumer price index will be 11.7 per cent in 1981 compared with their forecast view in September of 10.1 per cent. Also, their forecast for output growth in 1981 has been revised downwards from 1.9 per cent in September to 1.0 per cent in December.

The period from September to December was a particularly volatile one in terms of economic events. The U.S. economy emerged more quickly than expected from a recession and this put considerable upward pressure on interest rates and, to some extent, on prices. The extent of the impact of the poor weather on crops was better appreciated. Higher energy prices in Canada were announced and began to be put into effect. In this environment, it is not surprising that forecasts prepared in September were changed. In general, forecasts of real output growth were revised up from 1980 and, in some cases, revised down for 1981. For some forecasters, the revision to the output forecast largely reflected a re-allocation of output growth between the two years. That is to say, some of the cyclical recovery expected for 1981 was recognized as having actually occurred in 1980. It may be noted, however, that the latest Conference Board forecast for real growth to 1981 is identical to the forecast for that year in the budget speech.

On the inflation side, most forecasts of the short-run outlook have been revised up in both the U.S. and Canada. The Minister of Finance has already indicated in a speech to the House of Commons on January 16 that pressures on prices, particularly food prices, will be greater in 1981 than anticipated at the time of the budget. He added that "it seems even more clear now than at the time of the budget that inflation is the most serious and intractable problem facing the Canadian economy". However, it is not the government's practice to release detailed official forecasts every month or so.

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to give in response to a question raised on January 29 by Senator Muir concerning layoffs at a heating plant operated by Devco.

I am informed that 11 employees, not 20, as reported by the honourable senator, will be relieved of their duties in June of this year. The reason for the layoff is not because Devco is changing its heating system from coal to oil but rather because the major clients of the industrial park are moving to new quarters and the number of services required for the park will be reduced.

Five of the 11 employees to be laid off were hired on a temporary basis knowing their employment was not permanent. One of the 11 workers will be returned to another division within Devco and one worker will be retiring. The employees will have received nine months' notice of the termination of their employment. They will be eligible for severence pay up to a maximum of 28 weeks' salary.

Meanwhile, a committee has been formed which is working with Canada Manpower to assist the employees who will be out of work. Two union representatives and two representatives from the provincial department of labour are members of this committee. I can assure the honourable senator that every effort is being made to place these people in new jobs.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION LICENCES—PROVINCIAL REVENUES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer I should like to give in response to a number of questions raised on December 16 by Senator Smith. His questions concerned oil and gas exploration licences.

I am informed that the first British Columbia land sale of 1981 was held on January 21, and that the resulting revenues amounted to approximately $5.9 million. The next sale will be held on March 4, but B.C. has made no statement relative to the estimated revenues accruing from this sale.

With reference to sales in 1980, there was a land sale in January 1980 which netted $37 million. I am not prepared at this stage to give a view as to the effect of the NEP on British Columbia land sale revenues. I can say, however, that the marketing prospects for B.C. gas in California are temporarily restrained due to domestic gas surpluses in that export market.

In Alberta no official estimate has been made by that province regarding revenue expectations from land sales for the year 1981.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, for the second reading of the Bill C-54, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax".—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has had to leave in order to attend a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. He asked me to request that the order be allowed to stand, on the understanding that if anyone wanted to speak Senator Roblin would yield. In any event, the subject matter is before the committee, so it probably makes no difference.

Order stands.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1981

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-56, intituled: "An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970".—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have spoken to Senator Smith and he has agreed that his worries do not justify holding up second reading of this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator Flynn. If the debate is considered as having been concluded, I will ask leave to move second reading.

Senator Flynn: You do not need to do that because the motion has already been put.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is right.

Senator Flynn: It is simply time for the question.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill C-24, to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces.

He said: Honourable senators, one of the outstanding features of the Canadian federation is the fact that since 1867 we have had some method of equalizing the revenues of the country in order to provide a minimum standard of service for all areas of the country. That approach has grown in complexity and in volume to the extent that it has now become an important part of the whole structure of Canadian society.

Fiscal equalization is a federal program of annual unconditional payments to provinces which have a below-average capacity to derive revenue from their citizens by means of taxation. Such provinces have, as I say, this below-average capacity to finance public services for their own citizens. The purpose of equalization, then, is to make it possible for these provinces to provide reasonable levels of public service to their residents without having to resort to levels of taxation which are above the average of all provinces. I make that statement just as a general introduction to Bill C-24 which involves itself with this whole fiscal equalization program.

● (1510)

I am sure honourable senators will be impressed with the extent of equalization programs. The first arrangement made in 1957 resulted in equalization entitlements to the provinces in 1957-58 of $139 million. By the year 1976-77, financed by the federal treasury, that had grown to over $2 billion. The 1977 fiscal arrangements would show, for the year 1980-81, a total payout of equalization entitlements to the provinces of over $3.395 billion. In other words, the growth has really been quite fantastic. It has grown from $2 billion in 1976-77 to almost $3.5 billion a relatively few years later. This has put a very heavy burden on the federal treasury and, I believe, this is recognized by all parties represented in Parliament.

Bill C-24 provides for certain restrictions on the fiscal equalization program, pursuant to which the federal government makes payments to provinces that are below the national average of capacity to raise revenues for the financing of public services. The bill accomplishes this restraint in two ways. First, it bars from eligibility for equalization any province that is regularly above the national average in personal income per capita.

I think most members of this chamber are familiar with the concept of provincial personal income. It comes from the National Economic Accounts produced by Statistics Canada. It consists of the sum of all incomes received by persons resident in a province. It, therefore, includes wages, salaries, net income of unincorporated businesses, both farm and non-farm, interest, dividends, rent and transfer payments from governments.

Largely as a consequence of the importance given to natural resource revenues in the equalization formula, it is possible for a province to qualify for equalization under the formula, even though it is above the average in respect of personal income per capita. In fact, this has actually happened in the case of Ontario in recent years.

Senator Frith: What is the reason for that?

Senator Buckwold: Under the formula, if you take into account the revenue received from natural resources, even Ontario would qualify—it has not, but it could qualify.

When the government decided that a general expenditure restraint program had become necessary in 1978, it concluded that one logical way of proceeding would be to deny equalization to a province in a position such as that of Ontario. This was proposed on the grounds that the purpose of equalization is to provide support to genuine have-not provinces, and that a province with personal income per capita that is regularly above the national average cannot be accepted as falling within such a category.

In some respects, this may appear to be a harsh proposal, but it is never easy to curtail expenditures. In this regard, I note that Ontario is not the only province which would presently be barred from equalization by this provision of Bill C-24, since it would apply equally to Alberta and British Columbia. In addition, it is not an exclusion that would apply, in all circumstances, to any one of these provinces, but only in the case where such a province continues to have personal income per capita that is above the national average. The explanation of that continuum means that it must be above the national average for a period of three successive years.

The second restriction on equalization provides for phasing-out of equalization one of 29 categories of provincial revenue in respect of which equalization is calculated. Revenues subject to equalization are classified into categories known as "revenue sources," with a separate measurement of fiscal capacity and of equalization entitlement for each such source. One of the 29 sources, known as "oil and gas land sales," is particularly volatile, and it is proposed to phase out this revenue source of equalization.

Provinces derive revenues from oil and gas land sales by selling rights to oil companies to explore and develop specific tracts of Crown land which are considered to have the potential to produce oil or natural gas. The sales do not provide for the transfer of title to such land, but relate rather to the sale of certain specified rights to land. The sales take the form of an auction in which sealed bids are received from the participants, with the winner being the highest bidder. The bids are sometimes referred to as "bonus bids."

As one would expect, revenues of this kind are extremely volatile. For example, they grew from $253 million in 1976-77 to $932 million in 1977-78. The exclusion of these revenues would remove a major element of uncertainty from the formula. Moreover, it is not appropriate to regard oil and gas land sales as a normal means of financing public services, with which equalization is concerned. Accordingly, the bill proposes to phase these revenues out of equalization, with one-half of the revenues otherwise eligible coming out in respect of the 1979-80 fiscal year, and all of them in 1980-81 and thereafter.

Honourable senators, of the two measures that I have described, the first is much the more important in terms of achieving a saving for the federal government. Accordingly, the major impact of the proposals contained in this bill would fall upon the Province of Ontario. Potentially, the first measure could impact also upon Alberta and British Columbia, but since neither of these provinces qualifies for equalization under the formula, they are unaffected at this time.

The second measure, relating to oil and gas land sales, is much smaller in its financial impact, but it does affect all of the provinces that now receive equalization grants. As a consequence, equalization entitlements would be reduced for six provinces—Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Manitoba. In the case of Saskatchewan, there would actually be an increase because this province tends to be above average in respect of its capacity to derive revenues from oil and gas land sales.

As a consequence of the proposed phase-out of oil and gas land sales, the negative equalization which Saskatchewan has for this source would be eliminated. The province's overall entitlement, which is determined by netting out positive and negative amounts for all the various revenue sources, would be increased.

The program would continue to be most generous to the six other provinces which now receive equalization. While those provinces would have a reduction in their entitlements from what would otherwise be payable, in all six cases, the amount of their total equalization would increase substantially over the two-year period covered by the phase-out—that is, from 1978-79 to 1980-81.

● (1520)

In the case of Newfoundland, the increase would be $58 million; for Prince Edward Island, $17 million; Nova Scotia, $74 million; New Brunswick, $56 million; Quebec, $251 million; and Manitoba, $45 million. Accordingly, this is not a harsh measure and the government continues to give a high priority to the equalization program.

The foregoing explains how Bill C-24 would achieve savings for the federal government. Before concluding, I will comment briefly on the background of this bill because I think honourable senators should be aware of the general context in which the measure was conceived and of its subsequent history. In so doing, I will refer to a provision, which was dropped from this bill in the House of Commons on second reading, relating to payments to provinces under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act.

The origins of Bill C-24 go back to 1978 when an identical measure, Bill C-26 of the Thirtieth Parliament, was brought forward by the then Minister of Finance, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, as one element of a package of proposals to restrain federal government expenditures. This package covered a large number of federal programs and departments.

The government felt that restraint measures of the magnitude called for would have to impact upon the provinces given the fact that roughly 20 per cent of total federal expenditures consisted of cash transfers to the provinces. Discussions were held with the provinces in the fall of 1978 concerning the form which these cuts would take. Following these discussions, Bill C-26 was introduced incorporating those changes affecting provinces that required legislation.

The programs affected by Bill C-26 concerned fiscal equalization, which I have talked about, and transfers to provinces under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. The latter is a statute which provides for payments to provinces of an amount equal to 95 per cent of the federal income tax paid by investor-owned public utilities on income which is attributable to the generation and/or distribution to the public of electrical energy, gas and steam.

Because the government received numerous representations about this component of the bill, the particular clause was dropped in Bill C-24. Most of the representations, I may say, came from Alberta, but some came from the eastern provinces, notably Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. In response to these representations—and to the fact that most of them came from western Canada—the government decided to drop the portion of the bill relating to the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. This was done on second reading of Bill C-24.

Honourable senators, this gives you a bird's eye view of what is, in fact, a complicated piece of legislation. Although it appears to be a simple bill because of the number of pages contained in it, it is, as I said, a complicated piece of legislation when considered in the context of its entirety in relation to the fiscal arrangements with the provinces.

I think this is an important piece of legislation. In fact, it will not save the federal government money immediately, because the actual cash payments will be higher in the forthcoming years, but it will minimize the otherwise onerous impact of higher and higher payments which could be ruinous for the overall economy of this country.

I feel that this should have the support of all members of the Senate, and I am sure it will. I commend the bill for their careful consideration.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I just want to make a few brief comments as I have not had the opportunity to make a detailed examination of the bill. Moveover, I understand that the Committee on National Finance, to which the bill will be referred, has arranged to hold a meeting tomorrow morning where we will have a practical demonstration of the effects of this bill. Of course, the principle of equalization is not new. It goes back to 1957, I believe, and should bring back memories to my friend Senator Lamontagne. He will remember that, for once, the Quebec Premier, Mr. Maurice Duplessis, was satisfied with the federal decision because he stated at the time that this was a step in the right direction—

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: He did not understand the formula.

Senator Flynn: He did not understand the formula, but he understood what it meant for the provincial treasury.

Senator Lamontagne: He always liked figures!

Senator Flynn: I think that there are very few people who can really understand the formula. Even after the learned explanation given by the mover of this bill, whom I would like to congratulate in passing, I am not sure that we can understand exactly what this bill will accomplish. In fact, perhaps we can understand what it will accomplish, but not necessarily how.

Of course, the rationale of the principle of equalization is to give to the poorer provinces funds which should normally allow them to provide their residents with services of equal quality to those offered by the richer provinces. Naturally, most provinces benefit from this system, and in fact, the amounts received by certain provinces represent a rather significant proportion of their budgetary expenditures. There is no doubt about that. The principle of equalization has gained so much popularity that people are now talking about enshrining it in the Constitution. It was mentioned in Bill C-60. It is mentioned in the proposed resolution which is still before the joint committee.

I believe that if our only problem was to enshrine the principle of equalization in the Constitution we would have the unanimous consent of the provinces.

In any case, for the time being it is a matter of adapting the formula to changing conditions. It is obvious that exploration for oil and gas, as well as for other forms of energy, has indeed changed the situation. It is very interesting to think that today, unless the formula is changed, Ontario would qualify for federal government subsidies, a province which was the wealthiest, the richest and which under that principle used to contribute more money than any other. In fact, before long the province of Saskatchewan, where my excellent friend Senator Buckwold comes from, I believe, will no longer qualify because the situation has changed radically in that province. Those facts demonstrate that all the elements which are taken into consideration to draft the equalization formula or, if you will, the amounts payable to the provinces by the central government change with the passage of time.

So if we are to have this bill properly explained I think it is a good idea to call a sitting of the Committee on National Finance tomorrow and to hear spokesmen from Treasury Board—From Treasury Board?

Senator Everett: From the Department of Finance.

Senator Flynn: From the Department of Finance. Apparently the Department of Finance has prepared excellent diagrams which will make it still easier for us to understand. However I would not want Senator Buckwold to feel I am being critical. What I am saying is that when we read the formula, and even when we have someone explain it verbally, we certainly cannot see as clearly as on a diagram exactly what this bill will achieve.

In any event, if other senators on this side of the house were planning to speak to this bill, they are not here. But if after the committee stage they feel they have something to add on third reading, they will be able to do so.

Again, I thank the sponsor of this bill and I agree that he should move that the bill be referred to the Committee on National Finance.

• (1530)

[English]

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, first of all I should like to congratulate Senator Buckwold on his extremely able presentation of a very difficult subject, and also to thank Senator Flynn for agreeing to have the bill read the second time today so that it can be referred to committee and considered tomorrow.

As honourable senators know, the committee is involved in a major examination of Government Policy and Regional Disparities. In that connection we had a hearing on October 23 last that involved officials of the Department of Finance who explained to us the fiscal arrangements with the provinces, because that is very much a part of the study we are making. At that time we became aware of the fact that it was a much more complicated subject than we had thought. Our witness was Mr. Gérard Veilleux, Assistant Deputy Minister, Federal-Provincial Relations and Social Policy Branch, Department of Finance. At that hearing he said:

> We often hear comments about the complexity of these arrangements, not only from our political masters, but from our colleagues in other departments and people outside the government. A number of academics have commented that there is a subculture of bureaucrats who maintain the complexity of these programs for its own sake.

He is speaking here of the fiscal arrangements with the provinces. He goes on to say:

> I think this notion of complexity has perhaps to do, to some extent, with the fact that we have not attempted to explain everything. Certainly, this is one of my objections, and it is the advice I give to my minister, that is that we should try to find ways and means to explain these things better to the public in general and to people like yourself. To that end we have developed recently in the department a sort of audio-visual presentation of those arrangements and, through you, Mr. Chairman, I would gladly offer to make that presentation available to your committee if and when the committee would like to receive it.

I indicated on behalf of the committee at that time, and the committee agreed, that we would like to have that presentation. So it seems to me this is a happy turn of events because we can deal with Bill C-24, which amends the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977, and at the same time we can absorb the audio-visual presentation and be right up to date on the latest information about this very important subject. This will have quite an effect on the committee's final report.

The meeting at 9.30 tomorrow morning is not only for the purpose of considering Bill C-24. It will be the committee's thirty-second meeting to consider Government Policy and Regional Disparities.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the Honourable Senator Buckwold speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his co-operation in this regard, and for his kind words indicating, first, the complexity of the presentation and, secondly, the necessity of having the bill looked at more closely by the committee, which will report back as soon as possible.

Before I sit down, I should advise honourable senators that in the other place a special committee, composed of seven members to be named at a later date, has been established to act as a parliamentary task force on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, and to report no later than June 26, 1981, in order that its views may be considered in the negotiations with the provinces leading to new arrangements to begin in the 1982-83 fiscal year. That is of interest because what we are talking about now does not include anything past the year 1980-81. It only emphasizes the complexity of the whole situation and the necessity for a complete review of the statutes involving, particularly, fiscal equalization, tax collection agreements, the Canada Assistance Plan and established programs financing, which represent billions of dollars in expenditure both by the federal and provincial governments. It is important that we recognize that further negotiations will go on to deal more thoroughly with the distribution of funds across the country so that all parts of the country can benefit.

Having said that, I hope that this bill will receive second reading, after which I can move that it be referred to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Buckwold moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

STATE IMMUNITY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator van Roggen for the second reading of Bill S-19, to provide for State Immunity in Canadian Courts.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is an interesting but highly technical bill which does not lend itself to a long discussion in the Senate.

Senator Cook: It is too late for Sir John Ford.

Senator Flynn: No, no; I think we can deal with it before he leaves. I hope that he will not be too shy to speak to some members of the house at social receptions, because not all of us are the tattletales some have been.

Senator McElman: Shyness is one of the things of which he will not be accused.

Senator Flynn: Anyway, we are getting a little astray here. I was interested in the bill because early in my practice I had to consider the problem of immunity of foreign states in Canadian courts. A few months ago I read in The Canadian Bar Review an article by Hugh M. Kindred relating to this question, entitled "Foreign Governments Before the Courts." It is a review of the jurisprudence, and I am quite sure that Senator Langlois has been interested in this problem for some years.

Senator Frith: I am sorry to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, but has he the date of the intervention of the sponsor of the bill, so that we can follow the honourable senator's remarks?

Senator Flynn: No, but I believe it was about three weeks ago.

The question before us is whether it is useful to codify or whether we should leave it to the courts.

As I read the bill, and also the review of the jurisprudence by the learned professor who is on the faculty of Dalhousie University, it seemed to me that we might be embarking on a course which might not offer the solution we are seeking. Perhaps to codify is the right approach, but by leaving the matter to the courts, we leave it to entities that are usually able to adjust to varying circumstances. It is difficult to foresee exactly how each case will present itself to the court. Previously I referred to clause 14, which says:

> The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, by order restrict or extend any immunity or privileges under this Act in relation to a foreign state as follows:—

We are dealing here only with foreign states. We are not dealing with the problem of whether it applies equally to an unrecognized foreign state, a state with which we have no diplomatic relations. I do not know what the solution is. That is a problem for the committee to solve. At the same time, I was looking at the French translation, which does not in all cases correspond to the English version. That is another problem for the committee.

We are faced here with whether or not we should codify this question of immunity of foreign states before our courts. It is really a legal problem on which I would like to have the advice not only of the officials of the Department of Justice but also of someone like Hugh M. Kindred, a learned professor, and others who may have views on the bill now before us. It is an interesting question. In principle, it appears correct to codify, but we should not just adopt the bill blindly. I hope that the committee will give serious consideration to this problem.

Senator Frith: It is The Canadian Bar Review?

Senator Flynn: Yes, the September, 1980 issue.

Senator Goldenberg: If I remember correctly, when Senator van Roggen presented the bill he said it was being done because the United Kingdom and other countries had done it and we were just following suit.

Senator Flynn: I believe he said it was a recommendation made by the members of the Council of Europe.

Senator Goldenberg: That is right.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing wrong with that, but they may not necessarily be right.

Senator Frith: It was the Council of Europe; that is right.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I believe it was agreed that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in the absence of the sponsor of the bill, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Molson for the adoption of the First Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I stood this item in order to give some honourables senators an opportunity to read the report. Those honourable senators with whom I have spoken are in agreement with the report and, therefore, it can be adopted, at this time, if that is the wish of the Senate.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Molson moved its adoption yesterday. I do not recall who seconded the motion, but I have spoken in support of it, as has Senator Flynn. Therefore I understand that the question can be put.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SPECIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

CONCEPT AND DESIGN OF PROGRAM—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lowell Murray rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, December 16, 1980:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the government's Special Investment Tax Credit Program for areas of greatest disparity, announced in the Budget address of October 28th 1980, and to inter-ministerial confusion in the concept and design of the program.

He said: Honourable senators, I placed this Notice of Inquiry on the order paper just before Christmas, and I have put off dealing with it until today. In the interim there have been references to the subject matter in the other place. In particular, there was a speech on January 21 by Mr. Russell MacLellan, M.P., the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I mention that speech, which can be found at page 6430 of Commons Hansard, as a matter of interest and not to indicate that his defence of the program satisfied in any way the concerns and objections I intend to express. There was also a speech by Mr. Robert Howie, M.P. for York-Sunbury on the same date, to be found at page 6433 of Commons Hansard. Mr. Howie raised some of the questions that gave rise to my inquiry. Finally, there has been some correspondence between the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and Mr. Howie, to which I may have occasion to refer in the course of my remarks.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, I am not questioning for a moment the good intentions of those who conceived this program; but there is confusion of purpose about it. The planning is faulty and the design of the program, in my judgment, is as muddled as it is arbitrary. I believe that in terms of a serious attack on regional disparity this program has serious defects in principle. There is not, as we are frequently reminded by the Minister of State for Economic Development and others, an unlimited amount of money available to be committed to regional disparity programs, or to any other activity of government. It therefore behooves us, as legislators, and perhaps especially the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which has now embarked upon a study of regional policy, to satisfy ourselves that the money that is so committed, whether by way of so-called tax expenditures or in actual outlays, is used in ways that are sound in concept and execution.

Anyone who has had any acquaintance with the regional disparity problem in this country, or who is interested in it, will acknowledge at once that it is as complex as it is persistent, and all of us who are interested in the subject will welcome a better idea in this area, from whatever source it comes.

Back in December, 1979, when Mr. John Crosbie brought in his budget, he announced what he thought, and what many of us felt, was, a better idea, namely, the introduction of a new concept in the form of selective tax credits for firms locating in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé. This was to be a new program that would have been added to the existing regional incentives. This new initiative announced by Mr. Crosbie in his budget had been forecast by the Conservative Party in the preceding general election.

On April 21 last, when Mr. Allan MacEachen brought in his economic and financial statement, he abandoned the Crosbie program, and by way of justification for doing so stated at page 243 of Commons Hansard for April 21, 1980:

> The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has considerable flexibility under existing legislation to support regional development. These mechanisms will naturally be under review prior to the expiry of the legislation next year.

On November 4, when Mr. De Bané, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, he outlined the rationale for the government's having abandoned the earlier initiative announced by Mr. Crosbie. Mr. De Bané said that the tax contracts proposed by Mr. Crosbie would have had to be negotiated case by case, that the incentive was reserved for programs of $2 million and over, and that the Crosbie program had been limited to the Gaspé and the Atlantic region, being applied everywhere in those regions. I ask honourable senators to note that Mr. De Bané took objection to the fact that the Crosbie program was to have been applied everywhere in the Atlantic region.

On October 28, when Mr. MacEachen brought in his budget, he announced the program called the special incentive tax credit program for areas of greatest disparity. This is the program that he was bringing forward to replace the Crosbie initiative which he had earlier aborted. On this subject I quote from Mr. MacEachen's budget address of October 28, 1980:

> Finally, on the advice of my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), I am proposing a bold and experimental new program to help deal with regional inequalities in this country. For new manufacturing investment in specially designated areas of the country, characterized by high unemployment and low income, I propose an investment tax credit of 50 per cent terminating at the end of 1985.

Now, I ask honourable senators to note that the Minister of Finance spoke of an attack on regional inequalities. He did not speak of sub-regional inequalities; he did not speak of intra-provincial inequalities; he did not speak of inequalities among census districts. Yet what kind of program is it that he and Mr. De Bané have now brought in, and which purports to attack regional inequalities?

There was an information sheet put out by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion shortly after the MacEachen budget was brought down, which states that first of all the program is aimed at the 5 per cent of the Canadian population suffering the most from high family unemployment and low per capita income. Having said that, the information sheet goes on to say:

> —Located in every province and territory, the eligible areas generally account for less than 40 per cent of the population of any one province;

Now, those two statements form a non sequitur. It simply does not follow, because if you measure the 5 per cent of the Canadian population that is suffering the most from high family unemployment and low per capita income, it will be clear that most or all of some provinces would be included, and that some other provinces would be completely excluded.

Having decided to target the 5 per cent of the Canadian population that suffers from high family unemployment and low per capita income, the decision then to restrict it to 40 per cent of the population of any one province was clearly taken separately, even though it runs counter to the other decision to aim at the most needy 5 per cent of the Canadian population. Notwithstanding those two partially inconsistent and contradictory criteria, the government forged ahead. They decided to operate on the basis of census districts, using 1976 data for family unemployment rates and for per capita income. They decided that for a census district to qualify its family unemployment rate had to be at least 30 per cent more than the national average and its per capita income had to be less than 89 per cent of the national average. On the basis of census districts, if you took all the census districts that qualify under those criteria, you would have to include far more than 40 per cent of the entire population of some provinces. So they decided that they would have to exclude a number of census districts and parts of census districts which, on the basis of their family unemployment rate and per capita income rate, fully qualify and should be included.

At the same time the government, for whatever reason, decided that it wanted to make sure that, in this purported attack on regional disparity, there would be at least part of every province included in the program, regardless of whether that part of that province qualified by reason of the unemployment and per capita income criteria. To accomplish this they went through some unbelievable contortions of map-making and gyrations of policy design. First of all, they drew a line at the 50th parallel in Ontario and Quebec, but not in Alberta or British Columbia or anywhere else, and they said everything north of that line will be included. Now, there is no census district above the 50th parallel in Ontario and Quebec that qualifies on the basis of the unemployment and income criteria.

● (1600)

Senator Frith: And everything was half an hour later in Newfoundland.

Senator Murray: I will get to Newfoundland in a moment; it is another very interesting case. It was decided, for whatever reason, that in the context of this so-called attack on regional disparity everything north of the 50th parallel in Ontario and Quebec would be deemed to be disadvantaged in the same sense that the Gaspé and the Atlantic region are deemed to be disadvantaged, and that is because it is northern and isolated. However, even that did not include everything they wanted to include. It is a classic example of trying to beat a good idea to death. They wanted also—and, I am sure, for the best of social, economic and humanitarian reasons—to do something for the native peoples who, in the words of Mr. De Bané, are not accounted for in the unemployment and per capita income data furnished by Statistics Canada. Therefore, on December 3 in the House of Commons a new criterion was mentioned for the first time: the isolation factor.

Now, we have the DREE information sheet issued after Mr. MacEachen's budget. We have Mr. De Bané's testimony before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on December 4. We have Mr. De Bané's speech in the budget debate in the other place on November 6. We have Mr. MacEachen's testimony before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on December 2. There was never a mention of the so-called isolation factor as being a criterion in this regional disparity program. The criteria up to that point always were unemployment and per capita income. Suddenly the isolation factor emerges. On December 11, in a letter to Mr. Robert Howie, MP, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion says, presumably by way of explanation:

> The precise criteria applied with respect to the family unemployment rate and the per capita income are as follows: the family unemployment rate had to exceed the national average by at least 30 per cent, and the per capita income had to be less than 89 per cent of the national average. As you can see, the combination of these criteria results in a very stringent and severe approach to designation.
> As a result, we utilized an isolation factor to add a few more census divisions to those otherwise designated. For example, we added northern census divisions (or partial ones as indicated above) in Quebec, Ontario and some of the western provinces. In the West, in particular, we knew that this criterion of isolation would also serve to include the many native people who are not accounted for in the unemployment and per capita income data provided by Statistics Canada.

The result of all this, honourable senators, is that we have a so-called regional disparity program that is a dog's breakfast. There are 11 census districts in this country that fully qualify to be included in this program on the basis of the government's unemployment and per capita income criteria—11 census districts that fully qualify on the basis of both those criteria—but are excluded. I may say in passing that the threshold of per capita income amounts to $4,003 per year, and the family unemployment rate would be three per cent or more in order for a census district to qualify.

Taking Newfoundland as an example, the government has included Labrador because of the isolation factor, although Labrador does not qualify by reason either of the unemployment or the per capita income criterion established by the government. As a matter of fact, my impression is that that census district has the highest per capita income and the lowest unemployment rate of any census district in the Atlantic provinces.

Senator Frith: Is that just one census district?

Senator Murray: Yes. Having done that, the government excluded two census districts, which cover roughly the Avalon Peninsula and the west coast of Newfoundland, which do qualify on both the per capita income and unemployment criteria that had been set. In Nova Scotia there are three census districts—Digby, Cumberland and Yarmouth—that meet both of the criteria but are excluded arbitrarily from this program.

The anomalies that occur are very difficult to understand. The census district of Inverness, for example, which has a per capita income of $3,674 and a family unemployment rate of 3.1 per cent, is in the program, but Digby, which has a per capita income of $2,826 and a family unemployment of 3.3 per cent, is out of the program. That is, frankly, incomprehensible. In New Brunswick there are five census districts included in the program, and all of them qualify according to the unemployment and per capita income criteria set by the government. However, Queens County in New Brunswick is excluded. Queens County not only qualifies but it has a lower per capita income than any of the districts that are included and an unemployment rate as high as most of them.

[Translation]

In Quebec, there are four districts, L'Islet, Labelle, Charlevoix East and Charlevoix West, which qualify according to the per capita income and the family unemployment rate criteria, but they are not in the program. Here again, there are things which are hard to understand or explain.

Let us take the case of L'Islet and Rivière-du-Loup, for instance. The district of Rivière-du-Loup has an average per capita income of $3,577 and a family unemployment rate of 3 per cent. It is included. Yet L'Islet, with an income of $2,760 and an unemployment rate of 3.3 per cent, is excluded.

Senator Frith: Before leaving Quebec, I would like to know how many qualify and how many do not deserve it. You have given both with regard to New Brunswick. There are two or three which qualify but do not deserve it, according to your criteria, and there are others which do not qualify but deserve to be included in the program.

Senator Murray: What I have just said is that there are four districts in Quebec that qualify according to the per capita income and the family unemployment rate criteria. These are the four districts which are excluded despite the fact that they qualify.

Senator Frith: As in the case of Labrador, are they districts that qualify but do not deserve it? That was the point you made with regard to Labrador.

Senator Murray: As far as I know, the answer is no.

● (1610)

[English]

In Ontario there is only one census district that qualifies. That is the census district of Haliburton. But it is out; it is excluded from the program.

As I indicated earlier, parts of three others are included because they are north of the 50th parallel, although none qualifies on either the unemployment criterion or the per capita income criterion.

All in all, there are 14 census districts that do not meet the unemployment or income criteria, but are included, in most cases because they supposedly meet the northern or isolation criterion set by the government. If you take the two criteria separately, that is the criterion of family unemployment rate and the criterion of per capita income, there are numerous census districts not in the program that have far higher family unemployment rates than many of those included and numerous others excluded that have far lower per capita incomes than many of those included.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion keeps saying, as he did on December 3 in the other place, that those designations were not made on the basis of arbitrary, gut-feeling criteria. But, honourable senators, they are arbitrary; they are not objective. The government is bringing in a so-called regional disparity program that says a maximum of 5 per cent of the Canadian population may qualify. That is arbitrary. Then they say it must be confined to 40 per cent of the population of any one province, and that is arbitrary as well as being inconsistent.

The so-called isolation factor is completely subjective and arbitrary, and I suggest that it is applied subjectively and arbitrarily. For example, is northwestern Alberta, which is included—except for Grande Prairie, a community around which the planners drew a circle excluding it—isolated, while northeastern Alberta, which is excluded, not isolated? Are the Indians who live on reserves in northeastern Alberta not isolated, while those who live on reserves in northwestern Alberta are isolated?

Why and how was it decided that to qualify a district had to have an unemployment rate 30 per cent higher than the national average and a per capita income 11 per cent lower than the national average? I don't want to make too much of this, but I suggest that there was a unique reason for selecting those particular figures. The government drew up two maps, one to show family unemployment rates across the country and the other to show per capita income rates by census districts. They coloured those maps in various shades ranging from deep blue to deep red. They coloured the census districts in, roughly, $1,000 segments of per capita income. It seems pretty clear from looking at the maps that they decided to have a cutoff at $4,000 in terms of per capita income. The per capita income had to be below $4,000. They cut off at that point because it suited the colour code on the map. They then calculated back and found that that indeed, in terms of per capita income, would amount to 89 per cent of the national average. In other words, those criteria were established in virtue of the colour codes on the maps and not in any other way, I suspect and, in fact, I suggest that that is the case. Moreover, an examination of some of the correspondence will support that assertion.

Senator Frith: I don't suppose the deep blue and deep red had any other significance.

Senator Murray: So far as I know, the deep blue and the deep red had no other significance.

Senator Frith: I am sure you would have found it, if they had.

Senator Murray: The constraints on the program are, in my opinion, crazy to begin with. Five per cent of the Canadian population; 40 per cent of the population of any one province; the so-called isolation factor; the 30 per cent higher family unemployment and the 11 per cent lower income—those things do not stand up as criteria for a regional disparity program.

In the Notice of Inquiry I placed on the order paper I referred to "inter-ministerial confusion in the concept and design of the program". Well, the minister, Mr. De Bané, is confused about how the tax credit will apply. The information statement put out by DREE just after the October budget said that "the 50 per cent tax credit cannot exceed $15,000 plus one-half of the remaining federal tax liability in any one year." Yet Mr. De Bané, on November 6 in the other place, said:

> Now, the tax credit . . . will be limited to $15,000, plus half of the taxes to be paid over that amount. For instance, if a company invests $100,000 eligible for tax credit and its federal taxes are $25,000, the tax credit will bring down the taxes thusly: $15,000 plus half the taxes for the year, which is $12,500. Therefore, the tax credit will amount to $27,500. As the tax due was $25,000, the tax credit cancels out the federal taxes.

Well, that is not a tax credit; it is almost a tax shelter of rather attractive proportions, if you can do that. But it is clear that Mr. De Bané is wrong in his speech. It is clear that the tax credit is not $15,000 plus half the total tax liability, as Mr. De Bané has calculated, but is $15,000 plus one-half of the remaining tax liability. The tax credit on a $25,000 tax liability is $20,000, not $27,500, as Mr. De Bané indicates. That is an important point to have clearly understood by people who may be thinking of taking advantage of these incentives. The tax credit will not be more than 100 per cent of the tax owing.

In the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance an even more fundamental issue was alluded to by our colleague Senator Thériault, when he questioned the wisdom of having a tax incentive program for regional development that discriminates within regions and provinces which, as regions and provinces, suffer from disparity. This program is not true to the regional development concept in industrial incentives. This program separates census districts of equal poverty, including some and excluding others. It divides the poor from the less poor, and separates some of the poor from others.

The philosophy seems to be that if there is not enough investment money going, for example, into northern New Brunswick, the thing to do is to design a program to make it impossible to invest in southern New Brunswick. I firmly believe that is a faulty concept.

Mr. De Bané tried to make virtue of it when he appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. During some exchanges with Senator Hicks and others he said:

> Let us take a blunt example. Let us take Prince Edward Island as an example. I do not think this is the case, but let us suppose the computer had shown that that province, on those two scores, family unemployment and per capita income, is among the poorest in Canada, and we had designated the whole province; what would then happen? Everybody knows that Charlottetown, in relation to the rest of the province, is a lot wealthier. Of course, all investment would have only been in Charlottetown. So we said it is going to be the 5 per cent poorest Canadians, and in every province there will be a limit to 40 per cent of the population within that province because, again, people in a province compare themselves with the rest of the people living in the province.

I must interject at this point, honourable senators. I do not see what that has to do with regional disparity or with an attack on regional disparity.

A little later during the exchange with Senators Hicks and Godfrey, referring to an allusion made by Senator Godfrey, Mr. De Bané said:

> I remind you that that wealthy person in Kings—

Kings is a county in Prince Edward Island—

> —comes under the provisions which apply to Prince Edward Island. That is exactly what I want. I want investment to be made in that region.
> SENATOR GODFREY: You want him to double his plant.
> HON. MR. DE BANÉ: Yes, and not invest in Summerside, where we already have a big base.

I do not think that that is a very suitable, proper, or effective regional disparity program because I do not think you do the people of Summerside, Prince Edward Island, as an example, any great favour by excluding Charlottetown from such a program. The problem is that a province and a region lose if, under such a program, the incentive to settle a manufacturing industry, for example, in Fort Nelson, British Columbia, is the same as the incentive to settle in the Miramichi.

Honourable senators, no one denies that there are special and, indeed, unique problems, opportunities and potential in the northern areas and that there is good justification for special programs designed to help attack those problems and to realize that potential. The same holds true with regard to the serious need to improve economic opportunity for our native peoples. I quite agree that the tax contracts initiative introduced by Mr. Crosbie, concentrated as it was on the Gaspé and the Atlantic region, did not address these areas of concern. But does this program, the MacEachen-De Bané program, really address those concerns? I think not, really. I think they were thrown in as an afterthought, hoping that something would come of them.

Mr. De Bané tried, by an ingenious drawing of maps, to include Indians living in reserves, and yet, consider this: the Peace River-Liard area in northern British Columbia is included. It has 800 Indians on reserves out of a total of 32,000 Indians living on reserves in British Columbia, whereas Okanagan-Similkameen, where there are about 5,000 Indians living on reserves, is excluded.

Even acknowledging that the Crosbie program has some limitations, it looks better and better to me when it is compared to what Mr. MacEachen and Mr. De Bané have come up with, which is a program that tries to do too much with too little, and may well be counterproductive in terms of attacking regional disparity.

Furthermore, I think, in fairness to Mr. Crosbie, it should be pointed out that his budget also announced a $50 million program for labour intensive projects in the Gaspé and Atlantic region to include such matters as small craft harbours and so on, a program subsequently axed by Mr. MacEachen.

The 50 per cent tax credit is apparently generous, but it is clear to me, at any rate, that DREE intends that this program will, to a large extent, replace, not supplement, existing incentives such as those available under the Regional Development Incentives Act. The information sheet put out by DREE just after the budget stated:

> Stacking of the 50 per cent tax credit with other incentives is not generally permitted; the tax credit will be taken into account in determining the need for and amount of incentives under the Regional Development Incentives Act.

This is another area of inter-ministerial confusion because when Mr. MacEachen, the Minister of Finance, appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance he said, in answer to a question by myself, that the government would be willing to give both the tax credit and the RDIA grant to a particular firm and that the total amount that that firm would receive would be more than would have been the case under the RDIA program alone. I will not take the time of the Senate to quote his testimony directly, but it may be found in the verbatim transcript of the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance of Tuesday, December 2, 1980.

Senator Frith: What form do the incentives that can be stacked take?

Senator Murray: The incentives under the RDIA program are on a job-created basis or, in any event, they used to be.

Senator Frith: Is it a cash or a tax credit?

Senator Murray: It is a cash grant. They are grants on the part of DREE to particular projects that qualify.

It seems to me that there is also a danger here in respect of the amount of money that is available. Mr. MacEachen indicated to us that they were allowing for a loss to the federal treasury in the area of $15 million from these tax credit programs. Senator Thériault indicated that he did not think that was a very rich incentive, and perhaps it is not, although, if you divided the money between the census districts which qualify, it may be fairly impressive. However, there is nothing whatever, so far as I can see in the information that we have so far that would prevent all of the available money being taken up by one or two very large projects in one or two parts of the country.
